On September 6, 2008, the DHHR was notified that a child, Ryan C., born June 22, 2007, was brought to the emergency room of Raleigh General Hospital in Beckley, West Virginia, with a spiral fracture of his right femur. A Child Protective Services ("CPS") worker responded to the call and spoke with the child's mother, Samantha C., at the hospital. The explanation given by Samantha C. regarding what happened to Ryan C. was inconsistent with the child's injury. The emergency room physician opined that the injury was the result of non-accidental trauma. Ryan C. had to be transferred to Charleston Area Medical Center in Charleston, West Virginia, for treatment by a pediatric orthopedic surgeon.

The next day, the DHHR obtained emergency custody of Ryan C. and his sisters and brother, Kaitlyn P., Arianna C., and Christopher C., Jr., and they were placed in foster care on September 8, 2008. A petition to institute abuse and neglect proceedings was filed by the DHHR in the Circuit Court of Raleigh County on September 10, 2008. The DHHR alleged that Ryan C. had been physically abused and there was imminent danger to the physical well being of all the children. The petition noted that the family had been receiving in-home services from the DHHR since 2005, that prior abuse and neglect proceedings had been instituted in 2007,[3] and that the children were adjudicated as abused and neglected on July 16, 2007. The prior abuse and neglect proceedings had just concluded two weeks before Ryan C. was injured. The circuit court had returned legal and physical custody of the children to the parents on August 26, 2008.

On September 19, 2008, Samantha and Christopher C. waived their right to a preliminary hearing. The court found that probable cause was established and placement was proper. An adjudicatory hearing was scheduled for October 22, 2008. Two days before that hearing, Samantha C. gave birth to another child, Madysen C. The DHHR immediately filed an amended petition to include the child in the proceedings.

The adjudicatory hearing began on October 22, 2008, but was continued several times to allow for the testimony of additional witnesses.[4] The adjudicatory hearing

[3]Abuse and neglect proceedings were instituted in 2007 after Samantha C. threatened to remove Christopher Jr. from the hospital. Christopher had been diagnosed with RSV (respiratory syncytial virus) and had near death vital signs. Christopher's doctor reported that he was underweight, had not been receiving his immunizations timely, and had rashes and redness indicating that he had not been cleaned and changed regularly. That petition also noted that, at different times, red marks and bruises had been observed on other children in the home, there had been at least one incident of domestic violence where both parents had been arrested, and the parents were suspected of using drugs.

[4]It appears that the continuances were in part the result of Samantha C. requesting approval for the employment of a pediatric orthopedic specialist to possibly rebut the opinions of the physicians who testified on behalf of the DHHR that Ryan C.'s spiral fracture was the result of child abuse.

was finally concluded in August 2009, and an order was entered on August 26, 2009. In that order, the circuit court found that there was clear and convincing evidence that Ryan C.'s spiral fracture was the result of non-accidental trauma. The circuit court concluded that Ryan C. and the other children in the home were abused. Thereafter, Samantha and Christopher C. made motions for a six-month improvement period. The DHHR objected, but the circuit court granted the motions by order entered on September 24, 2009. This appeal followed.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court has explained that "[f]or appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." In re Emily, 208 W. Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000). In addition, this Court has held:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the > reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). With these standards in mind, the issue presented in this case will be considered.

III.

DISCUSSION

The DHHR contends that the circuit court erred in granting Samantha and Christopher C. a post-adjudicatory improvement period because they failed to present evidence that they were likely to fully participate in the improvement period as required by W.Va. Code § 49-6-12 (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2009). The statute provides that a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period may be granted when:

> The respondent demonstrates, by clear and convincing evidence, that the respondent is likely to fully participate in the improvement period and the court further makes a finding, on the record, of the terms of the improvement period[.]

W.Va. Code § 49-6-12(b)(2). The DHHR argues that Samantha and Christopher C. did not satisfy this requirement because they have not identified who abused Ryan C., nor even admitted that he was abused. In other words, the DHHR reasons that Samantha and

Christopher C. could not fully participate in an improvement period when they have not even acknowledged that abuse occurred, despite uncontroverted medical evidence to the contrary.[5] We agree.

This Court has explained that "an improvement period in the context of abuse and neglect proceedings is viewed as an opportunity for the miscreant parent to modify his/her behavior so as to correct the conditions of abuse and/or neglect with which he/she has been charged." In re Emily, supra, 208 W. Va. at 334, 540 S.E.2d at 551.

Therefore,

> in order to remedy the abuse and/or neglect problem, the problem must first be acknowledged. Failure to acknowledge the existence of the problem, i.e., the truth of the basic allegation pertaining to the alleged abuse and neglect or the perpetrator of said abuse and neglect, results in making the problem untreatable and in making an improvement period an exercise in futility at the child's expense.

West Virginia Dept. of Health and Human Resources v. Doris S., 197 W. Va. 489, 498, 475 S.E.2d 865, 874 (1996).

[5]The adjudicatory order indicates that Samantha C. did present a written report from Donald Getz, M.D., to rebut the testimony David Ede, M.D., one of the doctors who testified on behalf of the DHHR. However, that report is not included in the record, and Dr. Getz was not present at the adjudicatory hearing to present testimony or be cross-examined. Further, the circuit court found that Dr. Getz failed to adequately rebut Dr. Ede's testimony that Ryan's spiral fracture could not have been caused by the scenarios reported by his mother to Ryan's doctors and CPS workers.

As discussed, neither parent in this case has acknowledged that Ryan C. was abused. Yet, it is undisputed that Ryan C. was in the care and custody of Samantha and Christopher C. when his leg was broken. According to Samantha C., she and Christopher C. were in the kitchen cooking dinner when she heard Ryan scream. She has stated that she went into the living room and discovered two-year-old Christopher, Jr., on top of Ryan. She claims that Ryan seemed fine and that she then took the kids to pick apples and Ryan was walking around and playing. After they were back home, Ryan starting screaming again. She told her husband that she thought his leg was broken and called her grandmother to come and take them to the hospital.

During the adjudicatory hearing, David Ede, M.D., Ryan's treating orthopedic surgeon, testified in response to questions from the attorney for the DHHR as follows:

> Q: And what type of an injury would cause a spiral fracture of a femur of a child of this age?
> A: Anybody of any age sustaining a spiral fracture would be from a twisting of the bone.
>
> Q: Well, what I'm saying is that there was a description given that this two-year-old fell on this child's leg and thereafter, this child walked out and picked apples for a period of time and came in. If he had had [sic] the spiral fracture from that, would that child have been able to walk?
> A: No. That's inconsistent with the pattern of fracture.

> Q: Okay. Doctor, do you have an opinion as to whether or not – if the description of how this injury occurred was a child – another child fell on top of his leg or he fell from a couch, do you have an opinion as to whether or not those descriptions would be consistent with the type of fracture that this child sustained?
> A: In my opinion it is inconsistent.
> Q: And do you have an opinion based upon the information that you have been provided as to whether or not this would likely be the result of child abuse?
>
> A: Child abuse occurs when a child is harmed as a result of an action taken on that child. What we have is a patient who has an injury that's consistent with child abuse because spiral fractures in children are automatically – almost automatically considered to be child abuse in and of themselves.
> I did not have an opportunity to interview the biological mother or anyone that was there at that time. Based on what I see and the history that seems inconsistent, this is almost a classic example of child abuse.
> Q: And a two-year-old child would not be strong enough to have caused this type of fracture of this child's leg?
> A: No, not by themselves.

Based on all the above, this Court finds that the circuit court erred when it granted Samantha and Christopher C. a post-adjudicatory improvement period under these circumstances. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children.' Syllabus Point 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 59 (1996)." Syllabus Point 1, In re: Tonjia M., 212 W. Va. 443, 573 S.E.2d 354 (2002). In other words, "'[i]n a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided.' Syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W.Va. 801, 187 S.E.2d 601 (1972)." Syllabus Point 4, State ex rel. David Allen B. v. Sommerville, 194 W. Va. 86, 459 S.E.2d 363 (1995). In this case, the granting of a post-adjudicatory improvement period to Samantha and Christopher C. was not in the best interests of Ryan C. and his siblings. Ryan C. was clearly abused and his siblings were certainly at risk of being abused.[6] Absent the parents' acknowledgment of the abuse, the requirement for granting a post-adjudicatory improvement period as set forth in W.Va. Code § 49-6-12(b)(2) was not satisfied.[7] [6]See Syllabus Point 2, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995) ("Where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994).").

[7]This Court is deeply troubled by the guardian ad litem's limited participation in this appeal. The only document filed by the guardian ad litem in this case was a short letter response asking this Court to refuse the petition for appeal and stating that the improvement period would allow the parents to be reunited with their children. The guardian ad litem had a duty to file a brief and explain his position to this Court. "We again admonish guardians ad litem that it is their responsibility to represent their clients in every stage of the abuse and/or neglect proceedings. This duty includes appearing before this Court to represent the child during oral arguments. In fact, the guardian ad litem's role to represent the child does not cease until permanent placement of the child is achieved. Syl. pt. 5, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991)." Christina L., 194 W.Va. at 454 n.7, 460 S.E.2d at 700 n.7. Given the clear evidence of abuse in this case and the history of these parents, the duties of a guardian are especially strong.

IV. CONCLUSION

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the September 24, 2009, order of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County is reversed to the extent that it granted a post-adjudicatory improvement period to Samantha and Christopher C.,[8] and this case is remanded to the circuit court with directions to terminate the post-adjudicatory improvement period and hold a disposition hearing immediately. In conducting the disposition hearing, the circuit court should be mindful of this Court's holding in Syllabus Point 3 of In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), which states,

> Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser.

The mandate of this Court shall issue contemporaneously herewith.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "In a child abuse and neglect hearing, before a court can begin to make any of the dispositional alternatives under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5, it must hold a hearing under W. Va. Code, 49-6-2, and determine 'whether such child is abused or neglected.' Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case." Syllabus point 1, State v. T.C., 172 W. Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983).

Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by Robert C., petitioner/respondent below (hereinafter referred to as "Robert C."), from an order of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County that transferred custody of his son, C.C., to the child's biological mother, Christine L. In this appeal, Robert C. contends that the circuit court did not have authority to transfer custody of the child to Christine L., and that the evidence was insufficient to support such transfer of custody. After a careful review of the briefs and record submitted on appeal, and listening to the arguments of the parties, we reverse.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The pertinent facts of this case began on April 22, 2010, when the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter referred to as "DHHR") filed an abuse and neglect petition against Robert C. and his wife Patricia C. The petition named seven children as being victims of abuse and neglect.[1] However, at the time the petition was filed, two of the children named therein, N.C. and N.C., were actually in the

[1]Robert C. and Patricia C. are the biological parents of one of the children, R.C. Robert C. is also the biological father of three of the other children, C.C., N.C. and N.C. Patricia C. is the biological mother of the three remaining children, K.M., K.M. and K.M. At the time of the abuse and neglect proceedings, the children ranged in age from four to thirteen years old.

custody of their biological mother, Christine L.[2] The allegations in the petition alleged that Robert C. intentionally wrecked his car and injured Patricia C.; that Robert C. once threatened to knock the children's teeth out with a baseball bat; that Robert C. and Patricia C. smoked marijuana and have offered the drug to K.M.; that Robert C. made inappropriate comments about K.M's. body and hugged her inappropriately; that K.M. was hospitalized due to self-inflicted injuries; and that Robert C. and Patricia C. failed to provide the children with food, clothing, supervision and housing.[3]

It appears that, after the abuse and neglect petition was filed, several hearings took place. However, the record on appeal contains only the transcript from the last hearing held on November 18, 2010. During that hearing, DHHR informed the court that it was going to dismiss the abuse and neglect allegations against Robert C. and release custody of all of the children except one, K.M. Also during that hearing, DHHR and the guardian ad litem for C.C. recommended that C.C. be placed with his biological mother, Christine L. Robert C. objected to transferring custody of C.C. to Christine L.

[2]Christine L. lived at a separate residence with N.C. and N.C. There were no abuse and neglect allegations alleged against Christine L. in the petition. She was made a party to the proceeding only because she was the biological parent of three of the children named in the petition. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-1(b) (2005) (Repl. Vol. 2009) ("The petition . . . shall be served upon both parents[.]").

[3]The petition was drafted in extremely vague and general terms.

By order entered January 3, 2011, the circuit court dismissed the abuse and neglect charges against Robert C. and released custody of all of the children except K.M.[4] The order also transferred custody of C.C. to Christine L.[5] This appeal followed.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This is an appeal from an order of the circuit court that was entered in an abuse and neglect proceeding. The standard of review that governs appeals in abuse and neglect cases is set forth in Syllabus point 1 of In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), as follows:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

[4]It appears that charges against Patricia C., as the biological mother of K.M., remained.

[5]The order additionally dismissed Christine L. as a party to the proceedings.

Accord Syl. pt. 2, In re N.A., 227 W. Va. 458, 711 S.E.2d 280 (2011). With the above principles in mind, we will address the issues at hand.

III.

DISCUSSION

The dispositive issue raised by Robert C. in this appeal is whether the circuit court had authority to transfer custody of C.C. to Christine L., in an abuse and neglect proceeding, when the allegations of abuse and neglect against him were dismissed. Before we address the merits of the issue, some background information is required regarding the status of Robert C., Christine L., and C.C. prior to the institution of the abuse and neglect proceedings.

The limited record in this case shows that Robert C. and Christine L. were previously married and appear to have resided in Florida during their marriage. Three children were born from the marriage: C.C., N.C., and N.C.[6] The couple was granted a divorce in Florida at some point prior to 2009. Additionally, the record indicates that the divorce decree awarded custody of C.C. to Robert C. and awarded custody of N.C. and N.C. to Christine L. The record further reflects that Robert C. moved to West Virginia in 2009 with his new wife, Patricia C. The record does not indicate at what point Christine L. moved to West Virginia. When the abuse and neglect proceeding was filed in 2010, C.C. was in the custody of and living with Robert C.

[6]C.C. was born on December 31, 2004. N.C. and N.C. are twins who were born on June 15, 2006.

As previously indicated in this opinion, during the abuse and neglect hearing held on November 18, 2010, DHHR informed the circuit court that the abuse and neglect petition would be dropped against Robert C. DHHR also informed the court that all of the children would be returned to the homes in which they resided prior to the petition being filed, except for C.C. and K.M.[7] DHHR informed the court that it was in the best interest of C.C. to be in the same home with his full siblings, N.C. and N.C.[8] The guardian ad litem and counsel for Christine L. also argued that it was in the best interest of C.C. to live with his full siblings. Other than the oral arguments of DHHR, the guardian ad litem and counsel for Christine L., no actual witness testimony[9] or other type of evidence was presented to the circuit court at the hearing.[10] [7]The status of K.M. is not before this Court in this appeal. K.M. was the oldest of the children, and she appears to have expressed a desire to not be returned to her home.

[8]After the abuse and neglect petition was filed, C.C. was removed from the custody of Robert C. and placed in the care of Christine L.

[9]During the hearing, Robert C. personally addressed the court in a plea for the return of C.C., but his statements were not made under oath.

[10]In the circuit court's order dismissing the petition against Robert C., it referenced to consideration being given to a report submitted by DHHR that was dated November 10, 2010. This report was not made part of the record in this appeal. Further, this report was not

Robert C., through counsel, objected to not having C.C. returned to him. Counsel pointed out to the court that the abuse and neglect charges against Robert C. had been dropped and that there was no finding that he was an unfit parent. Robert C. also informed the court that he was awarded custody of C.C. by a Florida court and that if Christine C. wished to have custody of the child, she was required to file a petition for custody modification with the family court. The circuit court rejected Robert C.'s arguments and ordered C.C. to be placed in the custody of Christine L. In this appeal, Robert C. contends that the circuit court did not have authority to modify the custody of C.C. We agree.

The disposition of children brought before a circuit court on a petition alleging abuse and neglect under W. Va. Code § 49-6-1(a) (2005) (Repl. Vol. 2009), is carefully crafted under W. Va. Code § 49-6-5 (2006) (Repl. Vol. 2009).[11] W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a) provides, in relevant part, that:

> Following a determination pursuant to [W. Va. Code § 49-6-2] wherein the court finds a child to be abused or neglected, the department shall file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the submitted into evidence during the hearing held on November 18, 2010.

[11]Because the events giving rise to the instant abuse and neglect proceeding occurred before W. Va. Code § 49-6-5 was amended, we will apply the version of the statute that was in effect a that time. Compare W. Va. Code § 49-6-5 (2006) (Repl. Vol. 2009) with W. Va. Code § 49-6-5 (2011) (Supp. 2011).

> child. . . . The court shall give precedence to dispositions in the following sequence:
> (1) Dismiss the petition;
> (2) Refer the child, the abusing parent, the battered parent or other family members to a community agency for needed assistance and dismiss the petition;
> (3) Return the child to his or her own home under supervision of the department;
> (4) Order terms of supervision calculated to assist the child and any abusing parent or battered parent or parents or custodian which prescribe the manner of supervision and care of the child and which are within the ability of any parent or parents or custodian to perform;
> (5) Upon a finding that the abusing parent or battered parent or parents are presently unwilling or unable to provide adequately for the child's needs, commit the child temporarily to the custody of the state department, a licensed private child welfare agency or a suitable person who may be appointed guardian by the court. . . .; or
> (6) Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future and, when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental, custodial and guardianship rights and responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed child welfare agency. The court may award sole custody of the child to a nonabusing battered parent.

See In re Beth Ann B., 204 W. Va. 424, 429, 513 S.E.2d 472, 477 (1998) ("[W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)] does not foreclose the ability of the parties, properly counseled, in a child abuse or neglect proceeding, to make some voluntary dispositional plan."); In re Lacey P., 189 W. Va. 580, 585 n.4, 433 S.E.2d 518, 523 n.4 (1993) ("Under W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(c), the legislature permitted the court to allow, as an alternative disposition, the parents a second chance at an improvement period not to exceed [six] months.").

This Court made quite clear in Syllabus point one of State v. T.C., 172 W. Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983) that,

> [i]n a child abuse and neglect hearing, before a court can begin to make any of the dispositional alternatives under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5, it must hold a hearing under W. Va. Code, 49-6-2, and determine "whether such child is abused or neglected." Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case.

See State v. C.N.S., 173 W. Va. 651, 656, 319 S.E.2d 775, 780 (1984) ("Once there has been a proper finding of abuse or neglect, the proceedings move into the dispositional phase, which is governed by W. Va. Code § 49-6-5.").

As shown above, before a circuit court may decide the permanent custody issue of a child in an abuse and neglect proceeding, it must make a finding that the child has been abused or neglected. In the instant proceeding, all parties agree that the circuit court did not find that C.C. was an abused or neglected child.[12] The parties agree that all allegations of abuse and neglect against Robert C. were dismissed without a finding that he abused or neglected any of the children. The circuit court explained its reasoning for transferring custody of C.C. to Christine L. as follows:

> [C.C.] shall be placed in the permanent physical custody of his mother, Christine [L.] In transferring physical custody of [C.C.] from his father to his mother, the Court has considered a number of factors, including, but not limited to, the turmoil in the [paternal] family's home that occasioned the filing of this petition, the needs of the older children, the recommendations of the DHHR and the guardian ad litem and the positive experience [C.C.] has had while living with his mother and his two younger brothers since April. Placing [C.C.] in the permanent physical custody of his mother is in [C.C's.] best interests.

While this Court appreciates the grounds cited by the circuit court for transferring the physical custody of C.C. to his mother, the circuit court simply did not have authority to make such a transfer without first finding C.C. was an abused or neglected child. To the extent that the circuit court believed that C.C. should be removed from the custody of Robert C., it could have rejected DHHR's decision to drop all allegations against Robert C. and forced the case to be litigated on the merits to determine whether C.C. was an abused or neglected child. This was not done, and, consequently, the circuit court's authority was limited to ordering C.C. to be returned to Robert C.[13] because her biological daughter, K.M., did not wish to return to her home.

[13]Insofar as we have determined that the circuit court did not have authority to transfer custody of C.C., we need not address Robert C.'s second assignment of error concerning the sufficiency of the evidence.

IV.

CONCLUSION

In view of the foregoing, the circuit court's order of January 3, 2011, transferring custody of C.C. to Christine L. is reversed.

OF WEST VIRGINIA

Workman, Chief Justice, concurring:

I concur with the majority's decision because it reaches the proper legal conclusion in that W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a) (2006) (Repl. Vol. 2009), governing abuse and neglect proceedings, precludes a transfer of custody absent a finding of abuse or neglect. While I agree with the circuit court that there were a number of factors in this case that indicated that it would be in C.C.'s best interests to be placed with his mother, the court did not have authority to order a transfer of custody without a finding of abuse or neglect.

The proper means of seeking the change of custody would be a petition for modification. It is important to note that during oral argument in this case, this Court was advised that Christine L. had filed a petition for modification in the family court seeking custody of C.C. This Court also learned that after the circuit court entered its order in the abuse and neglect case transferring custody of C.C. to Christine L., the family court entered a modification order adopting the findings and conclusions in the circuit court's order relating to the placement of C.C. in his mother's custody. However, the family court also made its ultimate decision on the requested modification contingent upon the outcome of this appeal. In that regard, the family court included a provision in its modification order stating that if the circuit court's order "is modified pursuant to appeal, the resulting Order will be considered the Order of this Court." I am troubled by this order for two reasons.

First, the modification order purports to be a final appealable order, but it clearly is not because the family court's decision was made contingent upon the outcome of this case. How could either party have filed an appeal within the 30-day time limit prescribed by law when the appeal of the circuit court's decision was still pending at that time? Neither party would have been able to ascertain whether the family court order was adverse to him or her in the time frame required for appeal. Second, and even more troubling, is the fact that the family court allowed its decision on Christina L.'s motion for modification to be dictated by the outcome of the abuse and neglect proceedings. Pursuant to W. Va. Code § 48-9-401 (2001) (Repl. Vol 2009), a decision on a motion for modification of custody requires a determination of whether there has been a substantial change in the circumstances of the child or of one or both parents and whether a modification is necessary to serve the best interests of the child, obviously a completely different standard than a finding of abuse and neglect. The allegations of abuse and neglect certainly constituted a change in circumstances, and there were several other factors that indicated that it would be in C.C.'s best interests to be placed in the custody of his mother. Therefore, regardless of the outcome of the abuse and neglect case, it seems that the circumstances probably warranted a modification of custody pursuant to W. Va. Code § 48-9-401.

However, our review in this appeal was limited to the circuit court's disposition of the abuse and neglect petition. Accordingly, for the reasons previously stated, I concur with the majority's decision in this case. However, the family court order has left these parties (and even more importantly, this child) in legal limbo.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. Per Curiam:

The appellants herein, the guardian ad litem for the minor children (hereinafter "GAL") and the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR"), jointly appeal from a February 25, 2009,[1] order from the Circuit Court of Harrison County. By that order, the circuit court dismissed the abuse and neglect case against the appellee mother, April P.[2] (hereinafter "April" or "mother"), and her boyfriend, Michael A., Sr. (hereinafter "Michael" or "boyfriend"),[3] and ordered that the children, Katelyn T. (hereinafter "Katelyn") and Joel T. (hereinafter "Joel"), be returned immediately to their mother's custody. On appeal to this Court, the GAL and the DHHR argue that the circuit court rulings were in error. They contend that the clear and convincing evidence shows that the minor children were sexually abused by the mother's boyfriend and, further, that the mother's refusal to recognize the abuse illustrates her inability to protect them. Based on the parties' arguments, the record designated for our consideration, and the pertinent authorities, we reverse the rulings made by the circuit court, and remand the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

[1]While the written order was entered February 25, 2009, the lower court announced its ruling from the bench on February 18, 2009. On that same day, the GAL filed a motion for stay with this Court, which was denied. The circuit court then entered its February 25, 2009, written order, which is the subject of this appeal.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The minor children at issue in this case are Katelyn[4] and Joel,[5] born to biological parents April and Joshua T.[6] The evidence shows that the children had resided on the mother's family's farm for the majority of their lives. During their time on the family farm, the children lived mainly with their maternal grandmother, Charlotte P. (hereinafter "grandmother" or "Charlotte"), both with and without their mother. The maternal aunt, Janet P. (hereinafter "aunt" or "Janet"), was materially involved with the children's care and upbringing and lived at her own residence, also located on the family farm. At times, the children lived in Janet's home. April lived on this family property for much of the time until June 2007 when she left the farm and moved in with her boyfriend, Michael.[7] When April moved from the family farm, the children continued to reside primarily with their grandmother, Charlotte, at her residence. The testimony before the circuit court showed that April, the mother, would take the children for weekends initially, and that this time grew to [4]Katelyn's date of birth is June 8, 2004. At the time of the filing of the underlying petition alleging abuse, Katelyn was four years old.

[5]June 30, 2005, is Joel's birth date. Joel was three years of age at the time of the filing of the abuse and neglect petition.

[6]The February 25, 2009, order by the circuit court found that Joshua T. abandoned his children and, further, adjudicated him as a neglectful parent. The lower court terminated Joshua T.'s parental rights to both infant children. The termination of Joshua T.'s parental rights was not appealed.

[7]Michael is the accused sexual abuser identified by the children. During oral argument before this Court, it was reported that the mother, April, continues to live with Michael and, further, that the couple has a newborn child together.

be alternating weeks with the children spending a week at Charlotte's home, followed by a week with April at her boyfriend's house.[8]

The grandmother and the aunt first became concerned when the children were found, on two occasions, running around naked. When questioned about the behavior, the children stated that the mother's boyfriend had told them to take their clothes off. The aunt testified that she could no longer overlook the children's behavioral oddities after an incident at the end of March 2008 when Katelyn stated that the boyfriend's "pee pee" had white "milk" squirt from it, that she had touched it, and that it was big and ugly. On May 14, 2008, the aunt, Janet, sought an emergency protective order based on the allegations set forth by Katelyn.[9] The requested relief was granted, and a final hearing was held May 27, 2008. At this final hearing, April agreed to continue the matter so that the children could undergo a [8]Janet also testified that there were times when the children were in her and the grandmother's care, and April could not be found. It appears that there were also times when the grandmother and aunt needed items, such as the children's car seats, and April could not be located to provide such items.

[9]Prior to the filing of the emergency protective order, the aunt had attempted to find help through a "hotline." She had also attempted to involve the biological father and had him sign guardianship papers expressing an interest in the aunt caring for his children. Further, a referral was made to the DHHR alleging sexual abuse on May 12, 2008. The children were interviewed on May 16, 2008, and the child protective services worker reported that, while she had a difficult time obtaining any information from the children, Katelyn did state that toys come out of Michael's "pee wee" in the bathtub, but that she did not see it. The child protective services worker contacted Ms. Tordella, a licensed social worker and counselor who had been working with the children, in late August and was informed that Ms. Tordella was not getting very far with the children, but that Joel had reported that "milk" came out of Michael's "pee bug." The child protective services worker closed her file at that point.

sexual abuse evaluation, and she further agreed that the children could continue to live with the grandmother, with care also being provided to her children by the aunt. It was determined that Margaret Tordella would perform the evaluations.[10] A hearing was held on June 6, 2008, and the emergency protective order was reaffirmed. On November 10, 2008, during a hearing regarding the emergency protective order, the parties revealed the intent to file a private abuse and neglect petition. On that date, an order was issued terminating the emergency protective order, effective at the end of the day on November 14, 2008.

On November 10, 2008, a petition was filed by the maternal grandmother and maternal aunt, alleging abuse and neglect by the mother and biological father. The DHHR sought, and was granted, emergency custody of the children on November 14, 2008. The basis of the abuse and neglect allegations was that the children had been sexually abused by the mother's boyfriend, Michael A., Sr. Specifically, it was alleged that the boyfriend had been masturbating while the children were in his care and that he placed Matchbox cars in his pants and asked the children to retrieve them. Joel described "milk" coming out of the boyfriend's "pee bug," and Katelyn described the "dog hair" around his "pee bug" and the "milk" that would squirt from it. The mother informed the aunt and grandmother that, upon expiration of the emergency protective order, when the children would be returned to her care, she planned to leave the state with them. This threat prompted the filing of the instant petition. Emergency custody was granted to the DHHR on November 17, 2008, and the children remained in the physical custody of the aunt.

An amended petition was filed on November 21, 2008, again by the aunt and grandmother, and now joined by the DHHR, and adding the mother's boyfriend, Michael, as a respondent. The petition contained the same allegations as the initial petition, with the addition that Katelyn had told Ms. Tordella, a licensed social worker and counselor, that the boyfriend had kissed her on the lips and that Joel told Ms. Tordella that the boyfriend placed cars in his own "butt" and that Joel had to retrieve them. He described the cars as being covered with "poop" when he retrieved them. Both children told Ms. Tordella that the boyfriend was mean to them, and that the boyfriend played with the Matchbox cars on his own "pee bug," and that the boyfriend's "pee bug" squirted "milk." The petition alleged that the children had been exposed to unsafe conditions, that the mother had subjected them to drug abuse, that the mother failed to provide Joel with appropriate medical care,[11] and that the mother knew or should have known that her children were being sexually abused and failed to protect them.

An adjudicatory hearing was held December 11, 2008, but had to be continued so that the children could undergo a second sexual abuse evaluation, performed by Chanin Kennedy, upon agreement of the parties. The adjudicatory hearing continued on January 22, [11]This allegation stemmed from the fact that Joel has a lazy eye for which his mother was not seeking treatment in spite of having a medical card.

2009; February 2, 2009; and February 4, 2009. During the adjudicatory hearings, two expert opinions were introduced on behalf of the petitioners. The experts, Margaret Tordella and Chanin Kennedy, both testified on behalf of the children.

Margaret Tordella began working with the children prior to the filing of the abuse and neglect petition. In performing her evaluation, Ms. Tordella interviewed the children a total of seventeen times from May 30, 2008, through December 5, 2008. The interviews, with the exception of two occasions, occurred with the presence of both children because attempts to separate them for private sessions were unsuccessful.[12] During these sessions, the children revealed instances of inappropriate sexual behavior by Michael, the mother's boyfriend. At the June 10, 2008, session, Joel referred to a matchbox car that he saw on Ms. Tordella's desk. He offered that Michael put cars in Michael's "butt" and would have Joel retrieve them. Joel stated that they would have "poop" on them when they came out. On July 18, 2008, Joel disclosed to Ms. Tordella that Michael played with cars on his "pee-bug" and that "milk" then came out of Michael's "pee-bug." Katelyn was present and agreed that this occurred. Joel was able to differentiate between the yellow urine that comes out of his own penis as being different from the white "milk" that he saw coming out of Michael's "pee-bug." At a subsequent session, the children again referred to Michael playing in his "butt" and on his "pee-bug" with Joel's cars. Further, Katelyn stated that she saw hair on Michael's "pee-bug." On October 31, 2008, the children again discussed the white "milk" that comes out of Michael's "pee-bug." According to Ms. Tordella, the children indicated that all of these incidents occurred at Michael's home. While there was testimony that the mother, April, was home during these occurrences, there was no indication that she was in the room during any of the events in question. During her testimony at the adjudicatory hearing, Ms. Tordella opined that the children's sexual knowledge was not appropriate for their ages. Importantly, she found the children's reporting to be consistent and credible, and further opined that she did not feel that the children had been coached.

Chanin Kennedy is a licensed psychologist who performed the sexual abuse evaluation after the institution of the abuse and neglect petition. She met with the children individually on January 8, 13, and 15, 2009. Even though she was able to separate the children for their sessions, Ms. Kennedy agreed that the children were resistant to being isolated from each other. Ms. Kennedy also met with the mother, April, on January 13, 2009, and with the aunt, Janet, on January 14, 2009. According to Ms. Kennedy's testimony during the adjudicatory hearings, both children were difficult to interview and both exhibited age-inappropriate sexualized behavior. During one of the sessions, Katelyn revealed that her mother's boyfriend, Michael, showed his "pee pee" to her and to her brother, and that it squirted "milk." In describing how his "pee pee" squirted "milk," Katelyn stated that Michael "shaked it himself with his hand." Joel, during his individual sessions with Ms. Kennedy, disclosed that Michael's "pee pee" squirts "milk" and that his sister, Katelyn, had touched Michael on his "pee pee." Ms. Kennedy reported that there was no evidence presented by the children that the mother knew about any of the children's stories or that she was present in the room when any of the actions occurred. Based upon her evaluation, Ms. Kennedy also reported that she does not feel that the children are vulnerable to coaching by others and their reporting was credible. Ultimately, Ms. Kennedy determined that the children exhibited age-inappropriate sexual behavior and, further, that the children had, in fact, been sexually abused.

Ms. Kennedy also testified about her sessions with the mother and the aunt. As a result of those meetings, Ms. Kennedy was left with the impression that the mother did not believe that anything inappropriate had occurred. She further testified that April stated she was aware of the abuse allegations prior to the filing of the abuse and neglect petition. While April stated that she would leave Michael if a court order required her to do so, she also presented many excuses as to why she could not leave him. Ms. Kennedy found that the mother presented a high risk factor for returning to Michael even if ordered to separate for the benefit of the children. Further, Ms. Kennedy found that the aunt, Janet, sincerely was concerned for the health and welfare of the children and that she had no other motive for her allegations.

The children's mother, April, also testified at the adjudicatory hearings. She stated that she does not believe that her boyfriend, Michael, did anything sexually inappropriate with the children. To explain her children's knowledge of age-inappropriate sexual acts, she offered that perhaps they had walked in on her boyfriend's adult son while he was watching cartoons with sexual content. April also suggested that Katelyn had walked in on Michael while he was urinating in the bathroom. Further, she testified that they had no matchbox-style cars in the home and that the only cars in the home were much larger than a matchbox car; thus, she did not believe that her son, Joel, had created the story of the cars being placed in Michael's rectum on his own but, rather, that someone had provided him such information. However, all of these possible explanations for the children's exposure to sexual knowledge were discounted and contradicted by the testimony of Michael's adult son, who also lives in the home. Michael's son testified that the cartoons he watched contained scenes of naked breasts, but no masturbatory scenes. Further, he testified that the family members always made it a practice to lock the bathroom door behind them. Most significantly, he testified that the house contained many matchbox-size cars, describing a car size that directly contradicted the children's mother's testimony. He also stated that Joel has a carrying case that holds at least thirty-two of the small matchbox-size cars.

The lower court issued its adjudicatory order orally on February 18, 2009,[13] followed by its written order of February 25, 2009, which order is the subject of this appeal. In its order, the lower court found that sexual abuse had not been shown by clear and convincing evidence. The order states that the children have told inconsistent statements to five individuals and, therefore, are not credible. Further, the circuit judge discounted the findings of Ms. Tordella because she interviewed the children together instead of separately,[14] as would be normal protocol. Thus, the order reasoned that the children were already tainted by the time they met with Ms. Kennedy, and her opinions were discounted for that reason. The order also took issue with the legal maneuverings of the parties and suggested that the aunt and grandmother had used and manipulated the system.[15] Therefore, the lower court dismissed the case against the mother and the boyfriend and ordered that the children be returned to their mother that same afternoon. The appeal by the GAL and the DHHR is now before this Court.

This case is before this Court on appeal from the circuit court's order dismissing the abuse and neglect petition and finding a lack of clear and convincing evidence [14]Ms. Kennedy also expressed concern with Ms. Tordella's interview techniques. Ms. Tordella explained that the children were impossible to separate and would cry and cling to one another. Ms. Kennedy likewise found the children to be very difficult to interview and had to schedule additional sessions with them above and beyond the normal practice. Despite Ms. Kennedy's trepidation with Ms. Tordella's tactics, she ultimately arrived at the same conclusions that the children had been sexually abused, were credible, had experienced the instances firsthand, possessed sexual knowledge inappropriate for their ages, and did not exhibit signs of being coached.

[15]In addition to the emergency protective order and the private abuse and neglect proceeding, the aunt had also talked the biological father into filing a motion for custody so that she could intervene in the matter as she did not have standing on her own to file such an action. The lower court found that the aunt had been involved in five different court proceedings in an attempt to gain custody of the children.

of sexual abuse of the minor children. This Court has previously explained that, in the realm of an abuse and neglect case,

> [a]lthough conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. pt. 1, In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). Mindful of the applicable standards, we proceed to consider the parties' arguments.

III.

DISCUSSION

Before this Court, the GAL and the DHHR filed a joint petition for appeal asserting the following three assignments of error: (1) the lower court erred in finding a lack of clear and convincing evidence of sexual abuse, (2) the circuit court erred in holding the legal maneuverings of the parties against the children and failing to rule in the best interests of the children,[16] and (3) the lower tribunal erred in dismissing the case against the mother because she failed to acknowledge that her boyfriend sexually abused her children and, therefore, failed to protect them. In response, April, the mother, argues that the rulings of the circuit court should be affirmed because there was no evidence that she abused or neglected her children or that she failed to protect them from abuse. She asserts that there was no evidence that her boyfriend sexually abused her children. Further, she argues that there was no evidence that she had knowledge of allegations of child abuse by her boyfriend or that she failed to protect her children as a result of having any such information.

Finding it dispositive of this case, we will first address the GAL and DHHR's argument that there existed clear and convincing evidence that the children were sexually abused. In that regard, W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(a) (2007) (Repl. Vol. 2009) defines an "[a]bused child" as a "child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by . . . [s]exual need not address this issue of the lower court's perception of the parties' legal maneuverings. However, we note our concern that the parties' behavior and the lower court's dislike for the same was elevated above a concern for the well-being of the children. See Syl. pt. 3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) ("[T]he primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children."). The circuit court found that the aunt "has been involved in five attempts to obtain custody of the children" and that "in this case the system was being used and manipulated and that needs to stop." While we agree that manipulation of the legal system is inefficient and improper, we also note that our independent review of the record, as well as the experts' opinions in this case, shows a family member who was sincerely and genuinely concerned about the well-being of these children and was clearly desperate to explore any avenue that may provide assistance to the children. As such, we decline to elevate any disdain for the procedural improprieties over our mandate to hold the welfare of the children as the polar star by which this Court will be guided.

abuse or sexual exploitation[.]" Pertinent to the facts of the present case, the term "sexual abuse" includes

> [a]ny conduct whereby a parent, guardian or custodian displays his or her sex organs to a child, or procures another person to display his or her sex organs to a child, for the purpose of gratifying the sexual desire of the parent, guardian or custodian, of the person making such display, or of the child, or for the purpose of affronting or alarming the child.

W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(l)(C). In examining the evidence in this case, we are mindful that "[t]he findings [of abuse or neglect, if applicable] must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing proof." W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) (2006) (Repl. Vol. 2009). We are guided by the proposition that

> "'W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Human Services], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove "conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof." . . . . Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).' Syllabus Point 1, West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Peggy F., 184 W. Va. 60, 399 S.E.2d 460 (1990)." Syllabus Point 1, In re Beth, 192 W. Va. 656, 453 S.E.2d 639 (1994).

Syl. pt. 3, in part, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995). While the statute requires the DHHR to prove the conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition by clear and convincing proof, "[t]he statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the [DHHR] is obligated to meet this burden." Syl. pt. 1, in part, In the Interest of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).

In the present case, the circuit court stated as follows:

> This Court realizes its duty to protect the children, but parents also have rights and allegations of sexual abuse have serious and lifelong consequences to those who are so accused. However, the petitioners have the burden of proof by clear and convincing evidence that these children have been abused or neglected at the time the petition was filed and they have failed to meet that burden not only with respect to these allegations, but also all other allegations set forth in the Petition and Amended Petition including the allegations that the mother has a substance abuse problem or that Michael . . . or April . . . physically abused the children.

The DHHR submitted testimony from two mental health experts to support its claims of sexual abuse. The respondent mother and the mother's boyfriend presented no contrary expert evidence. Thus, to find that no clear and convincing evidence existed, the circuit court disregarded the testimony of two mental health experts, which was the only expert testimony in the case. In regard to the first expert, Margaret Tordella, the circuit court found that "Tordella's interviewing of the children violated standard protocol of evaluation of children suspected of sexual abuse in that she interviewed them together." Further, the lower court stated as follows:

> The Court finds that the interview techniques used by Tordella regarding the interviewing [of] the children together; the fact that on numerous occasions she got no information from the children; the fact that the children would want to mirror and do what the other was doing in the session; the lack and [sic] consistency in what the children told her in sixteen joint sessions; the fact that nothing was disclosed by Katelyn on the one occasion in which she was alone with her and that was the only occasion that her mother brought her to Tordella's office; and that Tordella was trying to do both an evaluation and therapy. Therefore, her opinion in this case as to whether or not these children were sexually abused is not worthy of any belief.

In reviewing the testimony of the second expert, Chanin Kennedy, the lower court found that "Kennedy expressed concern over Tordella's deviation from standard protocol in seeing the children together; in taking six months to do forensic interviews; and if Tordella was doing both evaluations and therapy, it was inappropriate. Kennedy did not get to see these children until after they were contaminated by Tordella." Thus, the circuit court disregarded the findings made by Ms. Kennedy as being tainted due to the previous inappropriate interview techniques employed by Ms. Tordella.

However, we determine this finding by the circuit court to be misguided. In examining the testimony adduced at the adjudicatory hearing, it is significant that the only expert testimony in this case was submitted by the DHHR. In her testimony, the following information was elicited from Ms. Tordella:

> Q. Okay. And did you meet with the children together or separately?
> A. I met with the children together. They would not separate. I found the children to be very shy and clingy to one another. They would not separate. They would, you know, at the very first -- well, this was the very first session because Janet had to be in the room for the other one to provide some of the information, and they would not separate. They would not even come down the hallway with me alone, so she had to walk down the hallway, and then made the excuse she needed to use the restroom so she could leave.
> . . . .

Q. -- is it fair to say that in all the sessions you saw the children together?

A. In most of all the sessions. Towards the end after Katie started in school and she was more willing to separate, I saw her, I think, twice without Joel.

Q. Let me ask you, these children at the outset when you started seeing them were three and four years old?

A. Yes.

Q. Is their sexual knowledge appropriate for their age?

A. No, it's not.

. . . .

Q. Have they been consistent in the information that they have provided to you in your opinion?

A. Yes, they have. I mean they began telling me that -- telling me bits and pieces at the very beginning of, you know, when I first started seeing them and they've been consistent throughout --

Q. Okay.

A. -- telling me more.

. . . .

A. . . . I also attempted, too, to see the children separately. In the very beginning there was no way. I had tried to bring back, you know, had said, well, this will be Katie's turn, and then Joel will have a turn. They cried and carried on and would not agree to that. Now later on, I did see Katie twice alone. One time was because Joel was asleep and the other time was because Joel was uncooperative. But I think part of what had happened is Katie had started going to school, and so she was more used to separating from Joel.

Q. Let me ask you, given the fact that the children saw you jointly, and that the children heard what each other was saying, do you believe that in anyway tainted the statements you were receiving from the children?

A. No, because there was collaboration from the children when they told me that. You know, one would make a statement and another one would add to it.

Q. Did they appear to be spontaneous statements or rehearsed?

A. They were spontaneous because at times they took me by surprise when they said them.

. . . .

Q. So would it be safe to say that you believe you would not have this little bit of disclosure had you tried to separate the siblings?

A. I don't believe they would've. I would've -- I think they would've seen me as one of the mean people and would not have talked to me.

Q. Do you believe the children were credible in what they reported?

A. I believe they were credible because they were consistent in reporting this. I mean there were gaps in my seeing them because of -- Friday was the best day to see the children because that was on a day that Katie was in school so things were calmer and stuff, and it was always later in the afternoon for convenience to the family. And there were times -- a number of times where I had to cancel because I got called out on a crisis. The children through the fall seemed to be -- have, you know, pink -- they had pinkeye, ear infections, colds, so they had been through a lot. There were a number of gaps yet they would come back and be consistent in telling me what they --

Q. Based upon --

A. -- you know, the same information.

Q. -- your previous experience working with other children, you had testified earlier you do not believe the children were coached?

A. No. You know, the standard is that if the child is able to tell you three times then it's a believable statement. I asked them in different ways. We would, you know, there were times, you know, usually if a child is coached, the first thing they tell you when they walk in -- and especially children this young age, they would blurt everything out because they would remember. We would be in there playing. We would be in the room for a period of time having played and talked and done different things, and they would come out with this information. You know, and it appeared that it was information that they were remembering or responding to.

Further, on cross-examination, Ms. Tordella recognized that she violated the standard protocol in interview techniques, but explained that "my preference usually is to interview children alone. I could not get these children to separate."

Significantly, the second expert, Chanin Kennedy, directly addressed and rebutted the circuit court's concerns in her testimony. The relevant portions of her statements made during the adjudicatory hearing are as follows:

Q. Was it correct that these two children were very hard to separate?

A. They were hard to separate from each other and they were hard to separate from their maternal grandmother and aunt who brought them to the session. It's standard protocol to interview the children individually without other adults present. And just getting them to cooperate in general was very difficult. Getting them to sit at the chairs. Sit at the table. Be directed to activities we were working on. All of those things were very difficult.

Q. But you interviewed them separately?

A. Correct.

Q. Did you believe from your sessions with the children that they had been coached?

A. No. There was no evidence based on the information that's been provided to me that the children have been coached. Their statements are spontaneous. They've given information that have [sic] not -- have [sic] not been previously disclosed or known to their grandmother, to Janet, or to any other party, including Peggy Tordella.

Q. Now you're aware of the interviews with Peggy Tordella, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Have you seen the reports from Peggy Tordella?

A. Yes.

Q. Obviously there's a concern that Ms. Tordella interviewed both children together?

A. Yes.

Q. Could that have changed -- tainted what the children disclosed to you?

A. It certainly complicates issues in the sense that the children were interviewed together. And one disclosure from one child could potentially contaminate the other child, and so it makes it more difficult to be able to say with any kind of certainty whether both children experienced this or one did and heard the other talking about it.

I think what has helped me have a better understanding of the children's perspective is that Katie made a disclosure to me that was not made to Peggy Tordella, to her grandmother, or to her aunt, and is information that a four-year old child could not just spontaneously make up. It would be information that would had -- had to have been observed and that's the shaking the penis to make milk come out statement.

Q. Okay. So she said he shook the penis to make the milk come out?

A. "His pee-pee squirts milk. He shaked it himself with his hands and milk squirted out."

Q. Okay. Did Joel make any independent disclosures that he had not made previously?

A. Joel's statements were more consistent with what he had talked about previously with Peggy, the milk squirting out. Although Peggy documents that that was a disclosure that Joel had made first to my recollection in her sessions and that Katie -- that Katie had touched Mike's pee-bug.

Q. . . . do you believe that the children have inappropriate sexual knowledge?

A. Yes.

. . . .

Q. Do you believe, in looking at all the information that you have, that these children have been consistent?

A. With the core details, the children have been consistent regarding inappropriate sexual contact with their mother's boyfriend, Mike. I think due to a lot of barriers the children haven't been able to provide the level of peripheral, the details around the core details, that I would like to see. I think their age is a barrier. I think the fact that they had previously been evaluated is a barrier. I think these are kids that have a very unstructured kind of day with grandma and it's very difficult to get them used to a more structured forensic interview. I think those have all been barriers to gain additional information.

Q. Do you believe that there's consistency from their disclosures to Peggy Tordella up until the time of their disclosures to you?

A. Your question is are the details consistent between myself and Peggy?

Q. Yes.

A. Yes, they appear to be.

Q. Now given that Ms. Tordella interviewed the children together, do the disclosures made to Ms. Tordella lack credibility as far as you're concerned?

A. Not -- they don't lack credibility. They certainly make it more difficult to fully assess the children because the children were interviewed together, and as I've stated before, an interview in front of another child questions whether both children experienced this or just one.

It's my understanding that the children had given to their grandmother and to their aunt some spontaneous disclosures before they had ever met Peggy, suggesting that both children had witnessed and or experienced some level of inappropriate sexual contact with Mike. Specifically that he -- Mike had told them to get naked with him. Joel had said that Katie had touched Mike's pee-pee. Katie had said that white milk had come out of Mike's pee-pee. And so these were statements that were made prior to contact with Peggy, and certainly consistent with information they gave me.

Q. After conducting all of your interviews, were you able to come to any conclusions?

A. The children are exhibiting sexualized behaviors and knowledge that are not age and or developmentally appropriate. They're exhibiting emotional and behavioral characteristics that are often seen in sexually abused children. The children I have -- I believe are having difficulty articulating what they've observed, what they've -- what has happened to them because of their young age.

I think I have identified concerns regarding their mother's tendency not to respond to the allegations. When I spoke to April she had a plan to stay -- stay with Mike. She had -- she's pregnant with Mike's baby. She didn't have a plan to separate. I asked her if the court ordered her or required her to separate would she be able to do that? And she was really vague about how she would do that. Very inconsistent about whether she would really be willing to follow through with that.

The children, I think, are experiencing some adjustment related problems as far as poor boundaries with others, lacking trust of others, being withdrawn, some social skills deficits that I believe could be worked on. And so overall, that would be my diagnostic impressions.

Further, on cross-examination, Ms. Kennedy testified as follows:

Q. Given all of those criteria, and I think you said before there was eight total, all of those criteria, do you believe that the children's reporting is credible?

A. I've diagnosed them as sexually abused children and I think that they demonstrated a level of credibility given the barriers that we have, yes.

Thus, both experts squarely addressed and refuted the circuit court's basis for disregarding their opinions, that being the failure of the first expert to follow the standard protocol in interviewing these children. While we do not condone nor view lightly such a failure to follow the normal procedure, we recognize that this Court encountered a similar situation, involving the same mental health practitioner, in a previous case. In the case of In re: Tonjia M., 212 W. Va. 443, 573 S.E.2d 354 (2002) (per curiam), this Court affirmed the lower court's termination of the father's parental rights. In that case, Ms. Tordella was involved in a sexual abuse case wherein her interview techniques with the child were called into question by a subsequent expert. However, in the Tonjia M. case, unlike the present case, the second expert could not confirm Ms. Tordella's opinion and, rather, found that she could neither confirm nor deny that sexual abuse had occurred. The lower court in Tonjia M. recessed the proceedings to have a third mental health expert, Chanin Kennedy, who happens to be the second expert in the case currently before this Court, perform an independent evaluation. Ms. Kennedy, in the Tonjia M. case, found that the child exhibited sexual behaviors inconsistent with other children in her age group. Based on this testimony, the lower court found that Tonjia M. was a victim of sexual abuse and terminated the parental rights of her father. The termination was affirmed on appeal to this Court, based, in part, on the opinion of Ms. Tordella and the two other experts in the case. While recognizing the inadequacies in Ms. Tordella's interview tactics in this case, this Court, like the Court in Tonjia M., will rely on her opinion due, in large part, to her full and adequate explanation as to her reasons for deviating from standard protocol. Further, the subsequent explanation by Ms. Kennedy, while recognizing the faults with Ms. Tordella's interview styles, fully explained the impact of Ms. Tordella's actions. Ms. Kennedy further elaborated on her ultimate opinion in the case, which was similar in all significant respects to Ms. Tordella's, despite any procedural failures by Ms. Tordella.

Therefore, we find it was clear error for the circuit court to disregard the only expert evidence in the case. Both experts addressed the deviation in the interview techniques employed by Ms. Tordella, and, while Ms. Kennedy did not agree with the methodology, both opined that it did not alter their final opinions in the matter. Not only did both experts agree that the interview techniques did not change the outcome in this case, but both experts also found that these children were credible reporters, were consistent with their disclosures over time, and did not raise any suspicions that they had been coached. Importantly, Ms. Kennedy, although not in agreement with Ms. Tordella's interview techniques, found that it did not taint her examination of the children. The testimony of two independent mental health professionals, who both reached the conclusion that the children were sexually abused by the boyfriend engaging in self gratification, was clear and convincing evidence that abuse has occurred.

In making this determination, we recognize that both experts stated that the children reported that their mother was not present in the room when these instances took place. Acknowledging that the statute requires that "[t]he findings [of abuse or neglect, if applicable] must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing proof[,]" W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c), the lower court found that "April . . . was not present when any of the alleged events happened in Mike's house in his living room." Further, the lower court found that > [a]t the time of the filing of this petition, the children had not been in . . . Michael['s] . . . residence with their mother for the last six months and there is no indication that the mother, April . . . had sufficient information to know, or should have known, that these two children had any in [sic] appropriate sexual knowledge or were sexually abused by anyone.

Therefore, the lower court found, and April argues, that she could not have failed to protect her children because they were never in her care after she became aware of the sexual abuse allegations against her boyfriend. We find this argument to be without merit.

The present case has not developed to the point of necessitating a determination of the appropriateness of terminating the mother's parental rights; however, we find guidance from the applicable case law regarding a parent's nonparticipation in alleged abuse and the effect on termination of rights. This Court, in Syllabus point 5 of West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 197 W. Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996), stated as follows:

> "Termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent's version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing evidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence." Syl. Pt. 2, In re Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991).

Moreover, we have counseled that > "[i]mplicit in the definition of an abused child under West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 (1995) is the child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by a parent or guardian who fails to cooperate in identifying the perpetrator of abuse, rather choosing to remain silent." Syllabus Point 1, W. Va. Dept. of Health & Human Resources v. Doris S., 197 W. Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996).

Syl. pt. 2, In re Harley C., 203 W. Va. 594, 509 S.E.2d 875 (1998). In the Harley C. case, this Court recognized that the applicable statute defining an abused child to include one whose parent "knowingly" allows another person to commit abuse does not require that a parent actually be present at the time the abuse occurs, but, rather, that the parent was presented with sufficient facts from which he or she could have and should have recognized that abuse has occurred.

While the facts as presented at the time of the filing of the petition are paramount, this Court has recognized that evidence of a parent's progress, or lack thereof, during the pre-adjudication improvement period in making a determination of whether the subject child is an abused and/or neglected child is a proper consideration when it relates back to conditions that existed at the time of the filing of the abuse and/or neglect petition, and that were alleged in such petition. See generally State v. Julie G., 201 W. Va. 764, 500 S.E.2d 877 (1994). Significantly, termination of parental rights requires a specific and independent finding of fact or conclusion of law that the child was abused or that the child would be at risk of being abused if returned to that parent's custody. See generally In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692.

In the present case, the mother was told by the aunt, the grandmother, and two mental health professionals of the children's disclosures of sexual abuse. While the timing of such disclosures to the mother is in question, Ms. Kennedy was quite clear in her testimony that April knew of the allegations, by her own admission, prior to the filing of the abuse and neglect petition.[17] Yet, April continued to live with the alleged perpetrator and believed him when he said he did not abuse the children. Her failure to acknowledge the facts, even when confronted by mental health experts and their opinions that the children had been sexually abused, shows her inability to protect the children from such behavior. In fact, the mother fashioned stories to try to explain away the inappropriate sexual information known by her children, even to the extent of lying about whether her son possessed any cars the size of matchbox cars.[18] The interview by Chanin Kennedy showed April to be at high risk of returning to a relationship with Michael.[19] Even in the face of serious allegations by [18]The mother testified that her son did not own any cars of such size. However, her boyfriend's adult son, who also lived in the home, testified to the presence of cases of cars that are of the same size as Matchbox cars.

[19]During her testimony, Ms. Kennedy addressed the situation as follows:

> Q. Okay. Given the history of the children disclosing first to grandma, to the aunt, the process with Peggy Tordella, the process with you, do you have concerns in regards to April['s] . . . failing to protect these children?
> A. Yes.
> Q. Could you explain that?
> A. I think that -- and April and I discussed this directly. There's a lot of information to suggest these kids have been exposed to sexual behavior. They're reporting sexual contact with Mike, her boyfriend. I told her that there's never a case where someone can walk up to her and say 100 percent I know this happened. I witnessed it. It's there. But you have to weigh the risk to your children and listen to what your children are saying.

> The fact that she has not taken further steps to protect the kids, that she has her children, which were supported by all of the experts in the case, April disregarded the possibility that the allegations were true and has failed to take any actions to extricate herself from a man who had abused her children. Significantly, she remains with this man, and they have a newborn child together.[20] Because April clearly knew of the sexual abuse allegations prior to the filing of the abuse and neglect petition and because she has failed to take any steps, even to the present, to absent herself from a man whom all experts agree committed acts of sexual abuse against her children, it was error for the circuit court to dismiss the petition against her.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the February 25, 2009, order by the Circuit Court of Harrison County is reversed to the extent that it failed to find clear and convincing evidence that sexual abuse of the minor children had occurred. Accordingly, this case is remanded to the circuit court for entry of an order adjudicating Katelyn and Joel as abused children based upon the sexual abuse perpetrated upon them by the boyfriend, Michael, and based upon the failure of the mother, April, to acknowledge that such abuse had occurred and her failure to take any actions to protect the children. This case is remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.[21]

The mandate of this Court shall issue contemporaneously herewith.

Reversed and Remanded.

[21]Recognizing the amount of time between the lower court's order and the finalization of the appeal process before this Court, we remind the parties that the remand proceedings should be disposed of forthwith. "Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security." Syl. pt. 1, in part, In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). Further evidencing the priority placed on cases involving abused and neglected children, this Court has also stated that "matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible." Syl. pt. 5, in part, id. Prompt resolution in such cases attempts to protect children from the turmoil associated with the lack of stability in their surroundings and in their caretakers. See Syl. pt. 3, in part, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991) ("It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians.").

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT
1. “A writ of prohibition will not issue to prevent a simple abuse of

2. “In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight." Starcher J.:

Appellant appeals from an order entered by the circuit court of Jefferson County denying her petition for a writ of prohibition. The appellant claims in her petition that a family court judge exceeded the jurisdiction of the family court by issuing a domestic violence protective order upon a petition filed by a minor. For the reasons set forth below, we affirm the dismissal of appellant's petition.

I.

Facts & Background

In the early morning hours of December 31, 2004, Richard B.[1] filed a domestic violence petition against his mother, Katherine B. T., in the magistrate court of Jefferson County, West Virginia. In the petition Richard B. claims that in the late hours of December 30, 2004, in Charles Town, West Virginia, "My mom provoked me and came after me and choked me. She also punched me in the face."

At the time of the filing of the petition Richard B. was a minor – fifteen years old. Also, at the time of the filing of the petition Richard B. was accompanied by his sister, Jennifer M., a twenty-seven year old married woman who is the mother of two children. Jennifer M., however, was not named in the petition as next friend.

After reviewing the petition, the magistrate entered an emergency protective order and placed Richard B. in the custody of his sister, Jennifer M., who lived in nearby Maryland.[2] Subsequent to the hearing, the magistrate by telephone and by FAX reported the incident to the Department of Health and Human Resources ("the DHHR").[3]

On January 11, 2005, the family court of Jefferson County, West Virginia, conducted a final hearing on the petition. At the beginning of the hearing the court recognized the petitioner's sister, Jennifer M., as next friend and treated her as such by allowing her to remain in the hearing as a party while other witnesses were segregated. The minor petitioner was represented by counsel, Robert D. Aitcheson, and the respondent Katherine B. T. (petitioner on appeal) appeared pro se.

After hearing evidence from both the minor son and the respondent mother, the family court issued a 180-day protective order[4] and granted temporary custody to Richard B.'s sister, Jennifer M. The family court judge then, at the request of Jennifer M., granted permission to place Richard B. in the physical custody of Randall W., a family friend, who also was present and who testified at the hearing.[5] Randall W. is also a resident of Maryland.

PERMISSIVE RELIEF:

The following items initialed by the family law master [family court judge] are further ORDERED:

5. ✓ Temporary custody of (list names of children, if any) Richard [B.] is awarded to (check one if granted) G Petitioner G Respondent. his sister Jennifer [M.]. She may place him with Randall [W.], a family friend.

On January 13, 2005, the respondent mother appealed the order of the family court to the circuit court, claiming that false statements were made against her by her son and daughter. The circuit court conducted a hearing on the appeal on January 25, 2005, and reviewed the record of the family court. The circuit court affirmed the family court's protective order on January 25, 2005. The respondent mother, Katherine B. T., immediately filed a petition in the family court to modify the protective order. No specific relief was requested in the petition.

On February 3, 2005, the minor son, Richard B., by counsel filed a petition for contempt against his mother, Katherine B. T., alleging that his mother violated the protective order by making excessive phone calls to him. On February 8, 2005, the respondent mother, Katherine B. T., filed a second petition in the family court to modify the protective order, this time seeking visitation with Richard B. On the same day, the family court considered the son's petition for contempt, and found the respondent mother, Katherine B. T., in contempt.

The family court also considered the mother's motion to modify the protective order, and issued a modified protective order which permitted the petitioner, Richard B., to spend time with his mother, Katherine B. T., as "he [Richard B.] desires."

On March 9, 2005, the respondent mother, Katherine B. T., for the first time, appeared by counsel, by filing a motion in the family court to dismiss the original petition, or in the alternative, that the court enter an order placing the custody of Richard B. with an appropriate adult in West Virginia. On April 11, 2005, Richard B. filed a motion for drug testing of his mother, Katherine B. T. By order dated April 12, 2005, the family court denied the mother's motion to dismiss and the son's motion for drug testing.

On April 13, 2005, Katherine B. T., the respondent below and appellant in the instant case, filed a petition for a writ of prohibition in the circuit court against Sally G. Jackson, Judge of the Family Court, claiming, among other things, that the family court exceeded its legitimate powers by granting relief to the minor, Richard B., in the underlying case. The circuit court considered the petition for a writ of prohibition at a hearing on June 29, 2005, and entered an order denying the petition. It is from this order that the petitioner, Katherine B. T., appeals.

We first turn our attention to the standard of review to be applied in the instant case. We held in Syllabus point 2 of State ex rel. Peacher v. Sencindiver, 160 W.Va. 314, 233 S.E.2d 425 (1977) that:

> A writ of prohibition will not issue to prevent a simple abuse of discretion by a trial court. It will only issue where the trial court has no jurisdiction or having such jurisdiction exceeds its legitimate powers. W.Va. Code, 53-1-1.

Furthermore, we held in Syllabus Point 4 of State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W.Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996) that:

> In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight.

Finally, we held in Syllabus Point 1 of Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W.Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995) that:

Where the issue on appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review.

We consider these principles applicable to the instant case.

III.

Discussion

We begin our discussion by noting that since the protective order in the underlying domestic violence case expired by its own terms and by operation of law[6] on July 10, 2005, it would appear that the instant case is moot. The petition for appeal was received by this Court on October 31, 2005, nearly three months after the expiration of the underlying domestic violence protective order issued by the family court.

Complicating our consideration of the instant case is the fact that in oral argument we learned that on July 7, 2005, three days before the expiration of the underlying domestic violence protective order, Richard B., by his next friend, Randall W., filed a new and separate petition in the family court of Jefferson County against the minor's mother, Katherine B. T., requesting that emergency and permanent custody be placed in Randall W.

We further learned that on July 8, 2005, the family court entered an order granting

[7]We take judicial notice of a July 8, 2005, order in Jefferson County Civil Action No. 05-D-210, in which custody of Richard B. was granted to Randall W. after the court concluded that Randall W. was fit to have custody.

In the July 8, 2005, order the family court stated:
This Court has previously found that . . . C. Randall [W.] is fit to have custody of the child . . ..
[8]We take judicial notice of the June 13, 2006 hearing order in Jefferson County Civil Action No. 05-D-210 in which the agreement of the parties was memorialized. The order was entered on October 16, 2006. The following is a portion of the order:
1. Randall [W.] and Katherine [B.T.] shall have shared custody of Richard [B.], who shall live primarily with Randall [W.] in Hagerstown, Maryland.
2. Katherine [B. T]. shall have custodial time with the minor child for a minimum of three days per week or as she & child otherwise agree. Child is over 14 yrs & has the right to determine a custodial schedule.
emergency temporary custody to Randall W. until further order of the court.[7] This order was in effect at the time of the oral argument in the instant case.
We have also learned since oral argument, and take judicial notice thereof, that a final hearing was conducted in the aforesaid pending custody case in the family court of Jefferson County on June 13, 2006. At the hearing the parties reported to the family court that the parties had reached an agreed settlement regarding the custody of Richard B. Additionally, we note that a guardian ad litem had been appointed for Richard B. in the custody case and that the guardian ad litem participated in the June 13 hearing.
The agreed settlement announced by the parties to the court at the June 13, 2006 custody hearing was reduced to writing and incorporated into a final order[8] which, in part, granted shared custody to Randall W. and Katherine B. T. The order also provides that
Katherine B. T. shall have custodial time with Richard B. for a minimum of three days per week, or as she and the child otherwise agree. The order of the family court was entered on October 16, 2006, after the oral argument in the instant case.
The appellant encourages this Court to consider the issues in this case notwithstanding that the domestic violence order in issue has expired. Appellant cites to Syllabus Point 1 of Israel by Israel v. West Virginia Secondary Schools Activities Commission, 182 W.Va. 454, 388 S.E.2d 480 (1989) for the proposition that this Court may consider issues that are technically moot.
Three factors to be considered in deciding whether to address technically moot issues are as follows: first, the court will determine whether sufficient collateral consequences will result from determination of the questions presented so as to justify relief; second, while technically moot in the immediate context, questions of great public interest may nevertheless be addressed for the future guidance of the bar and of the public; and third, issues which may be repeatedly presented to the trial court, yet escape review at the appellate level because of their fleeting and determinate nature, may appropriately be decided.

Syllabus Point 1 of Israel, supra.

In examining whether the instant case satisfies the three factors of Israel, supra, we first consider potential collateral consequences. If minor children were allowed to file domestic violence petitions without the necessity of doing so by a next friend or having a guardian ad litem appointed, it would be reasonable to expect to some children to use the domestic violence laws to escape legitimate parental supervision. We believe this potentiality alone satisfies the first prong of Israel, supra.

Secondly, it is axiomatic that taking minor children from under parental supervision is a matter of sufficient public interest. We also believe that the public interest will be served by providing guidance regarding this matter to the public, the bar and the court system. The issue clearly involves a vital public function – serving the best interest of our minor children. The second prong of Israel, supra, is therefore satisfied.

Finally, because domestic violence protective orders are, by statute, limited in duration, it is likely that instances of similar circumstances as raised in this appeal have and will in the future escape appellate review "because of their fleeting and determinative nature." The third prong of Israel, supra, is also satisfied.

For the reasons stated above, and because it is foreseeable that minor children in the future may attempt to file domestic violence petitions, the questions raised in the instant appeal remain justiciable. See White v. Linkinoggor, 176 W.Va. 410, 412, 344 S.E.2d 633, 635 (1986).

The principle of mootness has proper application in this case because the underlying domestic violence protective order has expired and the custody issue raised has been resolved. We therefore find that the instant case is moot; however, we decline to dismiss the appeal.

A.

The appellant mother, Katherine B. T., challenges the fact that Richard B., a minor, filed a domestic violence petition on his own behalf and asserts that the family court exceeded its legitimate authority by failing to dismiss the petition. We disagree.

This issue involves, in part, a matter of statutory interpretation. We held in Syllabus Point 5 of State v. General Daniel Morgan Post No. 548, Veterans of Foreign Wars, 144 W.Va. 137, 107 S.E.2d 353 (1959) that:

> When a statute is clear and unambiguous and the legislative intent is plain, the statute should not be interpreted by the courts, and in such case it is the duty of the courts not to construe but to apply the statute.

The appellant first cites to W.Va. Code, 48-27-305(2) (2001), which states:

> A petition for a protective order may be filed by:
> . . .
> (2) An adult family or household member for the protection of the victim or for any family or household member who is a minor child or physically or mentally incapacitated to the extent that he or she cannot file on his or her own behalf[.]

The appellant, however, fails to consider the first paragraph of W.Va. Code, 48-27-305(1) (2001), which states:

> A petition for a protective order may be filed by:
> (1) A person seeking relief under this article [W.Va. Code, 48-27-1 et seq.] for herself or himself.
> (Emphasis added.)

The appellant further fails to consider the express language of W.Va. Code, 48-27-304(b) (2001) which states:

> (b) No person shall be refused the right to file a petition under the provisions of this article. No person shall be denied relief under the provisions of this article if she or he presents facts sufficient under the provisions of this article for the relief sought.

[9]Black's Law Dictionary, Eight Edition, West Publishing Co., 2004.

[10]W.Va. Code, 48-27-204 (2002) states:

> "Family or household members" means persons who: . . .
> (7) Have the following relationships to another person: . . .
> (H) Child or stepchild; . . ..

In order to resolve the question of whether or not a minor may file a domestic violence petition, we need only determine whether or not the legislature intended to include minors as persons who may file a domestic violence petition and thus obtain relief under the statute.

A person is defined as a "human being."[9] W.Va. Code, 48-27-204 (2002), in defining the term "Family or household member" recognizes "child or stepchild" as a person.[10] Finally, we look to legislative findings and purposes in the enactment of the domestic violence statute. W.Va. Code, 48-27-101 (2001) states, in part, as follows:

§48-27-101. Findings and purposes.

(a) The Legislature of this state finds that:

(1) Every person has a right to be safe and secure in his or her home and family and to be free from domestic violence.

(2) Children are often physically assaulted or witness violence against one of their parents or other family or household members, violence which too often ultimately results in death. These children may suffer deep and lasting emotional harm from victimization and from exposure to domestic violence;

This section clearly expresses a legislative concern that children be protected from domestic violence and that they be treated as persons entitled to the protections of the [11] W.Va. Code, 48-27-101(2001), states, in part, as follows:

§48-27-101. Findings and purposes.

(b) This article shall be liberally construed and applied to promote the following purposes:

(1) To assure victims of domestic violence the maximum protection from abuse that the law can provide; . . .

[12] W.Va. Code, 56-4-9 (1923) states:

Minors may sue by next friend or guardian; substitution of plaintiffs.

Any minor entitled to sue may do so by next friend or guardian.

domestic violence laws. We are persuaded that the language in this section is intended to include the protection of all victims of domestic violence, including minors.[11]

We believe that the clear and unambiguous intention of the legislature was to create a system for addressing domestic violence issues which would be open to all persons.

Because we find that the statute is clear and unambiguous and that the legislative intent is plain, our duty is simply to apply the statute.

We therefore hold that under W.Va. Code, 48-27-305 (2002), a minor may file a petition for a domestic violence protective order.

B.

Having answered the question as to whether or not a minor may file a domestic violence petition, we next turn to the procedure to be applied under these circumstances. The appellant cites to W.Va. Code, 56-4-9 (1923) which states that ". . . any minor entitled to sue may do so by next friend or guardian."[12] The appellant also asserts the

When the action or suit is brought by his next friend, the court may, for good cause, substitute the guardian in lieu of the next friend, or any other person as the next friend.

[13]W.Va. Code, 50-5-3 (1978) states:

§50-5-3. Appointment of guardian ad litem.

No infant, incompetent person or incarcerated convict shall proceed or be proceeded against in a civil action in magistrate court unless the provisions of this section are complied with. Whenever an infant, incompetent person or incarcerated convict has a duly qualified representative, such as a guardian, curator, committee or other like fiduciary, such representative may sue or defend on behalf of the infant, incompetent person or convict. If a person under any disability does not have a duly qualified representative he may sue by his next friend. The magistrate shall appoint some suitable person who shall not be required to be an attorney-at-law as guardian ad litem for an infant, incompetent person or incarcerated convict not otherwise represented in an action.

application of W.Va. Code, 50-5-3 (1978) which requires that infants proceed or be proceeded against by a next friend or guardian in civil actions in magistrate court.[13] Finally, the appellant also cites Rule 17(c) of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure as support for requiring a minor to proceed in a domestic violence case by a next friend or guardian. We believe a domestic violence proceeding under W.Va. Code, 48-27-101, et. seq., is a remedial statute designed for the protection of the persons as defined in the statute and is to be liberally construed to accomplish its purposes. The Court has also adopted a comprehensive set of rules to govern the practice and procedure in civil domestic violence cases; however, the rules do not address whether or not a minor is required to proceed by next friend or guardian.

We agree with the appellant that both our statute and our rules provide that a minor must have either a next friend or guardian in order to prosecute or defend civil actions generally.

The record in the instant case reflects that the minor was accompanied by an adult, namely his sister Jennifer M., at the time of the filing of the domestic violence petition and at the final hearing on the petition. Also, the family court judge recognized the minor's adult sister, Jennifer M., as his next friend at the final hearing and allowed her to remain in the hearing as a party while other witnesses were segregated from the hearing. Jennifer M. was, therefore, acting and recognized by the court as the de facto next friend of her minor brother Richard B.

Because our domestic violence rules do not speak specifically to domestic violence petitions that may be initiated by minors, we believe it would be helpful to our courts and to litigants for this Court to adopt a procedure to be applied in such cases. We, therefore, hold that when a minor, without a next friend or guardian, files a petition for a protective order under W.Va. Code, 48-27-101, et. seq., the court in which the petition is filed shall immediately upon filing of the petition appoint a guardian ad litem for the minor.

Finally, we turn to the appellant's argument that the family court abused its discretion when it did not report to the DHHR suspected abuse claimed by the appellant.

[14]This Court has adopted changes to Court rules effective April 3, 2006, regarding reporting of suspected abuse and neglect and accountability which, when followed, should minimize the probability of any instances of abuse and neglect escaping prompt attention by the Department of Health and Human Resources. See Rule 48 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court; Rule 3a. of the Rules of Procedure For Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings; and Rule 16a of Rules of Practice and Procedure for Domestic Violence Civil Proceedings.

[15]Rule 48 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Courts, effective April

The appellant argues that this issue is governed by Rule 47(a) of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Courts[14] which states:

> (a) Reports by family court judges. – If a family court judge has reasonable cause to suspect any minor child involved in family court proceedings has been abused or neglected, that family court judge shall immediately report to the state child protective services agency and the circuit court.

In the instant case the record reflects that the magistrate notified the Jefferson County Department of Health and Human Resources office by FAX of the domestic violence petition and the emergency protective order when the order was issued. The record also reflects that the magistrate called the "hotline" and spoke to a DHHR worker to report the incident. From the record, it also appears that the FAX was sent to the family court judge. We believe that since the magistrate reported the matter to the DHHR and also notified the family court judge that the report was made, there was no necessity for the family court judge to duplicate the report to the DHHR.

We do, however, believe that the better practice would be to follow the strict language of Rule 47 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court[15] even if the petition and incident had been previously reported to the DHHR. This practice could help assure that no case "slips through the cracks."

We therefore hold that in any domestic violence case, when any circuit court judge, family court judge, or magistrate has reasonable cause to suspect that a child is neglected or abused, the circuit court judge, family court judge, or magistrate shall immediately report the suspected neglect or abuse to the state child protective services agency pursuant to W.Va. Code, 49-6A-2 (2006) and, if applicable, Rule 48 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court. When a petition for domestic violence is filed (typically magistrate court) and the judge or magistrate has reasonable cause to suspect that a child is neglected or abused, it would also be the better practice for the court to require the attendance of a representative of the DHHR at all proceedings.

IV.

Conclusion

In consideration of the foregoing, we affirm the circuit court's dismissal of the appellant's petition for a writ of prohibition and deny the requested relief. We further hold that in any domestic violence case which is initiated by a minor, our courts shall be guided by the holdings of this case.

Affirmed.

No. 33005 - Katherine B. T. v. Sally G. Jackson

FILED

December 4, 2006

Maynard, Justice, dissenting: released at 10:00 a.m.

RORY L. PERRY II, CLERK
SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

This Court continues to decide cases that are devastating to West Virginia families. This is one such case. This decision is simply anti-family. Specifically, the majority has undermined the authority of every parent in West Virginia by permitting minor children to file domestic violence petitions on their own behalf.

Not only does this decision allow minors to file domestic violence petitions against their parents, it permits non-family members - actually strangers - to gain control and custody of children. Just look what happened here. The child who filed the domestic violence petition against his mother has ended up in the custody of an officious intermeddler with whom he has no family relationship. He is a man who lives in another state and who apparently entered this child's life around the time of his father's death and pursued a "mentor" relationship with him, whatever that is. Although the child's mother strongly felt that this relationship was inappropriate, her hands were tied as result of the protective order entered upon the filing of the domestic violence petition. Here is how outrageous this case is: while the protective order was in place, the mother was not permitted to have any contact with her own child or object to his placement with a single man living alone. In fact, when she had her husband and family members try to contact this man to check on the welfare of her child, the court found her in contempt.

The record shows that the family court placed the child in this man's custody without conducting any independent inquiry into his fitness or ability to provide a suitable home for a teenage boy. Now, this man, whose motives I personally find to be suspect, has unsupervised custody of this child and has him off in another state. In light of the facts of this case alone, I am astounded and troubled by the majority's decision.

The West Virginia Legislature long ago recognized that abuse and neglect by custodial parents represents a serious danger to many children in West Virginia. In order to address this problem, the Legislature enacted a series of statutes designed to protect the interests of all parties involved yet ensure that children will be removed from the custody of abusive or neglectful parents. In particular, W.Va. Code § 49-6-1 (2005) provides that the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources may file a petition seeking custody of any child who is believed to be abused or neglected. Further, the law provides that both the child and the parents will be provided with counsel and afforded an adequate opportunity to be heard. If there is a question regarding the fitness of any potential custodian, Child Protective Services can conduct a home study and provide the court with expert advice regarding the suitability of the proposed placement. Moreover, the important relationship between a child and his or her parents can be preserved whenever possible through the use of improvement periods and supervised visitation. Of course, this process recognizes that "the best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children." Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W.Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) (citation omitted).

The majority's decision in this case circumvents this entire body of law by allowing minors to remove themselves from the custody of their parents through a domestic violence petition. Essentially, the majority opinion allows a fourteen-year-old boy who becomes angry at his mother for not buying him a video game or a sixteen-year-old girl whose dad will not let her see her boyfriend to effectively have their parents' rights terminated by filing a domestic violence petition claiming that their parents are abusing them.

While I certainly believe that minors should be protected from abusive parents, I cannot agree to the wholesale rejection of the procedural framework enacted by the Legislature to address this very problem. The potential for misuse of W.Va. Code § 48-27-305 by rebellious teenagers is obvious. Because the majority's decision turns the parent-child relationship on its head and has the potential to destroy many West Virginia families, I respectfully dissent.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

IN RE: KATIE S. AND DAVID S.,

Submitted: October 1, 1996
Filed: November 14, 1996

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. When the Department of Health and Human Services finds a situation in which apparently one parent has abused or neglected the children and the other has abandoned the children, both allegations should be included in the abuse and neglect petition filed under W. Va. Code 49-6-1(a) (1992). Every effort should be made to comply with the notice requirements for both parents. To the extent that State ex rel. McCartney v. Nuzum, 161 W. Va. 740, 248 S.E.2d 318 (1978), holds that a non-custodial parent can be found not to have abused and neglected his or her child it is expressly overruled.

2. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

3. Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children.

4. "Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser." Syllabus Point 3, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

5. "'[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.' In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980). Syllabus point 1, Interest of Darla B., 175 W Va.. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985)." Syllabus Point 1, In re Lacey P., 189 W. Va. 580, 433 S.E.2d 518 (1993).

6. "Neither W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(b) nor W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(c) mandates that an improvement period must last for twelve months. It is within the court's discretion to grant an improvement period within the applicable statutory requirements; it is also within the court's discretion to terminate the improvement period before the twelve-month time frame has expired if the court is not satisfied that the defendant is making the necessary progress. The only minimum time period set forth in the statute is the three-month period granted in the pre-dispositional section, W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(b)." Syllabus Point 2, In re Lacey P., 189 W. Va. 580, 433 S.E.2d 518 (1993).

7. "'Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under *W.Va. Recht, J.: See footnote 1
Christina B., See footnote 2 the mother of Katie and David S., appeals the termination of her parental rights by order of the Circuit Court of Wood County. On appeal, Christina B. (the respondent) argues the following: (1) the evidence was insufficient to terminate her rights; (2) the circuit court erred in affording her only a seven-month improvement period rather than the ordered twelve-month improvement period; (3) the circuit court erred in opting for adoption of the children rather than long term foster care; and (4) the circuit court erred in failing to consider her disability. Based on our review of the record, we find no error in the circuit court's decision to terminate the respondent's parental rights. Although we affirm that portion of the circuit court's decision, we note that the circuit court failed to consider whether post-termination visitation between the respondent and her children is in the best interest of the children. We reverse the denial of visitation and remand for a hearing to determine whether such visitation is appropriate under In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

FACTS AND BACKGROUND

On September 26, 1994, the Department of Health and Human Services (hereinafter the Department) filed a juvenile neglect and delinquency petition See footnote 3 against Christina B., alleging that she abused or neglected her children, Katie S., who was born on April 28, 1989 and was then five years old, and David S., who was born on May 29, 1993 and was then sixteen months old, within the meaning of W. Va. Code, 49-1-3 (1994).See footnote 4 The petition also sought to terminate the parental rights of the children's father, David S., whose address was listed as "unknown." The petition alleged the following:

(1) In August 1994, Katie S., left without supervision, was riding her bicycle in the middle of a street, and the child's location was unknown to her mother;
(2) On August 29, 1994, David S. was hanging out and could have fallen out of a second story window when he was left unsupervised by his mother. On that same day, David S. crawled onto the porch and almost fell off the porch;
(3) Between July 1994 and September 1994, David S. was crying and screaming when left unsupervised in his home while his mother remained in bed;
(4) In September 1994, Katie S. missed almost all of the first two weeks of school because of untreated head lice. Her mother failed and refused to treat the child for head lice, and finally, the school personnel had to cut Katie's hair;
(5) The respondent failed routinely to provide breathing treatments necessary to treat David S.'s asthmatic condition;
(6) Because the respondent failed or refused to provide adequate food, the neighbors frequently had to feed the children; and,
(7) In 1990 and 1991, Katie S. was frequently absent from home, and the respondent did not know where the child was.

At a hearing on October 5, 1994, the respondent, who was represented by counsel, told the circuit court that she did not contest the allegations in the petition. The circuit court, after finding Katie and David S. to be abused and neglected by the respondent, granted her an improvement period of twelve (12) months. Also attending the hearing was the children's father; however, even though the father had little contact with his children, he was not found to have abused or neglected his children. Although the order granted an improvement period "to the respondent-parents," rehabilitation efforts centered entirely on the mother, and the record does not show any further involvement by the father. At the final hearing, the father did not appear but his appointed counsel did. The circuit court found because of the father's abandonment, he was "not a proper party" and dismissed him.

On October 28, 1994, the Department prepared a family case plan outlining tasks for the respondent to complete during the improvement period to achieve the final goal of changing her behavior toward her children. During the first part of the improvement period, while the children remained outside the home, the respondent was to attend parenting classes, write reports, participate in counseling, read a parenting book, establish a residence and demonstrate an improvement in her parenting skills. During the first six months, the children visited with their mother in her home some several times with some overnight visits.

Although there is a dispute about the degree of successful completion of these activities by the respondent in the first six months of the improvement period, on June 8, 1995, Katie and David S. were returned to their mother's care. According to Christine Spiker, a licensed social worker with the Department's child protective services who worked with the respondent and her children, after the children were returned home, the Department began receiving numerous complaints alleging that the mother was neglecting the children. On June 15, 1995, Ms. Spiker visited the home, which she found to be "undescribably dirty, if extremely cluttered," and found the children to be disheveled, unkept and dirty. The kitchen which "appeared to have not been cleaned for several days" had a "pot on the stove that had mold growing on it." The pot was identified by the respondent as a "dinner that had been fixed the night after the children had been returned home, which would have been a week" earlier.

Ms. Spiker testified that she returned to the home at least six more times between June 15 and June 26, 1995. According to Ms. Spiker, she would find the respondent lying on the couch and the children complaining of hunger. Ms. Spiker said she had to coerce the respondent into fixing breakfast for her children. When questioned about feeding her children, the respondent answered that she "some times [sic]" fed the children. On June 26, 1995, Ms. Spiker removed the children from the home.

For the three weeks immediately after the removal of the children, the respondent did not request any visits with her children. Between June 26, 1995 and October 15, 1995, the respondent visited her children only four or five times, and during the month before the November 15, 1995 hearing, the respondent made no inquiry about her children. See footnote 5

The respondent maintains that she loves her children and does not want to have her parental rights terminated. Although the Department maintains that the respondent's efforts were not meaningful and ceased when the children were returned to the home, the respondent notes that she completed the tasks assigned during the first part of her improvement period and that the children were not malnourished. However, the respondent acknowledged that she did not feed her children regularly, but only "some times [sic]." Christopher Rutherford, a counselor who began working with the respondent on June 22, 1995 when the children were living with the respondent, thought that the drug treatment for her epilepsy could have made her appear listless. Mr. Rutherford, who had never visited the home or met the children, thought that the respondent, who had suffered abuse and neglect as a child, was making a sincere effort to get her children back. Mr. Rutherford thought that the respondent's counseling would take several months, but had not formulated an opinion on whether she had shown an improvement in her ability to be a responsible and successful parent during the five months he worked with her.

At the conclusion of the hearing, counsel for the respondent requested she be allowed the remaining time of the twelve-month improvement period to show an improvement or "to find one of the grounds less than termination." Joseph P. Albright, Jr., Esq., guardian-ad-litem for the children, thought that there was no "harm in continuing the improvement period. . .[because] it is a short period of time."

The circuit court rejected any additional improvement period, finding that the respondent's improvement period continued after her children were removed so that the improvement period was a full year and that there was no evidence that the additional time would show any improvement. It is not disputed that except for the respondent's personal counseling with Mr. Rutherford and four or five visits with her children, between June 26, 1995 and November 15, 1995, the respondent made no effort to have her children returned to her.

Emphasizing the welfare of these very young children, the respondent's failure to show any improvement when her children were returned to the home and no showing of "a substantial likelihood of improvement or correction of the conditions within a short period," the circuit court ordered the termination of her parental rights. The circuit court also denied the respondent visitation with her children, but allowed the Department to grant visitation. The record does not indicate if any post-final order visitation has occurred.

This appeal followed, asserting several errors by the circuit court including insufficient evidence, failure to provide a full twelve-month improvement period, failure to consider long term foster care, and failure to consider the respondent's medical problems.

II.
DISCUSSION
A. Termination
1. Parental Rights of the Father

Before discussing the errors raised by the respondent concerning the termination of her parental rights, we note that no action was taken concerning the parental rights of the children's father, David S. Even though the evidence strongly suggests that the father abandoned his children and has no interest in their well-being, he was dismissed as "not a proper party." The Department's abuse and neglect petition named the father and stated that he "provides neither financial nor emotional support for Katie and David, does not provide them with supervision or for any of the physical or material needs, and has only occasional contact with them." The father was served by publication See footnote 6 and appeared at the first hearing, where counsel was appointed to represent him. Although counsel for the father appeared at the final hearing, the father did not, and counsel for the father indicated that he had never talked to the father.

At the end of the hearing, even though the mother's parental rights were terminated, the status of the children was left dangling because of the father's dismissal. Apparently, the issue of the father's rights was left to be addressed in an adoption proceeding. See footnote 7

Recently, in In re Christina L., supra, we strongly indicated that a natural parent, who has abandoned the children, should be included in abuse and neglect petitions. We again emphasize that the practice of waiting until adoption proceedings to determine the status of such a parent's parental rights, leaves "the children in 'No Man's Land' with regard to any resolution in their lives," may discourage persons who want to adopt the children, and leaves "the validity of a future adoption subject to challenge" (when due process has not been afforded to a natural parent). In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. at 455-56, 460 S.E.2d at 701-2.

"Abandonment of a child by a parent(s) constitutes compelling circumstances sufficient to justify the denial of an improvement period." Syl. pt. 2, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991); see also In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. at 455-56, 460 S.E.2d at 701-2.

When the Department has a situation in which apparently one parent has abused or neglected the children and the other has abandoned the children, both allegations should be included in the abuse and neglect petition filed under W. Va. Code 49-6-1(a) (1992). Every effort should be made to comply with the notice requirements for both parents. To the extent that State ex rel. McCartney v. Nuzum, 161 W. Va. 740, 248 S.E.2d 318 (1978), holds that a non-custodial parent can be found not to have abused and neglected his or her child it is expressly overruled. The circuit court should, as required by W. Va. Code 49-6-2(d) (1996), "to the extent practicable, . . . give. . . [abuse and neglect cases] priority over any other civil action before the court, except proceedings under article two-a [§ 48-2A-1 et seq.], chapter forty-eight of the code and actions in which trial is in progress" and consider timely the allegations of abuse or neglect and also the allegation of abandonment. See footnote 8 We emphasize delay in achieving a permanent home for children can be devastating. "Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security." Syl. pt. 1, in part, In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). These concerns for a timely disposition of allegations of abandonment, promoted our holding in Syl. pt. 6 of Christina L., which states:

> When the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources seeks to terminate parental rights where an absent parent has abandoned the child, allegations of such abandonment should be included in the petition and every effort made to comply with the notice requirements of W.Va. Code, 49-6-1 (1992).

See In the Matter of Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 637, 461 S.E.2d 129, 143 (1995).

In the case sub judice, the circuit court should have considered the allegation that the father had abandoned his children when the abuse and neglect petition was presented. Delaying a determination on the issue of the father's abandonment allows this matter to linger while Katie and David S. remain in foster care, a situation we found "ludicrous" in Christina L. 194 W. Va. at 456, 460 S.E.2d at 702. When the circuit court conducts a hearing on post-termination visitation (see infra section B), the issue of the father's parental rights should also be considered. Every effort should be made to comply with the notice requirements of W. Va. Code 49-6-1 (1992) and counsel should, if necessary, be appointed to represent the father. The status of these two young children needs to be resolved, without any unnecessary delay.

2. Parental Rights of the Mother

Recently, in Syl. pt. 1 of In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), we stated our standard of review in an abuse and neglect case:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Based on this blend of deferential-plenary standards of review, we find that the circuit court was not clearly erroneous or wrong as a matter of law in terminating the parental rights of the respondent.

In her appeal, the respondent asserts that the evidence was insufficient to terminate her parental rights. Although the respondent, as a parent, has substantial rights which must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children. First, we note that the evidence of abuse and neglect must be clear and convincing. Syl. pt. 3 of In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), states:

> Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser.

In accord Syl. pt. 6, W.V. Dept. of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., ___ W. Va. ___, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996).

In this case, the respondent did not contest the allegations of abuse and neglect contained in the petition. See supra pp. 3-4, listing the petition's allegations. After the respondent had participated in various activities designed to assist in improving her parenting skills, her two young children were returned to her custody. However, the mother was still unable to care for the basic needs of these children including washing, supervising and feeding them regularly. The circuit court heard extensive testimony from Ms. Spiker, the Department's child protective service worker who visited the home more than six times after custody was returned to the mother. Ms. Spiker reported that the children were disheveled, unkept, and dirty, and that the children complained of hunger. The home was cluttered, dirty, and even had mold growing in a pot on the stove. Ms. Spiker said that she had to coerce the respondent into fixing breakfast for her children. The mother admitted that she "some times [sic]" fed her children but did not believe the children to be malnourished.

The respondent argues that there was insufficient "evidence of specific instances which demonstrate why . . . [her] parental rights should be terminated." However, the record shows: first, that the respondent did not contest the allegations of abuse and neglect in the petition which outlined several individual incidents; second, that the Department's social worker testified to the condition of the children and their home after they were returned to the mother; and finally, that the respondent presented no evidence that she had properly cared for the children when they were returned to her (she acknowledged that she did not feed the children regularly).

Based on the record, we find that the circuit court's finding of clear and convincing evidence of abuse and neglect was not clearly erroneous. Left to the mother's devices and child-rearing techniques, unencumbered by repeated inspections by the Department, the likelihood is very real that the health and welfare of both children was imperiled. Our primary goal in such matters must be the best interests of the child. We have reviewed the entire record and are not "left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed." Syl. pt. 1, in part, In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., supra. We note that the circuit court heard the witnesses and, therefore, is better able than this Court to make credibility determinations. We find no merit in the respondent's claim of insufficient evidence of abuse and neglect.

The respondent alleges that although a twelve-month improvement period had been ordered, her improvement period effectively lasted only seven months. See footnote 9 The respondent maintains that after the Department removed her children on June 26, 1995, they stopped working with her, even though no official termination of the improvement period occurred. In essence, the respondent's improvement period argument is based on the assumption that with an additional four months, her parenting skills would improve. See footnote 10 W. Va. Code 49-6- 5(a)(6) (1996) provides that termination of parental rights is appropriate when "there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child. . . ." W. Va. Code 49-6- 5(b) (1996) defines "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" means that "based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect, on their own or with help."

In this case, after the June 26, 1995 removal of the children, the respondent made very little effort to even see her children. Although able to continue with personal counseling, the respondent did not discuss the removal of her children with the counselor. Even though the counselor, Christopher Rutherford, testified that the mother was attending sessions and was making a sincere effort to get her children back, after over four months of counseling, he thought "it is too early to tell" if any progress had occurred. Neither had the counselor formed an opinion "as to whether or not she has shown an improvement in her ability to be a responsible and successful parent during the time" he worked with her. See footnote 11 The focus of the counselor's testimony was not on the respondent's relationship with her children, but on her own problems.

In Syl. pt. 2 of In re Lacey P., 189 W. Va. 580, 433 S.E.2d 518 (1993), we discussed the length of an improvement period and when termination is appropriate by stating:

> Neither W.Va. Code Sec. 49-6-2(b) nor W.Va. Code Sec. 49-6-5(c) mandates that an improvement period must last for twelve months. It is within the court's discretion to grant an improvement period within the applicable statutory requirements; it is also within the court's discretion to terminate the improvement period before the twelve-month time frame has expired if the court is not satisfied that the defendant is making the necessary progress. The only minimum time period set forth in the statute is the three-month period granted in the pre-dispositional section, W.Va. Code Sec. 49-6-2(b).See footnote 12

The respondent's assertion that long term foster care is the best option for these young children is also without merit because the respondent failed to show that she would in the future be able to care for her children. Syl. pt. 1 of In re Jeffery R. L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993) states:

> "Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Given the lack of any evidence showing a reasonable likelihood of improvement, we find no error in the circuit court's refusal to extend the respondent's improvement period or to order long term foster care. We have long held that mere speculation of parental improvement was insufficient where the children's welfare is seriously threatened. Syl. pt. 1 of In re Lacy P., 189 W. Va. 580, 433 S.E.2d 518 (1993) states:

> "'[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.' In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syllabus point 1, Interest of Darla B., 175 W. Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985).

In this case, the respondent had an adequate period to demonstrate if, with reasonable help, she was capable of caring for her young children. The evidence of an amelioration of the conditions which lead to the abuse and neglect is too speculative given that the respondent was unable feed, supervise or wash her young children.

The respondent's argument concerning the stoppage of services by the Department after the children were removed, is based on the assumption that the Department, and not the mother, has the responsibility for initiating contact after the children were removed. Although the Department is required "to make reasonable efforts to reunify a family" (W. Va. Code 49-6-12(i) (1996), the parents or custodians have the responsibility "for the initiation and completion of all terms of the improvement period." W. Va. Code 49- 6-12(d) (1996).See footnote 13 In the four months between the removal of the children and the circuit court's final hearing, the respondent failed to do anything to pursue her improvement program; in fact, she only visited her children six times, even though she lived within a mile of where the visits occurred. See footnote 14 Given the evidence, we find that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to extend the improvement period or to order long term foster case based upon the speculation of about a forthcoming resolution of the respondent's personal problems. See footnote 15

Finally, the respondent maintains that the circuit court erred in terminating her parental rights because she suffers from a disability. We note that the issue of the respondent's disability was not presented to the court below. We have long been reluctant to consider such matters. See Whitlow v. Bd. of Educ. of Kanawha County, 190 W. Va. 223, 226, 438 S.E.2d 15, 18 (1993); Shrewsbury v. Humphrey, 183 W. Va. 291, 395 S.E.2d 535 (1990); Cline v. Roark, 179 W. Va. 482, 370 S.E.2d 138 (1988).

In this case, the record fails to show a relationship between her medical condition, epilepsy treated by Depakote, and her behavior toward the children. The respondent did not testify about her medical condition or any effect caused by her medication. The record does include some speculation by Mr. Rutherford, the respondent's counselor, that her medication may make her listless because of general knowledge he gained from talking to some nurses and because the medication made a different client of his listless. Because of the lack of factual development below, we decline to address this disability issue, which was raised for the first time on appeal. See Whitlow v. Bd. of Educ. of Kanawha County, supra.

B. Post-Termination Visitation

After the circuit court determined that the respondent's parental rights should be terminated, counsel for the respondent requested visitation for the respondent pending appeal. The request was denied without a hearing, and the idea of post-termination visitation was summarily dismissed with the comment, "Termination means termination." During oral argument before this Court, Mr. Albright, guardian ad litem for the children, said that although David S., who was only sixteen months when the abuse and neglect petition was filed, had no bond with his mother, Katie S. has emotional ties to her mother. See footnote 16 Mr. Albright said that Katie S. has "love and affection" for her mother and was unable to visit with her mother.

In Christina L., we noted that circuit court should be aware that post- termination visitation, either with siblings or parents, may be in the best interest of the child, especially when there is a close bond and the child maintains love and affection for either her siblings or parents. Where no bond exists, the consideration of post-termination visitation is not required. Syl. pt. 5 of Christina L., states:

> When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

See State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, ___, 470 S.E.2d 205, 214 (1996) (post-termination visitation should be allowed if it is in the children's best interest and "would not unreasonably interfere with their permanent placement").

Because it is argued that Katie S. has a bond with the respondent and continues to feel love and affection for her, the circuit court should conduct a hearing pursuant to In re Christina L., supra, to determine if continued visitation or other contact between the respondent and Katie S. would be detrimental to Katie S.'s well being and if the visitation would be in Katie S.'s best interest. On remand, the circuit court should take evidence and hear arguments from all sides on the post-termination visitation between Katie S. and the respondent.

For the above stated reasons, the decision of the Circuit Court of Wood County is affirmed, in part, reversed, in part, and remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Affirmed, in part, reversed, in part, and remanded.

Footnote: 3 W. Va. Code 49-6-1(a) (1992) states, in pertinent part:

If the state department or a reputable person believes that a child is neglected or abused, the department or the person may present a petition setting forth the facts to the circuit court in the county in which the child resides, or to the judge of such court in vacation. The petition shall be verified by the oath of some credible person having knowledge of the facts. The petition shall allege specific conduct including time and place, how such conduct comes within the statutory definition of neglect or abuse with references thereto, any supportive services provided by the state department to remedy the alleged circumstances and the relief sought. Upon filing of the petition, the court shall set a time and place for a hearing and shall appoint counsel for the child.

Footnote: 4 W. Va. Code 49-1-3(a) (1994) provides the following definition of an "abused child:"

"Abused child" means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by:

(1) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home; or

(2) Sexual abuse or sexual exploitation; or

(3) The sale or attempted sale of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian in violation of section sixteen [§ 48-4-16], article four, chapter forty-eight of this code.

In addition to its broader meaning, physical injury may include an injury to the child as a result of excessive corporal punishment.

W. Va. Code 49-1-3(g)(1994) provides the following definition of a "neglected child:"

(1) "Neglected child" means a child:

(A) Whose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian; or

(B) Who is presently without necessary food, clothing, shelter, medical care, education or supervision because of the disappearance or absence of the child's parent or custodian;

(2) "Neglected child" does not mean a child whose education is conducted within the provisions of section one [§ 18-8-1], article eight, chapter eighteen of this code.

Footnote: 5 The record indicates that between June 26, 1995 and November 15, 1995, Christina B. lived within a mile of where the parent/child visits occurred.

Footnote: 6 W. Va. Code 49-6-1(b) (1992) states:

The petition and notice of the hearing shall be served upon both parents and any other custodian, giving to such parents or custodian at least ten days' notice, and notice shall be given to the state department. In cases wherein personal service within West Virginia cannot be obtained after due diligence upon any parent or other custodian, a copy of the petition and notice of the hearing shall be mailed to such person by certified mail, addressee only, return receipt requested, to the last known address of such person. If said person signs the certificate, service shall be complete and said certificate shall be filed as proof of said service with the clerk of the circuit court. If service cannot be obtained by personal service or by certified mail, notice shall be by publication as a Class II legal advertisement in compliance with the provisions of article three [§ 59-3-1 et seq.], chapter fifty-nine of this code. A notice of hearing shall specify the time and place of the hearing, the right to counsel of the child and parents or other custodians at every stage of the proceedings and the fact that such proceedings can result in the permanent termination of the parental rights. Failure to object to defects in the petition and notice shall not be construed as a waiver.

Footnote: 7 The circuit court's order terminated the parental rights of the mother, who although unable to care for her children, loved them and wanted them, but left intact the parental rights of the father, who, according to the petition, provided nothing for the children and only had occasional contact with them.

Footnote: 8 Rule 8 of the Rules on Time Standards for Circuit Courts further instructs circuit courts expeditiously and timely to process and dispose of abuse and neglect proceedings.

Footnote: 9 In 1996, the Legislature amended W. Va. Code 49-6-5(c) to allow "parents or custodians an improvement period not to exceed six months." Previously W. Va. Code 49-6- 5(c) (1992) allowed a circuit court the option of ordering up to a twelve-month improvement period. See also W. Va. Code 49-6-2(b) (1996) allowing the court to "grant any respondent an improvement period in accord with the provisions of this article." Previously, W. Va. Code 49-6-2(b) (1992) "allowed an improvement period of three to twelve months. . . "

Footnote: 10 The respondent's third assignment of error is that the circuit court erred in not ordering long term foster care. This assignment is based on the assertion that the respondent would return to a normal functional level after a few months of treatment. Because this same assertion of a brief recovery period is also the base of her improvement period extension argument, we consider the two assignments together.

Footnote: 11 The respondent cited the following testimony as showing that the conditions of abuse and neglect would be corrected in "a few months:"

Q. (Judge Hill) Has she shown any improvement in her emotional problems; that is, have you noticed any progress in curing what you have diagnosed her problems are?

A. (Christopher Rutherford) I think it is too early to tell.

Q. Not yet, then?

A. Right.

Q. How long do you project that it would take to cure her emotional problems so that she is at least functionally normal?

A. It depends what theory or philosophy you go with.

Q. What do you mean?

A. Some people say eight sessions. Some people say one to four years. It just depends.

Q. Is it in the range of months rather than weeks?

A. I think it would be in the range of several months, yes.

Q. More than a year?

A. That I can't say.

Q. Well, you don't have any estimate, then, as to how many months?

A. I can't make an accurate one, no.

Q. Not even an educated estimate?

A. An educated guess, I would have to assume, that, probably, after several months of structured time with the client, intensive services, that she ought to be able to make her way.

Q. Some people say it might take four years?

A. Well, it depends. . . .

Footnote: 12 See supra note 9 for statutory changes.

Footnote: 13 In its entirely, W. Va. Code 49-6-12(d) (1996) provides:
When any improvement period is granted to a respondent pursuant to the provisions of this section, the respondent shall be responsible for the initiation and completion of all terms of the improvement period. The court may order the state department to pay expenses associated with the services provided during the improvement period when the respondent has demonstrated that he or she is unable to bear such expenses.

Footnote: 14 We have previously pointed out that the level of interest demonstrated by a parent in visiting his or her children while they are out of the parent's custody is a significant factor in determining the parent's potential to improve sufficiently and achieve minimum standards to parent the child. See In Interest of Tiffany Marie S. 196 W. Va. at ___ and ___, 470 S.E.2d at 182 and 191; State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. at ___ and 470 S.E.2d at 213.

Footnote: 15 The respondent also argues that four months is a short time and therefore, it should be routinely granted. This "why not" argument for additional time in an abuse and neglect case fails to realize a child's need for permanency. See Syl. pt. 1, Carlita B., supra ("[u]njustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security"); In the Matter of Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995); In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., supra.

Footnote: 16 We note with approval that the guardian ad litem for the children appeared before this Court for oral argument and was able to answer several questions concerning the interests of the children. The record indicates that the guardian ad litem has been diligent in protecting his clients' interests below. We continue to emphasize that guardians ad litem have a duty to represent fully represent the child's appellate rights, if an appeal is necessary.
In Matter of Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 198, 406 S.E.2d 214, 221 (1991), we stated:

It is well established that "[a]fter judgment adverse to his ward, the guardian ad litem has the right to appeal and the duty to do so if it reasonably appears to be to the advantage of the minor[.]" Robinson v. Gatch, 85 Ohio App. 484, 487, 87 N.E.2d 904, 906 (1949). This is based upon the principle that a guardian ad litem has a duty to represent the child(ren) to whom he or she has been appointed, as effectively as if the guardian ad litem were in a normal lawyer-client relationship.

Part of the duty of appellate representation is the filing of appellate briefs, even when not invited to do so. In Christina L., 194 W. Va. at 700, n.7, 460 S.E.2d at 700 n.7, we emphasized the duty of guardians ad litem to appear before this Court for oral argument, stating: "We again admonish guardians ad litem that it is their responsibility to represent their clients in every stage of the abuse and/or neglect proceedings." Part of this representation is to file an appellate brief to insure that their clients' interests are presented. The role of the guardian ad litem does not cease until permanent placement of the children occurs. Syl. pt. 5, James M. v. Maynard, supra.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

John KENNEDY

Hon. John R. FRAZIER, Judge, etc.

No. 17501.

March 18, 1987.

Rehearing Denied June 3, 1987.

Syllabus by the Court

1. An accused may voluntarily, knowingly and understandingly consent to the imposition of a prison sentence even though he is unwilling to admit participation in the crime, if he intelligently concludes that his interests require a guilty plea and the record supports the conclusion that a jury could convict him.

2. Although a judge would be remiss to accept a guilty plea under circumstances where the weight of the evidence indicates a complete lack of guilt, a court should not force any defense on a defendant in a criminal case, particularly when advancement of the defense might end in disaster.

David C. Smith, Princeton, for appellant.

Charles G. Brown, Atty. Gen.,
David W. Johnson, Asst. Atty. Gen., Charleston, for appellees.

NEELY, Justice:

The petitioner, John Kennedy, was indicted on a two count indictment. Petitioner and the prosecuting attorney entered into a plea agreement under which petitioner would plead guilty to delivery of marijuana in return for dismissal of a second charge, delivery of oxycodone. In addition to dismissal of the second charge, the prosecution also agreed not to seek an enhanced sentence under W.Va.Code, 61-11-18 [1943], or W.Va.Code, 60A-4-408 [1971].

The petitioner and his counsel first presented the plea agreement to the respondent judge on 25 September 1986, but at that time the respondent remanded the petitioner to a mental health facility to determine whether respondent was under the influence of drugs. Petitioner presented the plea agreement to the respondent again on 10 October 1986. At the 10 October hearing petitioner indicated that he was guilty and his counsel represented to the court that there were no meritorious defenses. The judge found the guilty plea to be voluntarily and intelligently given, and referred the matter to the probation department for a pre-sentence investigation. During this hearing no mention was made of possible police misconduct.

The pre-sentence investigation was submitted to the court on 22 October 1986 and this report included statements by petitioner indicating that he had been entrapped, and that improper sexual advances had been made toward him by a police officer. Specifically, the pre-sentence report said:

I interviewed John Kennedy at the Mercer County Jail on October 17, 1986. He states that this was the 7th or 8th time that Detective Staton and Beverly Wallace had been to his house. He states that the first time they came he told them he did not sell drugs anymore. The 5th or 6th time they came, John states that he told Staton and Wallace he could take them to Princeton and introduce them to a cocaine supplier. He says they were not interested.

John states that he no longer sold drugs and only had in his possession marijuana and Tylox for his personal usage. He states that Staton and Wallace pressured him so much to sell to them that he finally gave in and sold the marijuana and Tylox from his personal supply. John further stated that Beverly Wallace was making inappropriate sexual advances toward him in order to get him to sell the drugs. He states he was fearful of further incident at his home if he did not agree to make the transaction.

Based upon this report, a hearing was held on 24 October 1986, at which the respondent judge rejected the plea agreement and scheduled the matter for trial over petitioner's strenuous objection. During this hearing the court gave the following reasons for his decisions:
The last case I have on my calendar before we start the trial is State versus John Kennedy. Let the record show that Mr. Kennedy is here today with his attorney, Mr. David Smith. Mr. Knight represents the State.
Let me say, before we get into this at all, that I have received a copy of the presentence report, that under the defendant's version-Mr. Knight, I don't know if you've had a chance-Mr. Stevens, you might confer there with Mr. Knight on this matter-that under the defendant's version, pretty much, Mr. Kennedy is saying that he didn't want to make these sales, that he resisted continuously, that he was pressured significantly by the police to the-including the extent that the undercover agent made sexual offers to him to get him to sell these drugs.
And under those circumstances, it wouldn't appear proper-but I'll hear counsel on this before I make any final decision whether to accept the plea agreement or not. But under those circumstances, it certainly gives the Court considerable pause as to whether to accept the plea agreement or not.

The trial court also stated: Well, of course, you with your experience are familiar with the defense of entrapment. That sets a pretty good defense in his statement there. Of course, we're not-you know, I'm familiar with the Alfred (sic) decision but, of course, the test in West Virginia is the Myers vs. Losch and Frazier decision, whether in the public interest and the fair administration of justice the Court should accept this plea agreement.
The Court doesn't find the plea agreement-with his very strong, very adamant position that he was coerced into making these buys by extreme pressure by officers and the undercover agent-and under those circumstances, the Court doesn't feel that the public interest and the fair administration of justice would be served.
As you pointed out, in all likelihood he would receive some sort of sentence in this case. It's not my desire to send somebody to the penitentiary who is not guilty, who has been pressured, under the circumstances that he alleges in his statement there, by the police officers.

Under the facts of this case we find that the trial court abused his discretion when he rejected the plea agreement in order to vindicate the defendant's rights. The case of North Carolina v. Alford, 400 U.S. 25, 91 S.Ct. 160, 27 L.Ed.2d 162 (1970) stands for the proposition that a guilty plea that represents a voluntary and intelligent choice among the alternatives available to a defendant is not coerced within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment simply because it was entered into to avoid the possibility of a significantly higher penalty. The Supreme Court held that there is no bar to imposing a prison sentence upon an accused who is unwilling to admit guilt but who is willing to waive trial and accept the sentence. An accused may voluntarily, knowingly and understandingly consent to the imposition of a prison sentence even though he is unwilling to admit participation in the crime, if he intelligently concludes that his interests require a guilty plea and the record supports the conclusion that a jury could convict him.

In Myers v. Frazier, 173 W.Va. 658, 319 S.E.2d 782 (1984) we held in syllabus points 4, 5, and 6 as follows:

4. A court's ultimate discretion in accepting or rejecting a plea agreement is whether it is consistent with the public interest in the fair administration of justice.

5. As to what is meant by a plea bargain being in the public interest in the fair administration of justice, there is the initial consideration that the plea bargain must be found to have been voluntarily and intelligently entered into by the defendant and that there is a factual basis for his guilty plea. Rule 11(d) and (f). In addition to these factors, which inure to the defendant's benefit, we believe that consideration must be given not only to the general public's perception that crimes should be prosecuted but to the interests of the victim as well.

6. A primary test to determine whether a plea bargain should be accepted or rejected is in light of the entire criminal event and given the defendant's prior criminal record whether the plea bargain enables the court to dispose of the case in a manner commensurate with the seriousness of the criminal charges and the character and background of the defendant.

The law enunciated in Myers v. Frazier, supra, protects the interests of the public; plea agreements that are overly lenient in sentencing perpetrators of heinous crimes confound the public's expectation that crimes will be prosecuted and are not fair to the victims. In the case before us, however, the trial court did not reject the plea agreement because the probation report demonstrated lack of adequate contrition on petitioner's part and the plea agreement did not adequately protect the public. Had the judge assigned these reasons, his decision would have been within the permissible discretion allowed by Rule 11(e)(2), West Virginia Rules of Criminal Procedure, and our holding in Myers, supra.

In this case the court's reasons for rejecting the plea agreement were that the defendant might, indeed, prevail on the merits. The petitioner argues that although he might prevail on the merits, there is also a significant probability that he will be convicted of two felonies and suffer further sentence enhancement under W.Va.Code, 61-11-18 [1943] and 60A-4-408 [1971]. In such circumstances, it is for the defendant, after proper consultation with competent counsel, to determine whether to roll the dice and go to a jury. Although a judge would be remiss to accept a guilty plea under circumstances where the weight of the evidence indicates a complete lack of guilt, a court "should not 'force any defense on a defendant in a criminal case,' particularly when advancement of the defense might 'end in disaster'...." North Carolina v. Alford, supra, quoting Tremblay v. Overholser, 199 F.Supp. 569, 570 (D.C.1961).

Experience teaches that the defense of entrapment is a slender reed on which to lean a defendant's defense. Entrapment so serious as to amount to a question of law, of course, would allow the judge alone to dismiss the case. But when a jury must pass on the entrapment issue, a defendant is well advised to make a conservative estimate of his chances of acquittal on that ground. The judge should not substitute his weighing of alternatives for the defendant's properly counseled weighing of the same alternatives.

In Alford, supra, the Supreme Court cited with approval numerous federal and state cases that generally stand for the proposition that reasons other than the fact that he is guilty may induce a defendant to plead, and he must be permitted to judge for himself in this respect. Because guilt, or the degree of guilt, is at times uncertain and elusive, an accused, though believing in or entertaining doubts respecting his innocence, might reasonably conclude a jury would be convinced of his guilt and that he would fare better in the sentence by pleading guilty.

Therefore, in light of the judge's stated reasons for rejecting petitioner's plea, we find that the petitioner has demonstrated grounds for issuance of a writ of prohibition under the criteria enunciated in Hinkle v. Black, 164 W.Va. 112, 262 S.E.2d 744 (1979). Accordingly the writ of prohibition for which petitioner prays is awarded and the case is remanded to the Circuit Court of Mercer County for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Robert H. Carlton, Williamson, for G.R.S.

PER CURIAM:

After George Ryan S. was convicted of the murder of his wife, a dispute concerning the custody of their child arose among the grandparents. See footnote 1 The Circuit Court of Mingo County terminated the parental rights of George Ryan S. and awarded joint custody of the child to the maternal and paternal grandparents. Kenneth and Phyllis B. (the mother's parents) appealed to this Court alleging that they never agreed to joint custody. George Ryan S. also appealed the termination of his parental rights alleging that he never abused or neglected his son. Although we agree that George Ryan S.'s parental rights were correctly terminated, we find that joint custody of the child should not have been awarded and, therefore, we remand this case for an expedited hearing to determine the custody of the child.

On March 16, 1988, George Ryan S. (the child's father) was convicted of murder, in the second degree, of Eskaleen Marie S., his wife and mother of his child. George Ryan S. was sentenced to not less than 5 or more than 18 years in the state penitentiary. After his conviction, George Ryan S. nominated his parents, Elmer and Wilma S., to be primary guardians for his and his dead wife's infant child. The child, George Ryan S. II, had been born on March 21, 1986. After the mother's murder, Wilma S. (the father's mother) was the primary caretaker of the child from February 1987 through October 1988; even though George Ryan S. lived with his parents prior to his incarceration and conviction.

Kenneth and Phyllis B. (the mother's parents) sought grandparent visitation with the child and after a hearing on January 8, 1988, a family law master awarded them visitation. However, no visitation occurred until Kenneth and Phyllis B. brought contempt proceedings. Wilma S. (the father's mother) testified that the child's allergies had prevented some visits and she refused to allow any visitation outside her house. Kenneth and Phyllis B. were reluctant to visit their grandchild in the house of Elmer and Wilma S. (the father's parents). However, Kenneth B. testified that visitation improved after the contempt proceedings.

On September 8, 1988, Kenneth and Phyllis B. petitioned the circuit court for custody of the child and for termination of the father's parental rights. At a hearing on October 17, 1988, the circuit court terminated the father's parental rights and awarded custody of the child to Kenneth and Phyllis B. with visitation rights to Elmer and Wilma S. See footnote 2 The order was entered November 3, 1988.

Thereafter the circuit court judge, sua sponte, instructed the parties to work out a joint custody arrangement. Although Kenneth and Phyllis B. objected and refused to work toward a joint custody arrangement, shortly thereafter, Elmer and Wilma S. petitioned for joint custody. At a hearing on March 20, 1989, joint custody was awarded with physical custody rotating between the maternal and paternal grandparents on a month-to-month basis and visitation with that month's non-resident grandparents on alternating weekends. The joint custody order was entered on June 16, 1989. [FN3] On appeal Kenneth and Phyllis B. maintain that circuit court should not have awarded joint custody over their objection and that they should be awarded sole custody. Elmer and Wilma S. maintain that they, as primary caretakers of the child until October 1988, should be awarded custody or that joint custody, which they maintain has been working, should be continued. George Ryan S., the child's father, also appealed the termination of his parental rights.

I

In its decision to terminate George Ryan S.'s parental rights, the circuit court took judicial notice of his conviction for the murder, in the second degree, of his wife. The court noted that Eskaleen S. had also been the victim of repeated acts of violence and abuse by her husband. Kenneth B. testified that he had seen signs of this abuse on his daughter. In addition, the court noted that after George Ryan S. had killed his wife, he placed her body in his car's trunk and drove her body to a remote area where, until dissuaded by a friend, he planned to bury her in an unmarked grave. The record also indicates that after Eskaleen S.'s murder when George Ryan S. returned to live in his parents' house, Wilma S., his mother, assumed primary care of the child.

The standard for judging parental fitness was recently reiterated in Syllabus Point 1, Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W.Va. 710, 356 S.E.2d 464 (1987), which stated:

> "A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has permanently transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts." Syllabus, State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W.Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d [798] (1969). Syl. pt. 2, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W.Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975).

Syllabus Point 2, Collins v. Collins, 171 W.Va. 126, 297 S.E.2d 901 (1982); Syllabus Point 1, Leach v. Bright, 165 W.Va. 636, 270 S.E.2d 793 (1980); Syllabus, Whiteman v. Robinson, 145 W.Va. 685, 116 S.E.2d 691 (1960).

W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) [1988] expressly includes among the "conditions of neglect or abuse," which constitute ground for termination of parental rights, the following:

> (5) The abusing parent or parents have repeatedly or seriously injured the child physically or emotionally, or have sexually abused or sexually exploited the child, and the degree of family stress and the potential for further abuse and neglect are so great as to preclude the use of resources to > mitigate or resolve family problems or assist the abusing parent or parents in fulfilling their responsibilities to the child.

Recently we considered a similar case concerning the termination of a father's parental rights after the father's conviction for murder of the child's mother. In Nancy Viola R., supra 177 W.Va. at 714, 356 S.E.2d at 468, we noted that spousal abuse is a factor in determining parental fitness for child custody. Collins, supra. In this case as in Nancy Viola R., "the most convincing evidence of the [father]'s unfitness is his conviction of the ... murder of his wife...." Nancy Viola R. supra 177 W.Va. at 714, 356 S.E.2d at 468. In Syllabus Point 2, Nancy Viola R. supra, we stated:

> A conviction of first degree murder of a child's mother by his father and the father's prolonged incarceration in a penal institution for that conviction are significant factors to be considered in ascertaining the father's fitness and in determining whether the father's parental rights should be terminated.

George Ryan S. argues that Nancy Viola R. is not dispositive in his case because he was convicted of murder in the second degree, and not first degree, and the record contains no evidence of child abuse. In Nancy Viola R. supra, 177 W.Va. at 715, 356 S.E.2d at 469, we found the reasoning of In re Abdullah, 85 Ill.2d 300, 53 Ill.Dec. 246, 423 N.E.2d 915 (1981), a factually similar case, to be particularly relevant. In Abdullah, the Supreme Court of Illinois listed three factors that justified termination of the father's parental rights: (1) the father was convicted of murder; (2) the child's mother was the murder victim; and (3) "the murder was accompanied by exceptionally brutal and heinous behavior demonstrating wanton cruelty." Id. 85 Ill.2d at 307, 53 Ill.Dec. at 249, 423 N.E.2d at 918.

Parental rights may be terminated only upon clear and convincing evidence. W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1984]; Nancy Viola R., supra 177 W.Va. at 715, 356 S.E.2d at 469; State ex rel. West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987). In the present case, there is clear and convincing evidence to terminate George Ryan S.'s parental rights. See footnote 4 George Ryan S. had a history of abusing his wife, which culminated in her murder. The murder of a child's mother is "the ultimate act of savagery to that child" because of the emotional and psychological scarring of the child. Nancy Viola R., supra 177 W.Va. at 716, 356 S.E.2d at 470. We find the minor factual differences between this case and Nancy Viola R. to be without merit and therefore, hold that the circuit court correctly terminated George Ryan S.'s parental rights.

Although the circuit court attempted to solve the custody dispute by making the maternal and paternal grandparents work together for the benefit of the child, the award of joint custody to the maternal and paternal grandparents was clearly an error. In David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W.Va. 57, 385 S.E.2d 912, 927 (1989), we noted that "[j]oint custody works well when both parents live in the same neighborhood or at least in the same city, and so long as they can cooperate on child-rearing matters." Joint custody can work well when the parties have a cooperative spirit. Although a court can order joint custody, "it cannot order that the [grand]parents stop bickering, stop disparaging one another, or accommodate one another in child-care decisions." Id. In Syllabus Point 4, Lowe v. Lowe, 179 W.Va. 536, 370 S.E.2d 731 (1988), we held:

> A cardinal criterion for an award of jo int custody is the agreement of the parties and their mutual ability to co-operate in reaching shared decisions in matters affecting the child's welfare.

Syllabus Point 9, David M., supra.

Because joint custody requires agreement and cooperation by the parties, in Syllabus Point 8, David M., supra, we stated:

> We do not authorize court-ordered jo int custody over the objections of a primary caretaker parent although parents m ay agree to such an arrangement.

In the present case, the circuit court clearly erred in ordering joint custody over the objections of the maternal grandparents. The relationship among the grandparents was so scarred by the tragedy that neither maternal nor paternal grandparents were able to visit with the child in the other grandparents' house.

The paramount and controlling factor in all custody matters is the child's welfare. David M., supra 182 W.Va. at 61, 385 S.E.2d at 916; J.B. v. A.B., 161 W.Va. 332, 335-36, 242 S.E.2d 248, 251 (1978); Funkhouser v. Funkhouser, 158 W.Va. 964, 969, 216 S.E.2d 570, 573 (1975); Boos v. Boos, 93 W.Va. 727, 117 S.E. 616 (1923): Dawson v. Dawson, 57 W.Va. 520, 50 S.E. 613 (1905). We have long held that "all parental rights in child custody matters are subordinate to the interests of the innocent child." David M., supra 182 W.Va. at 61, 385 S.E.2d at 916. In determining the custody of the child, the circuit court should determine what would be in his best interest.

The record of the present case does not dictate a clear or easy solution to this custody dispute. No question of fitness to raise the child was raised by either set of grandparents. Although the paternal grandparents became the child's primary caretakers after George Ryan S.'s incarceration, there are factors that indicate they should be denied custody. The record indicates that the circuit court identified the following factors for his initial grant of custody to the maternal grandparents: (1) the child would be removed from "the influence of an abusing, murdering parent," and (2) the paternal grandparents' "deliberate ..., wilful ... and active ..." interference with the maternal grandparents' visitation.

However given the passage of time and the joint custody arrangement, we are unable to determine from the record the placement that would best serve the interests of this very young child.

Therefore, we remand this case to ascertain proper custody considering the best interests of the child based on current considerations. On remand the circuit court shall appoint a guardian ad litem for the child and a hearing on the matter shall be held within sixty days. However, we would point out that if both sets of grandparents would prefer to avoid an all or nothing roll of the dice in the circuit court, it is still not too late to agree to some equitable and workable arrangement for joint custody. Indeed, joint custody is entirely acceptable whenever it is agreed to by the parties.

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the judgment of the Circuit Court of Mingo County with respect to the termination of parental rights is affirmed, but with respect to the award of custody is reversed, and this case is remanded with directions to hold a hearing within sixty days to ascertain proper custody consistent with this opinion.

Affirmed in part; Reversed in part; and Remanded with directions.

Footnote: 1 We adhere to our past practice in styling domestic and juvenile cases that involve sensitive facts and do not utilize the last names of the parties. See David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W.Va. 57, 385 S.E.2d 912 (1989); Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W.Va. 57, 356 S.E.2d 464 (1987).

Footnote: 2 Because of a remark made by Wilma S., the circuit court originally restricted Elmer and Wilma S.'s visitation to the house of Kenneth and Phyllis B. However this restriction was modified because Wilma S., who had cared for the child for about one and one-half years, was reluctant to go to Kenneth and Phyllis B.'s house.

Footnote: 3 The circuit court hoped to encourage cooperation between the maternal and paternal grandparents with his modern day Solomon decision of figuratively dividing the child in half. (1 Kings 3:26)

Footnote: 4 George Ryan S. also argues that the proceeding terminating his parental rights was procedurally flawed because he was not physically present. We noted that although George Ryan S. was not present, his rights were protected at the hearing by a guardian ad litem. In addition, most of the evidence concerning George Ryan S.'s parental fitness came from his criminal conviction that was judicially noticed.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syllabus point 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. " ' "A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has permanently transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts." 3. “At the conclusion of the improvement period, the court shall review the performance of the parents in attempting to attain the goals of the improvement period and shall, in the court's discretion, determine whether the conditions of the improvement period have been satisfied and whether sufficient improvement has been made in the context of all the circumstances of the case to justify the return of the child.” Syllabus point 6, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

4. “As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 (1977) will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.” Syllabus point 1, In re R. J. M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

5. "Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 (1977) may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code 49-6-5(b) (1977) that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Syllabus point 2, In re R. J. M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

6. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syllabus point 3, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources's appeal of the November 16, 2010, order of the Circuit Court of Harrison County which terminated the custodial and visitation rights of Anna Y.[1] to her four children, but did not terminate her parental rights to said children.[2] As a result of this order, the children remain in the custody of the Department with no contact with their mother but are not available for permanent placement in an adoptive home. In this appeal the Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter referred to as "the Department"), joined by the children's guardian ad litem, assert that the circuit court erred when it failed to terminate all parental rights of Anna Y.

The Court has before it the petition for appeal, the designated record, the briefs of counsel and the arguments of counsel. For the reasons set forth below, we agree with the Department and the guardian ad litem's contention that the circuit court committed error when it failed to terminated Anna Y.'s parental rights. The circuit court's order is therefore reversed and this matter is remanded forthwith to the Circuit Court of Harrison County for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

[2]All of the father's parental rights were terminated in the order that is the subject of this appeal. The father has not sought appellate review of this order and the appellant herein does not disagree with the lower court's findings and order of termination. Therefore, this appeal addresses only the parental rights of the mother.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Anna Y., (hereinafter referred to as "Appellee"), and Ricky Y., (hereinafter referred to as "Father"), are the parents of four children, to-wit: Kristin Y., born January 4, 1999, and age 11[3]; Arther Y., born March 18, 2000, and age 9; William Y. (known as "Eddy" throughout these proceedings), born May 31, 2002, and age 7; and Scharlotte Y., born May 31, 2002, and age 7.

On April 7, 2008, while the Appellee was hospitalized for what was alleged to be a suicidal[4] overdose of prescription medicine and the children were in the care of their father and his girlfriend, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter referred to as "Appellant" or "Department") sought emergency custody pursuant to W. Va. Code §49-6-3(c) (2009) of the four children. The Department believed the children were in imminent danger of abuse and neglect because the children were currently in the care and custody of Ricky Y., who was prohibited by a 2007 domestic violence protection order from Jefferson County, Ohio, from having contact with the children.[5] Child protective service workers determined that Anna Y. had purported to effectuate a transfer of custody to Ricky Y. by a notarized statement that she was giving the children to their father. Included in that statement was a request to the Jefferson County, Ohio, court system to dismiss the domestic violence protective order. After finding that the children were in imminent danger if left in the care and custody of Ricky Y., the Magistrate Court of Harrison County immediately ratified the removal of the children from his home, and granted the Department temporary custody of the four children. The next day, on April 8, 2008, the Circuit Court of Harrison County entered an order containing findings that returning the children to the home of either parent would be contrary to their best interests because of the current threats of domestic violence, past sexual abuse and the mother's inability to protect the children because of her hospitalization. The circuit court continued the children's custody with the Department.

On April 9, 2008, the Department filed a petition in the Circuit Court of Harrison County alleging that the four children of Anna Y. and Ricky Y. were abused and neglected children. The petition included a number of allegations of child abuse or neglect, including allegations of sexual abuse of Kristin Y. by her father and his girlfriend, maltreatment and sexual exploitation, as well as domestic violence between the mother and father. The Department referenced the domestic violence order of protection from Jefferson County, Ohio, that prohibited the father from having contact with the children. The petition also alleged that the children were witnesses to and subjected to their parents' drug abuse and that the father physically abused the children. The petition also included charges that the living conditions in the children's home were deplorable, unsafe and unfit. The Department alleged in its petition that services to assist the parents in remedying their unfit living conditions and other factors giving rise to potential abuse or neglect of the children were in place as early as October of 2007.[6] The Department alleged that when the children were taken into its custody pursuant to the earlier emergency ratification of custody, the children thanked the protective services workers for coming to get them.

[5]The Appellee alleged in her petition seeking a protective order that "for the entire 10 years we have been married Ricky has choked, raped analy (sic), hit and threatend (sic) my life, most recently has threatened over the phone to blow my head off in front of our kids and told our kids he is going to slit my throat. Also (sic) oldest two kids say he penetrated them."

The circuit court granted temporary custody of the children to the Department. In its order dated April 10, 2008, the circuit court also appointed counsel to the parties, [6]The Department became involved with the Y. family after the Appellee obtained a domestic violence protective order in the State of Ohio. The Department opened a case for services for the family, which resulted in implementation of a safety plan in November of 2007, under which the Appellee agreed that she would not allow the father to have contact with the children. Some of the services provided prior to the filing of the petition included referrals for home-based services, low-cost housing, domestic violence counseling and housing at a domestic violence shelter.

appointed a guardian ad litem for the children and for the Appellee, Anna Y., and appointed a CASA.[7]

This petition was amended on April 18, 2008, to include educational neglect occasioned by the mother's failure to enroll the youngest children in school, as well as her failure to provide the children with adequate shelter. The amended petition further stated that the allegations of sexual abuse, maltreatment and emotional abuse had been substantiated against the father.

On May 8, 2008, the circuit court held a hearing on the allegations of abuse and neglect against the parents. Ricky Y. did not appear at the hearing. The circuit court continued the hearing until June 18, 2008, and ordered that the four children undergo a sexual abuse evaluation. Several weeks later, on May 22, 2008, a second amended petition was filed by the Department. This amended petition contained additional allegations of sexual abuse of the children, including the charge that the father engaged in sexual activity with the children, while the Appellee was present and aware of the father's actions. The amended petition also contained an accusation that the father had held a gun to the Appellee's head in the presence of the children.

On June 9, 2008, the CASA filed a report in which she noted that Kristin Renae Y., the oldest child, was hospitalized for threatening to harm herself. The report indicated that both Kristin Renae Y. and her brother Arther Eugene, were fearful of their father for beating them. The CASA reported that the twins, William and Scharlotte Y., were delayed in their education. The CASA noted in this report that the Appellee had difficulties in maintaining a parental role during visitations with the children. The CASA made specific recommendations at this time, including consistent therapy for the children and speech therapy for the twins.

On June 18, 2008, the circuit court resumed the adjudicatory hearing on the charges and allegations contained in the petitions. At this time the father and Appellee agreed that the children had been abused and/or neglected. The Appellee agreed and stipulated that she had exposed the children to sex and domestic violence, educational neglect and overall inadequate parenting. The circuit court accepted these stipulations and adjudicated the children abused and neglected. The parents separately moved for improvement periods pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(b) (2009)[8]

On July 9, 2008, the circuit court placed Anna Y. on a six-month post-

[8]West Virginia Code §49-6-12(b) states:

> After finding that a child is an abused or neglected child pursuant to section two of this article, a court may grant a respondent an improvement period of a period not to exceed six months when:
> > (1) The respondent files a written motion requesting the improvement period;
> > (3) In the order granting the improvement period, the court (A) orders that a hearing be held to review the matter within sixty days of the granting of the improvement period, or (B) orders that a hearing be held to review the matter within ninety days of the granting of the improvement period and that the department submit a report as to the respondent's progress in the improvement period within sixty days of the order granting the improvement period;
> > (4) Since the initiation of the proceeding, the respondent has not previously been granted any improvement period or the respondent demonstrates that since the initial improvement period, the respondent has experienced a substantial change in circumstances. Further, the respondent shall demonstrate that due to that change in circumstances the respondent is likely to fully participate in a further improvement period; and adjudicatory improvement period, under the terms and conditions enumerated in the family case plan.[9] The father was likewise placed on an improvement period. The children remained in the custody of the Department. The family case plan for the mother required her to address the following issues: general parenting deficiencies; exposure of the children to inappropriate sexual knowledge; domestic violence; inappropriate discipline; and unstable and inadequate housing. As part of this plan Anna Y. was to cooperate with the Department; keep all scheduled appointments with any program recommended by the Department; reschedule any missed appointments and inform the Department of these scheduling changes; comply with and expect unannounced home visits; sign releases for services and treatment; notify the Department within 24 hours of any address change; make weekly contact with the Department; submit to random blood and urine screenings for the presence of illegal or illicit drugs; fully participate in therapy designed to address the nelgect inflicted upon the children; and participate in family therapy if indicated. This family case plan was later amended to include addressing Anna Y.'s past physical abuse of the children.

[9]Family case plans are defined in W. Va. Code § 49-6D-3 (2009) and provide the framework for the goals of the improvement period. The statute requires that "[t]he family case plan is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening those problems." The contents of the family case plan include a listing of the specific, measurable and realistic goals to be achieved; a listing of the problems to be addressed by each goal; a list of the services, including time-limited reunification services; time targets for achievement of goals or portions of goals and the assignment of tasks to the abusing or neglecting parent, caseworker and to other participants in the planning process, as well as other information.

The mother's compliance with the terms and conditions of her improvement period was initially acceptable. Her cooperation was such that in December of 2008, the Department agreed and recommended to extend Anna Y.'s improvement period for an additional three months by order entered January 7, 2009.

During the course of the mother's post-adjudicatory improvement period, more information concerning the abuse and neglect of the children became apparent. The children reported a host of abuses at the hands of their parents, including severe physical abuse, witnessing sexual acts between their parents and other paramours, sexual abuse by their father of other women and dreadful and deplorable living conditions. All of these factors contributed to negative developmental and emotional problems for the children. Kristin Y., the oldest child, was diagnosed with suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder and had to be separated from her siblings. At times, she was hospitalized for psychiatric treatment, and was later placed in a series of specialized institutional and foster care placements. At times following the adjudication of the children as abused and neglected, Arther Y. had to be placed in a group home separate from his younger siblings because of alleged sexual behavior toward his younger brother. Eddy Y. experienced such difficulties in controlling his anger and behaviors that he too had to be placed in specialized foster care placements. The educational needs of the children were also assessed. Eddy Y. and Scharlotte Y. were behind in school because their mother had not enrolled them at an appropriate age.

On April 9, 2009, the circuit court held a regular review hearing to assess the parents' progress in their improvement periods. By this time Anna Y.'s participation in the requirements of her improvement period had lessened. Both the Department and the CASA reported that the mother's home was filthy, unorganized, inadequately furnished and located far away from the school bus stop. The CASA believed that the mother was not compliant with her medication to treat her psychiatric condition because the blood tests administered showed no presences of her prescribed drugs. The Department advised the circuit court that Anna Y. was not regularly attending her therapy sessions and has not appeared for other scheduled appointments. Both the Department and the CASA also reported that visitation had gone well. However, at this time the Department believed that the mother was making some progress on her improvement period goals, but needed additional time to complete her services, and recommended a six-month dispositional improvement period. The CASA reluctantly agreed to the dispositional improvement period. On May 5, 2009, Anna Y. was placed on a six-month dispositional improvement period pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(c)(2009).[10] [10]W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(c) states:

> The court may, as an alternative disposition, allow the parents or custodians an improvement period not to exceed six months. During this period the court shall require the parent to rectify the conditions upon which the determination was based. The court may order the child to be placed with the parents, or any person found to be a fit and proper person, for the temporary care of the

Anna Y.'s compliance with the requirements of the improvement period continued to wane. She refused to take drug screens and stopped attending her therapy sessions after making an allegation of wrongdoing against her counselor. She ceased cooperating with the Department and made allegations of unfair treatment. Anna Y. also began residing in the home of a convicted felon, against the recommendations of the caseworker.

The children continued to make disclosures to the Department and their therapists about their parents' behavior and treatment of them. Kristin Y. continued to disclose incidents of sexual abuse by her father. It was believed that Eddy Y. and Scharlotte Y. witnessed some of this sexual abuse, and that Eddy Y. himself was sexually abused. Scharlotte Y. likewise disclosed sexual abuse by her father. All the children disclosed witnessing sexual activity between their father and their mother. These allegations and more were the basis of another amended petition being filed on July 22, 2009.[11] > child during the period. At the end of the period, the court shall hold a hearing to determine whether the conditions have been adequately improved and at the conclusion of the hearing shall make a further dispositional order in accordance with this section.

[11]It appears no significant action was taken by the court based upon this second petition, including setting the petition for adjudication on the merits, because it was filed so near to the filing of the motions to revoke the improvement period.

On July 23, 2009, the Department filed motions to terminate the improvement periods granted to Anna Y. and the father, based upon non-compliance with the terms and conditions of the improvement periods. Each motion detailed a host of failures on the part of Anna Y. and the father to comply with the Department's directives. Multiple hearings were held on the motions to terminate the improvement periods, beginning in July of 2009 and ending in October of 2009, when the improvement periods expired. Hence, the motions to terminate were rendered moot by the passage of time.

The CASA on October 1, 2009, prepared a written report recommending termination of the parental rights of Anna Y. and the father. In this report, the CASA provided a summary of the services provided to the family. She noted that Kristin Y. had been in eight different placements since the filing of the petition, including a 10-month stay at an inpatient psychiatric facility. Kristin Y. remained in need of specialized institutional care as opposed to a foster home. Arther Y. had been in four separate placements, including a residential group home, but was now in a suitable and appropriate foster care home where he was doing well. William Y. and Scharlotte Y. had been in three placements and were currently placed together and doing well in a foster home.

The CASA expressed concern that "it took 15 months for the respondents to become more serious about participating in services and it took a Motion to Revoke Hearing to accomplish this level of effort." She also observed that neither parent took responsibility or explained how the children gained so much knowledge about sexual matters. They likewise did not accept responsibility for the children's host of behavioral issues. She also noted that the parents engaged in blaming one another for the extreme medical neglect[12] suffered by the children. She expressed her fear that without the parents' acknowledgment and acceptance of their roles in the current state of the children's lives, "I am concerned that the risk to the children remains."

In October, 2009, the disposition of this case commenced. On October 8, 2009, the Department filed its amended family case plan for the four children. The Department recommended termination of the father's and Anna Y.'s parental rights. In the case of Anna Y., the Department noted that she had received one six-month post-adjudicatory improvement, one three-month extension of that improvement period and an additional six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period. The case plan cited 10 reasons for its recommendation, including: the appellee's failure to carry out aspects of the family case plan; the failure to follow through with mental health treatment by missing a number of appointments; the failure to take required drug use screenings; the failure to cooperate and maintain regular contact with her caseworker; the failure to apprise the Department of her employment; a lack of motivation and desire to change her lifestyle in order to provide a safe and stable environment for the children and an inability to control her anger. The case plan also noted that the children had been in foster care for the last 15 of the most recent 22 months, and that pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-5b (2009)[13], the Department was required to request termination or revise the case plan to show a compelling reason for not requesting termination.

Over another series of hearings, beginning in October of 2009, the court heard the testimony of some of the service providers for Anna Y. and the father. These hearings continued, with additional testimony from the children's therapists and service providers, as well as the Department's case worker. At the conclusion of the testimony in November 2009, the court instructed the parties to prepare and present proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law, and to submit arguments regarding a disposition pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(5) (2009).[14] Another hearing was scheduled for December 10, 2009.

[13]Pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-5b(a)(1), the Department is obligated to seek termination of parental rights when a child has been in foster care for 15 of the most recent 22 months as determined by the earlier of the date of the first judicial finding that the child is subjected to abuse or neglect or the date which is 60 days after the child is removed from the home.

[14] W. Va. Code §49-6-5(a)(5) states, in pertinent part:

> Upon a finding that the abusing parent or battered parent or parents are

The parties timely submitted proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law. The Department and guardian ad litem jointly proposed in their submissions that the parental rights of Anna Y. and the father be terminated. Counsel for Anna Y. proposed an alternate disposition pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(5) that would have left the children in the custody of the Department, but retained residual parental rights in Anna Y. so that she may eventually return to seek restoration of her custodial rights.

presently unwilling or unable to provide adequately for the child's needs, commit the child temporarily to the custody of the state department, a licensed private child welfare agency or a suitable person who may be appointed guardian by the court. The court order shall state: (A) That continuation in the home is contrary to the best interests of the child and why; (B) whether or not the department has made reasonable efforts, with the child's health and safety being the paramount concern, to preserve the family, or some portion thereof, and to prevent or eliminate the need for removing the child from the child's home and to make it possible for the child to safely return home; (C) what efforts were made or that the emergency situation made such efforts unreasonable or impossible; and (D) the specific circumstances of the situation which made such efforts unreasonable if services were not offered by the department. The court order shall also determine under what circumstances the child's commitment to the department shall continue. Considerations pertinent to the determination include whether the child should: (I) Be continued in foster care for a specified period; (ii) be considered for adoption; (iii) be considered for legal guardianship; (iv) be considered for permanent placement with a fit and willing relative; or (v) be placed in another planned permanent living arrangement, but only in cases where the department has documented to the circuit court a compelling reason for determining that it would not be in the best interests of the child to follow one of the options set forth in subparagraphs (I), (ii), (iii) or (iv) of this paragraph... .

On December 3, 2009, the CASA wrote a letter to the circuit court again expressing her recommendation that the parental rights of both parents be terminated. "After reviewing numerous reports, attending MDT's[15] and listening to three days of testimony at the Dispositional hearings, in my opinion neither parent has substantially corrected the circumstances that brought Kristen (sic), Arther, Scharlotte and Eddy to the Court's attention," she wrote. She stated that the children would need intensive therapy for a long period of time in an attempt to rehabilitate them from all of the physical and emotional abuse they suffered. She noted that Anna Y. was sporadic in her compliance with the case plan and showed no ability to care for herself despite nearly two years of parenting and individual therapy. She concluded that "these children need to be released from this pain and suffering and be allowed to heal and move on with their little lives."

On January 6, 2010, the circuit court issued[16] a 25-page order regarding the parental rights of both Anna Y. and the father. The father's parental rights were terminated. Anna Y.'s parental rights, however, were not terminated. The court found that termination of Anna Y.'s parental rights was not appropriate in this case "given the specific, tragic facts before the Court." The court concluded that Anna Y. and the children both suffered mental and physical abuse at the hands of Ricky Y., and that Anna Y. "has committed herself to a course of treatment to remedy the conditions of abuse and neglect for which she is responsible."

The circuit court made certain findings summarizing the testimony rendered at the dispositional hearings. Chanin Kennedy, one of the treating psychologists for the children, testified that they possessed inappropriate knowledge of sex. She opined that Arther Y. was particularly traumatized by this information. The circuit court found that "he had a lot of inappropriate information without a lot of understanding." The circuit court found based upon Ms. Kennedy's testimony that the mother denied any involvement in how the children attained such knowledge of sexual matter and that she did attend one session with Ms. Kennedy in 2008, but missed two previously scheduled sessions.

The circuit court found, based upon the testimony of another treating psychologist of the children, Tammy Hamner, that the children would need family therapy prior to reunification with their parents. While the children needed this therapy, the circuit court found that the parents were not ready for reunification therapy as their own individual counseling had not progressed to that level. The circuit court also found that Anna Y. and the father continued to deny involvement in exposing the children to sexual knowledge. The circuit court also found that the children would continue to exhibit behavioral problems and would not be able to settle until they knew whether they would be returned to their parents.

The circuit court found based upon the testimony of Beth Albert, Kristin Y.'s counselor at a hospital placement, that the child was suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder, child abuse and neglect and physical and sexual abuse. She detailed at least one specific instance of sexual contact between Ricky Y. and Kristin Y., and numerous instances of physical abuse, including the father striking the child with his closed fist, a belt and a frying pan. Ms. Albert , and the circuit court found, that because of the abuse by her parents, Kristin's mental health was tenuous, despite being hospitalized for almost a year. Kristin expressed that she did not want to see her father, and wanted her mother to know how she felt about some of the things she believed her mother allowed to happen to her.

The circuit court found, based upon the testimony of Sharon McMillen, the psychologist who treated Arther Y., Eddy Y. and Scharlotte Y., that all three children suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder. The court found that Arther Y. was afraid of his father and had trust issues with his mother. He was fearful and anxious about his future. He had been thrown down the steps by his father. The court found that Arther Y. wanted to stay in his current placement and be adopted by his foster family. The court further found that Scharlotte Y. and Eddy Y. witnessed physical abuse between their parents. Ms. McMillen testified, and the court found, that it was not in the children's best interest to visit with their parents, as this contact was "re-traumatizing them each time they visited." She opined that the children were stuck in the past, and unable to move forward. The court found that "a lack of contact would help the children settle into their placements better."

Testimony from Steve Richardson, who provided parenting and adult life skills training to Anna Y., as well as supervised visits between her and the children, led to the circuit court's finding that although she had received 16 months of parent education, she had yet to actually complete the program. Mr. Richardson also believed that she could not make any further progress in the parent education program. Mr. Richardson termed her demeanor up and down, and felt that her behavior during visits with her children was erratic. He opined, and the circuit court found, that Anna Y. was not ready for unsupervised visits with the children.

With respect to Anna Y.'s then-current mental status, the circuit court found, through the testimony of her counselor, Tom Hill, that she would need six months to address her own trauma and three to four months to address the parenting issues raised throughout these proceedings. The circuit court found that had Anna Y. not "taken a break from treatment" she would have potentially been at a point to begin family therapy at the end of her dispositional improvement period.

Based upon Anna Y.'s own testimony throughout these proceedings, the circuit court found that her excuses for not attending individual counseling were not acceptable, especially in light of her own psychological problems that caused her to be hospitalized.

The circuit court found that while Anna Y. had a deep affection for her children, "she clearly lacks the requisite judgment and mental stability to effectively protect the health, safety and welfare of her children, including addressing the children's significant mental health issues, at this time." The circuit court order concluded that all of the children in this case had suffered trauma because of the actions of Anna Y. and Ricky Y. Specifically, the court concluded:

> The children in this case have suffered severe trauma at the hands of the respondents. The testimony of the treating psychologists revealed that all of the children suffered from post traumatic stress disorder, that the eldest child has been institutionalized for a significant period fo time and continues to remain unstable, that the other children continue to suffer from behavioral issues and sexual acting out, and continue to experience periods of instability to the point that they cannot be reunified. Further, the problems experienced by the children are so significant that they to be separated into three different placements to protect them form acting out on each other, and have been in specialized foster care.

The father's parental rights were severed based upon the court's findings. In regard to Anna Y., however, the court order stated, inter alia:

> While the Petitioner sought straight termination of parental rights for both parents, the position of counsel for the children was that in a limited set of circumstances, post termination contact with only the respondent, Anna Y., may be appropriate for the children. Counsel for the children is of the opinion that post termination contact with Ms. Y. should occur if all of the following conditions are met:
> (a) the minor children request said contact;
> (b) the counselors and/or mental health professionals treating the children believe that the contact will not be detrimental to the child(ren);
> (c) that the contact be strictly supervised by an appropriate adult; and
> (d) if after contact the children deteriorate in any manner, as determined by their counselor and/or mental health provider, that the contact be terminated.

In terms of the progress of the improvement periods granted to the parents, the circuit court determined that "given the degree of the mental trauma suffered by the children, there is no question that after fifteen (15) months nothing more can be done to mitigate, or resolve, the family problems that exist in this case." The court further found that the respondents failed to fully avail themselves of all of the resources offered to them to correct the problems and deficiencies that led to the filing of this matter.

Finally, with respect to Anna Y.'s parental rights, the circuit court concluded as follows:

> This Court concludes that termination of the parental rights of Anna Y. is not warranted given the specific, tragic facts before the Court. It has been proved throughout this matter that both Anna Y. and the children suffered mental and physical abuse at the hands of Ricky J. Y., II. Anna Y. has committed herself to a course of treatment to remedy the conditions of abuse and neglect for which she is responsible.

The Court further finds that the disposition available to it pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(5) is most appropriate for Anna Y., wherein the Court specifically finds that Anna Y. is presently unable to provide for the children's needs, and the children shall therefore be committed to the temporary legal and physical custody of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources for continued placement in their respective foster homes until such time as reunification is accomplished.

The Court further believes that a disposition pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(5) is appropriate because it allows for a gradual transition period, allowing time for the children to emotionally adjust to all the changes while maintaining as much stability as possible.

In making this finding, the Court is mindful that it is not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened...." as stated in Syl. Pt. 1, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980), nor does the Court believe it is doing so. Rather, the Court concludes that Anna Y. has already demonstrated improvement. Ms. Y has made marked improvements in her life which will benefit the children and address the issues that were of concern to the Court.

With the foregoing findings of fact and legal conclusions, it is in the best interest of the children that the disposition of the Respondent mother, Anna Y., be pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(5).

The Department appealed the November 16, 2010, order.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

As set forth above, the Department appeals the ruling of the circuit court that allowed Anna Y. to retain her parental rights on two grounds; first that the circuit court erred by not terminating the parental rights of Anna Y. because there was not a reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse or neglect could be substantially corrected in the near future; and second, that it was in the children's best interest to have the parental rights of their mother terminated. Thus, this appeal is based both on the findings of fact of the circuit court, as well as the circuit court's conclusions of law based upon those facts.

"Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

With these standards in mind, we now consider the arguments of the parties.

III.

DISCUSSION

We begin our analysis with the understanding that our law favors the rights of a parent to raise his or her children.

> " ' "A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has permanently transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts."

Syllabus, State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W. Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d [798] (1969)' ' Syl. pt. 2, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W. Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975)." Syl. Pt. 1, Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W. Va. 710, 356 S.E.2d 464 (1987).

The substantial rights of the parents, however, are not the sole focus of courts in deciding how to dispose of an abuse and neglect case. We have held that these decisions must always be in furtherance of the children's best interests. In all cases involving the disposition of an abuse and neglect case, we have repeatedly stated that "the best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children." Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 192 W. Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) (citation omitted). Further, as we held in Syllabus Point 3 of In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996), "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children. Thus, in furtherance of the goals of balancing the substantial parental rights and notice of the children's best interests, the least restrictive alternative is employed.

The statutory plan for determining whether parental rights should be terminated is set forth in W. Va. Code §49-6-5(a). When it is determined that the conditions that gave rise to the removal of the child from the home cannot be remedied, W. Va. Code §49-6-5(a)(6) (2009) states that termination of the parental, custodial and guardianship rights of the abusing parent is the remedy.[17] Further, W. Va. Code §49-6-5(b) provides a

> Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future and, when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental, custodial and guardianship rights and responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed definition for the phrase "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." The provisions of this section that are pertinent to the case at bar state:

> (b) As used in this section, "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" shall mean that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect on their own or with help. Such conditions shall be considered to exist in the following circumstances, which shall not be exclusive:
> . . .
> (2) The abusing parent or parents have willfully refused or are presently unwilling to cooperate in the development of a reasonable family case plan designed to lead to the child's return to their care, custody and control;
> (3) The abusing parent or parents have not responded to or followed through with a reasonable family case plan or other rehabilitative efforts of social, medical, mental health or other rehabilitative agencies designed to reduce or prevent the abuse or neglect of the child, as evidenced by the continuation or insubstantial diminution of conditions which threatened the health, welfare or life of the child;

child welfare agency...

> (5) The abusing parent or parents have repeatedly or seriously injured the child physically or emotionally, or have sexually abused or sexually exploited the child, and the degree of family stress and the potential for further abuse and neglect are so great as to preclude the use of resources to mitigate or resolve the family problems or assist the abusing parent or parents in fulfilling their responsibilities to the child; or
> (6) The abusing parent or parents have incurred emotional illness, mental illness or mental deficiency of such duration or nature as to render such parent or parents incapable of exercising proper parenting skills or sufficiently improving the adequacy of such skills

However, courts do not have to engage in speculation or guesswork as to when to terminate parental rights. We have previously held:

> As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 (1977) will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.

Syl. pt. 1, In re R. J. M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Thus, in some instances, the only remedy is termination of parental rights when there is no reasonable likelihood that the parenting deficiencies or abuse cannot be substantially corrected. We have held:

> Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 (1977) may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) (1977) that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.

Syl. pt. 2, In re R. J. M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Our review of the case at bar focuses on whether the circuit court's conclusion of law allowing Anna Y. to retain residual parental rights is supported by the circuit court's own findings of fact. After applying the applicable statutory language to the facts found by the circuit court, we find, utilizing the circuit court's own findings of fact, that the clear and convincing evidence presented by the Department showed "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" on the part of Anna Y. Despite having received 16 months of parenting and life skills training at the time of her dispositional hearing, she had yet to complete the program and was actually unable to complete the program. Hours of therapy and missed opportunities for counseling still rendered Anna Y. unable and unequipped to properly parent the children. The court found that there was "no question that after fifteen (15) months nothing more can be done to mitigate, or resolve, the family problems that exist in this case." Furthermore, the court found that "the respondents failed to fully avail themselves of all of the resources offered to them in order to correct the problems and deficiencies that led to the filing of this matter." While arguably Anna Y. had made some improvement, it is clear that after reviewing the record Anna Y. was not able to remedy the facts and circumstances that gave rise to these proceedings.

Despite these findings, the circuit court did not fully terminate Anna Y.'s parental rights. Left intact was the chance for future contact with the children. This contact was, of course, conditioned on a series of events, including the child or children's wishes to see their mother, the consent of the treating psychologists, strict supervision and a chance to terminate the contact if the children's condition deteriorated. These residual rights, however remote and unlikely to be exercised, act to prohibit the children's adoption and permanent placement, which is contrary to this Court's precedent stating that children are entitled to permanency to the greatest degree possible. See In re: Isaiah A., ___ W. Va. ___, 2010 WL 1488012 (W. Va.), citing In re: Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996); State ex rel Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 241, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996); In re Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995); in re Lindsey C., 196 W. Va. 395, 473 S.E.2d 110 (1995) (Workman, J., dissenting).

We find no real error in the lower court's factual findings and find them supported by the clear and convincing evidence in the record. However, the lower court's application of our law to these facts is erroneous. Its failure to terminate Anna Y.'s parental rights and its ultimate conclusion to allow the potential for Anna Y. to have future contact with the four children is an abuse of discretion. The standard applicable herein is whether there is "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future." W.Va.Code § 49-6-5(a)(6). Applying the facts to the statutory definition of when parental rights should be terminated, we find that the lower court's facts amply support the termination of Anna Y.'s parental rights.

We conclude that the facts as developed demonstrate no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future. Hours of therapy, parent education, life skills training and other supportive service, provided through the post-adjudicatory and dispositional improvement periods, have not substantially altered, ameliorated, remitted or modified Anna Y.'s parenting deficiencies. A parent's participation in an improvement period is a clear indicator of the parent's future potential for success and willingness to make the necessary changes to become a fit and suitable parent. Anna Y.'s sporadic cooperation with service providers, her inability to complete a course of parent education over a 15-month period and her failure to fully cooperate with the Department, provide sufficient grounds for the finding that the conditions of neglect or abuse cannot substantially be corrected.

These children are entitled to, and deserve, permanent placements and the opportunity to grow up in loving homes, free from the abuses heaped upon them during their short lives. The circuit court's order deprives the children of the permanency they need, want, deserve and are entitled to have. Based upon the factual record as developed below, in light of the best interests of the children, and the children's rights to permanent placements, this Court reverses the lower court's conclusion that the mother's parental rights should not be terminated.

IV.

CONCLUSION

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the dispositional order of the Circuit Court of Harrison County entered November 16, 2010, is reversed and this matter is remanded with directions for the entry of an order permanently terminating the parental rights of Anna Y. and for such other proceedings as necessary to permanently place the children in appropriate placements. The mandate of this Court shall issue immediately.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by Kenneth E., the natural father of two minors, Kristopher E. and Kenneth C. E., from an order of the Circuit Court of Preston County adjudicating him an abusive and neglectful parent. On appeal, Kenneth E. claims that the evidence fails to show that he has been abusive and neglectful and that, consequently, the decision of the circuit court is erroneous.

I.
FACTS

The appellant in this proceeding, Kenneth E., is the natural father of Kristopher E., who was born on January 1, 1987, and Kenneth C. E., who was born on March 8, 1988. The appellant and the children's mother were divorced shortly after the birth of Kenneth C. E., in the course of the divorce, their mother voluntarily surrendered custody of the children to the appellant.

In the years following the divorce, the two children demonstrated severe behavioral problems. For instance, when they were eight and nine years old, they burglarized a house in Maryland. They were also involved in a number of incidents of destroying property and of terrorizing animals. On one occasion, they stoned a cow until it was unconscious. They also had numerous behavioral problems at school.

The appellant made concerted efforts to deal with the children's problems. For instance, in 1992, the appellant consulted the Krieger Institute, an institution dealing with child behavioral problems, about the problems. He arranged counseling for the children at the Institute, and he himself took a parenting class. He later took and completed STEP parenting courses, and attended additional parenting classes provided by an agency in Maryland.

In 1996, the appellant married for a second time and moved to West Virginia. Following the marriage, Kenneth C. E. engaged in attention-seeking behavior. Among other things, he urinated on bathroom walls; he shoved pencils down a dryer; and he destroyed furniture with an ice pick and cut his clothes with scissors.

In 1998, the appellant became concerned over Kenneth C. E. after he began starting fires in the home and in the woods. He consequently had Kenneth C. E. admitted to Chestnut Ridge Hospital for a 30-day psychiatric examination. The examination resulted in the conclusion that Kenneth C. E. was immature and would outgrow certain of his problems.

Problems continued at home and Kristopher E. began pushing his stepmother around and bruising her. The situation reached the point where the appellant and his wife slept in a locked, downstairs bedroom at night to protect themselves from the children. They also locked their bedroom door during the day to prevent destruction of their property.

In May 2001, the appellant, who was in the National Guard, traveled to California for training. In his absence, the children continued to act up, and on May 23, 2001, their stepmother requested that the Prosecuting Attorney institute juvenile proceedings against them. The Prosecuting Attorney refused to do so. Subsequently, on May 24, 2001, the children's stepmother called the hotline at the Department of Health and Human Resources and suggested that she was going to beat or switch Kristopher E. if he remained in the home. The appellant was contacted in California and asked why the children should not be removed from the home, and he said that he could not answer that question and that, perhaps, the children should be removed. As a consequence, both children were removed from the home on May 24, 2001, and the abuse and neglect petition instituting the present proceeding was filed on the same day.

A preliminary hearing was held in the matter on May 31, 2001, and at that hearing the court found that there was probable cause for the emergency removal of the children. At a subsequent hearing, the appellant, who had been charged with calling the children abusive names ("tub of lard," etc.), admitted that he had used the names on several occasions and that he had sent the children to bed without dinner on four occasions. The events justifying their being sent to bed without dinner were two food fights at the table, a school incident involving a female classmate, and Kristopher E. lying about a note from school.

As the proceeding developed, the appellant executed an agreement with the Department of Health and Human Resources in which he agreed voluntarily to surrender custody of the children to the Department.

The court found the voluntary surrender agreement appropriate, but apparently concluded that it could not properly make the disposition without adjudicating the appellant an abusive and neglectful parent. The court, therefore, proceeded to rule that the evidence adduced showed that the appellant was an abusive and neglectful parent.

It is from the court's ruling that the appellant now appeals. In appealing, he does not object to the children being removed from his custody, but he believes that the removal should occur pursuant to his agreement with the Department of Health and Human Resources. He claims that the evidence fails to prove that he was an abusive and neglectful parent, and he claims that the circuit court erred in holding that he was.

II.
STANDARD OF REVIEW

In Syllabus Point 1 of In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), this Court stated:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and > shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

III.
DISCUSSION

In reaching the conclusion that the appellant had abused and neglected Kristopher E. and Kenneth C. E., it appears that the trial court in the present case relied principally upon evidence that on May 24, 2001, the children's stepmother had told a Child Protective Services worker that she was going to beat or switch Kristopher E. unless he was removed from the home. The court found that when the appellant, who was then in California, was advised of the situation, he did not disagree with the threats made by his wife, but told the social worker handling the case to remove the children from the home. The court noted that the appellant further refused to accept services designed to prevent the removal. The court found:

> The father and stepmother have occasionally used the withholding of meals as punishment for the children, for such offenses as failure to complete chores, to the extent that the children felt that they had to earn their food. While such practice by no means rose to the level of nutritional deprivation, when coupled with other improper disciplinary approaches, it contributed to emotional abuse of the children.

Finally, the court noted that there was testimony by the children suggesting that they had occasionally been physically corrected. The court concluded:

> The evidence shows that for many years, [the appellant] . . . . attempted to provide all of the necessities of life to both children, including seeking out mental health services for them; . . . [t]he evidence shows that, in many ways, [the appellant] . . . tried to properly parent the Infant Children; . . . [r]egardless of the number of [the appellant's] . . . previous efforts to properly parent the children, his refusal to intervene on their behalf on May 24, 2001 constitutes neglect of the Infant Children. . . .

After reviewing the circuit court's decision, this Court cannot find that the court's factual findings were clearly erroneous. There was evidence that the children's stepmother had threatened to beat or switch Kristopher E. on May 24, 2001, and there was also evidence that the appellant had indicated to the Child Protective Service worker handling the case that he did not disagree with his wife's threats and that he refused to accept services designed to prevent removal.

As has previously been stated, the circuit court apparently based its ultimate decision to terminate custody on the conclusion that the children faced a threat at home, rather than on actual physical abuse or neglect which had occurred prior to the filing of the petition.

The circuit court rendered its decision in the case on November 1, 2001. At the time, there was some question in the law as to whether a trial court had authority in an abuse and neglect proceeding to accept a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights in an abuse and neglect proceeding and to terminate parental rights without ruling on the final question of abuse and neglect.

Subsequent to the circuit court's entering its final order, this Court, in the case of In re: James G. and Emmett M. L., III, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 30039, June 13, 2002), recognized that a court could accept a parent's voluntary relinquishment of parental rights and dispose of an abuse and neglect proceeding without adjudicating the abuse and neglect question.

In reviewing the facts of the present case, the Court believes that it is a very close question as to whether the circuit court's decision was clearly erroneous. As indicated in In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., id., a finding should be deemed clearly erroneous if the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. In the present case, the facts show that the appellant and his wife, although plainly disappointed and profoundly upset by the children's long misbehavior, had gone to extraordinary means to cope with the misbehavior in a socially accepted manner. Although they had selectively withheld meals from the children, there was no evidence that they had actually physically harmed the children in the past. The fact that the appellant's wife sought governmental intervention rather than actually beating the children militates against the conviction that she would have carried out her threats. By the time the appellant himself was contacted, the State had already intervened, suggesting that the children were, in fact, protected from his wife's threats.

Although dealing with a very close case, this Court, after reviewing the evidence, comes away with the firm conviction that the trial court's conclusion is erroneous. The Court also senses that the trial court might have ruled otherwise if it had been plain that it could have accepted the voluntary relinquishment without reaching the ultimate abuse/neglect question.

In light of the foregoing, the Court believes that the judgment of the circuit court adjudicating the appellant an abusive and neglectful parent should be reversed. The Court, however, also believes that, given the overall facts of the case, the appellant's parental rights have been relinquished in accord with the agreement into which the appellant voluntarily entered, and that the trial court should so adjudicate.

IV.
CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the Circuit Court of Preston County is reversed, and this case is remanded to the circuit court with directions that the circuit court dispose of the case consistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded
with directions.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Prohibition lies only to restrain inferior courts from proceeding in causes over which they have no jurisdiction, or, in which, having jurisdiction, they are exceeding their legitimate powers and may not be used as a substitute for writ of error, appeal or certiorari." Syllabus Point 1, Crawford v. Taylor, 138 W.Va. 207, 75 S.E.2d 370 (1953).

2. "In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight." Syllabus Point 4, State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W.Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996).

Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon a petition for a writ of prohibition filed by the petitioners, Kristopher and Christina O.,[1] against the respondents, the Honorable James P. Mazzone, Judge of the First Judicial Circuit, and the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter, the "DHHR"). The petitioners, who were foster parents to D.D. for nearly twenty-two months, seek to prohibit the circuit court from enforcing its March 29, 2010, order granting legal and physical custody of D.D. to a paternal aunt as well as its May 18, 2010, order denying their motion to intervene. Based upon the parties' briefs and arguments in this proceeding as well as the pertinent legal authorities, the writ is hereby granted as moulded.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

On April 21, 2008, D.D. was born five weeks premature to J.D., her biological mother, who admitted that she used crack cocaine during her pregnancy. D.D. tested positive for cocaine at birth. On April 28, 2008, as a result of the mother's admission of drug use, the [1]Our customary practice in cases involving minors is to refer to the parties by their initials rather than by their full names. See, e.g., In re Cesar L., 221 W.Va. 249, 252 n. 1, 654 S.E.2d 373, 376 n. 1 (2007).

DHHR filed a petition for relief from parental abuse and neglect with the Circuit Court of Ohio County. Upon being provided legal custody of D.D. by the circuit court, the DHHR placed the infant in the foster care of the petitioners on May 6, 2008. D.D. remained in the continuous foster care of the petitioners at all times prior to the circuit court's March 29, 2010, order, as discussed below.

While D.D. was in the foster care of the petitioners, the DHHR pursued the termination of the parental rights of her biological mother, J.D., and father, L.W.[2] On November 24, 2008, J.D.'s parental rights to D.D. were involuntarily terminated. The order reflecting the termination of J.D.'s rights was entered by the circuit court on November 5, 2009. Thereafter, during a hearing held on December 29, 2009, L.W.'s parental rights to D.D. were also involuntarily terminated. The order reflecting the termination of his parental rights was entered by the circuit court on March 24, 2010.

Beginning in April 2009, when D.D. was one year old, the DHHR arranged for L.W., as well as D.D.'s paternal aunt, K.M., to have weekly ninety-minute supervised visits with the child. Prior to that time, K.M. had not had any contact with D.D. L.W.'s visits stopped upon the termination of his parental rights on December 29, 2009; however, the [2]Although L.W. is not named on D.D.'s birth certificate as being D.D.'s biological father, subsequent DNA tests confirmed that he is her biological father.

DHHR arranged for K.M. to continue supervised visits with D.D. for two hours per week. The DHHR then determined that the best permanent placement for D.D. would be with K.M. Pursuant to this determination, the petitioners were advised on March 25, 2010, that D.D. would be removed from their home on March 29, 2010, and placed with K.M. Following a March 29, 2010, hearing in the circuit court, D.D. was placed with K.M.[3]

According to the petitioners, they verbally advised DHHR officials and the guardian ad litem[4] on numerous occasions prior to March 29, 2010, that they wished to adopt

[3]It is troubling that the DHHR was so certain of the outcome of a court hearing that had not yet been held and it suggests that the DHHR anticipated the circuit court would rubber-stamp its recommendation.

[4]This Court is troubled by the guardian ad litem's limited participation in this appeal. The guardian ad litem filed a bare-bones brief with this Court and then failed to appear for oral arguments to represent the child. A guardian ad litem has a duty to advocate for the child at every level. "We again admonish guardians ad litem that it is their responsibility to represent their clients in every stage of the abuse and/or neglect proceedings. This duty includes appearing before this Court to represent the child during oral arguments. In fact, the guardian ad litem's role to represent the child does not cease until permanent placement of the child is achieved. Syl. pt. 5, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991)." Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 454 n. 7, 460 S.E.2d 692, 700 n. 7 (1995). Moreover, this Court emphasized the need for guardians ad litem to conduct a "full and independent investigation" in Syllabus Point 5 of In Re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), explaining as follows:

> Each child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel. To further that goal, W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992] mandates that a child has a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of abuse and neglect proceedings. Furthermore, Rule XIII of the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts

D.D. In fact, the petitioners assert that just prior to the termination of J.D.'s parental rights, Jason Prettyman, a social services supervisor for DHHR and coordinator for the multi-disciplinary treatment team (hereinafter, "MTD") assigned to the case of D.D., asked the petitioners if they would be interested in adopting D.D. if parental termination was achieved. The petitioners contend that they responded, "Absolutely."

In addition to expressing their desire to adopt D.D. to DHHR officials many times, the petitioners state they requested that the DHHR conduct a bonding assessment to establish the bond D.D. had formed with them. The petitioners contend that while D.D. was in their custody, they were never advised by the DHHR that they were required to submit a > involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court. Rules 1.1 and 1.3 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, respectively, require an attorney to provide competent representation to a client, and to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client. The Guidelines for Guardians Ad Litem in Abuse and Neglect cases, which are adopted in this opinion and attached as Appendix A, are in harmony with the applicable provisions of the West Virginia Code, the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record, and the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, and provide attorneys who serve as guardians ad litem with direction as to their duties in representing the best interests of the children for whom they are appointed.

Given the fact that the petitioners in the case at hand cared for this child for twenty-two months, coupled by the circuit court's failure to provide them notice of and the opportunity to participate in the permanency hearing, the duties of the guardian ad litem were especially critical to a proper determination of the best interests of this child.

written application to convey their intent to adopt D.D. upon the termination of parental rights. As such, the petitioners maintain they believed in good faith that they had made their intention to adopt D.D. known to the DHHR.

As previously noted, the petitioners state that they were first advised by the DHHR that on March 25, 2010, D.D. would be taken out of their custody on March 29, 2010, and that she would be permanently placed into the custody of K.M. At that point, they sought legal counsel who filed a petition to intervene on their behalf. The petitioners contend they were not notified by the DHHR that a permanency hearing for D.D. would be held in the circuit court on March 29, 2010. Instead, the petitioners' counsel maintains that she learned of the permanency hearing on March 26, 2010, but only after contacting the circuit judge's secretary to request a hearing regarding the motion to intervene in the ongoing proceedings.[5]

On March 29, 2010, the circuit court held a permanency hearing in the matter of D.D., but the petitioners were not provided an opportunity to be heard at that hearing, nor was their motion to intervene considered at that time. According to the petitioners' counsel, upon entering the courtroom during the March 29, 2010, permanency hearing, the petitioners were asked to leave as they were advised by the circuit court that the hearing was closed. The record reflects that at that hearing, the circuit court ordered that D.D. be immediately placed in the physical and legal custody of K.M.

On April 27, 2010, almost a month after the permanency hearing, the circuit court held a hearing to consider the petitioners' motion to intervene, and on May 18, 2010, it entered an order denying that motion. Within its May 18, 2010, order, the circuit court found that: the petitioners, as former foster parents, lacked standing to intervene in the matter; that intervention by the petitioners would be contrary to the best interests of D.D.; that the petitioners had failed to submit a written application for adoption of the child to the DHHR within thirty days following the termination of the father's parental rights; and that the DHHR is required to pursue, and West Virginia law favors, placement with blood relatives for abused and neglected children. The petitioners did not appeal the circuit court's May 18, 2010, order. Instead, the petitioners filed a September 20, 2010, petition for a writ of prohibition with this Court.

STANDARD FOR ISSUING A WRIT

A writ of "[p]rohibition lies only to restrain inferior courts from proceeding in causes over which they have no jurisdiction, or, in which, having jurisdiction, they are exceeding their legitimate powers and may not be used as a substitute for writ of error, appeal or certiorari." Syllabus Point 1, Crawford v. Taylor, 138 W.Va. 207, 75 S.E.2d 370 (1953). In order to determine whether the writ of prohibition should be granted, we apply the following standard of review:

> In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight.

Syllabus Point 4, State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W.Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996).

III.

DISCUSSION

A. Writ of Prohibition

The petitioners have filed this petition for a writ of prohibition seeking to void the March 29, 2010, order of the circuit court granting legal and physical custody of D.D. to her paternal aunt, K.M., as well as seeking to void the May 18, 2010, order denying their motion to intervene. The petitioners further request that D.D. be returned to their custody pending future proceedings.[6] [6]The DHHR maintains that the petitioners request for relief is untimely and should not be considered by this Court. In that regard, the DHHR states that while the petitioners style their request for relief with this Court as a petition for a writ of prohibition, they are simply attempting to file a direct appeal of the circuit court's May 18, 2010, order denying them the right to intervene in a child abuse and neglect case. As such, the DHHR believes the petitioners' challenge to the May 18, 2010, order is untimely. Having reviewed the entire matter, we believe that the petitioners' request for a writ of prohibition is appropriate and that the DHHR's argument is without merit. As this Court held in Syllabus Point 1 of Hinkle v. Black, 164 W.Va. 112, 262 S.E.2d 744 (1979):

> In determining whether to grant a rule to show cause in prohibition when a court is not acting in excess of its jurisdiction, this Court will look to the adequacy of other available remedies such as appeal and to the over-all economy of effort and money among litigants, lawyers and courts; however, this Court will use prohibition in this discretionary way to correct only substantial, clear-cut, legal errors plainly in contravention of a clear statutory, constitutional, or common law mandate which may be resolved independently of any disputed facts and only in cases where there is a high probability that the trial will be completely reversed if the error is not corrected in advance.

The petitioners argue that at the time D.D. was removed, they had developed strong emotional bonds with her due to caring for her for twenty-two consecutive months. They further contend that they were D.D.'s psychological parents as they were the only family she had ever known.[7] Nonetheless, the petitioners state that they were not given an opportunity to participate in the hearing to determine D.D.'s best interests. Consequently, the petitioners contend that D.D.'s placement with a relative with whom she had minimal contact was not in her best interests. As such, the petitioners maintain that in denying them an opportunity to be heard at the permanency hearing for D.D., the circuit court exceeded its legitimate bounds of authority, and that their writ of prohibition should be granted.[8]

[7]"A psychological parent is a person who, on a continuing day-to-day basis, through interaction, companionship, interplay, and mutuality, fulfills a child's psychological and physical needs for a parent and provides for the child's emotional and financial support. The psychological parent may be a biological, adoptive, or foster parent, or any other person. The resulting relationship between the psychological parent and the child must be of substantial, not temporary, duration and must have begun with the consent and encouragement of the child's legal parent or guardian. To the extent that this holding is inconsistent with our prior decision of In re Brandon L.E., 183 W.Va. 113, 394 S.E.2d 515 (1990), that case is expressly modified." Syllabus Point 3, In re Clifford K., 217 W.Va. 625, 619 S.E.2d 138 (2005).

[8]The DHHR maintains that the petitioners argument that they were not given notice and the opportunity to be heard during the permanency hearing is without merit due to the petitioners' failure to submit a written application of their intent to adopt the child. The DHHR asserts that while the petitioners may have made verbal statements that they were interested in adopting D.D., that such verbal statements do not satisfy the requirement that foster parents make an application to the DHHR establishing their intent to adopt a child. W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(c) states:

> When a child has been residing in a foster home for a period in excess of six consecutive months in total and for a period in excess of thirty days after the parental rights of the child's biological parents have been terminated and the foster

Upon review of the relevant statutory law, in particular, W.Va. Code § 49-6-5a(c), this Court finds that the circuit court exceeded its legitimate powers when it refused to allow the petitioners to participate in the permanency hearing on March 29, 2010. W.Va. Code § 49-6-5a(c) provides, that "[a]ny foster parent, preadoptive parent or relative providing care for the child shall be given notice of and the opportunity to be heard at the permanency hearing provided in this section." W.Va. Code § 49-6-5a(c) is a plainly worded statute that clearly evidences the Legislature's intention and must be accorded its plain meaning. Thus, the statute may not be interpreted by this Court. "'Where the language of a statute is clear and without ambiguity the plain meaning is to be accepted without resorting to the rules of interpretation.'" Huffman v. Goals Coal Co., 223 W.Va. 724, 729, 679 S.E.2d 323, 328 (2009) (quoting Syllabus Point 2, State v. Elder, 152 W.Va. 571, 165 S.E.2d 108 > parents have not made an application to the department to establish an intent to adopt the child within thirty days of parental rights being terminated, the state department may terminate the foster care arrangement if another, more beneficial, long-term placement of the child is developed: Provided, That if the child is twelve years of age or older, the child shall be provided the option of remaining in the existing foster care arrangement if the child so desires and if continuation of the existing arrangement is in the best interest of the child.

We find no merit to this argument for two reasons. First, W.Va. Code § 49-6-5a(c) does not require foster parents to file an application to adopt the child in order to participate in the permanency hearing. Second, the parental rights of the biological father were terminated by order entered on March 24, 2010. As such, the thirty day time limit for filing an application to adopt had not expired at the date of the permanency hearing.

(1968)). See also Syllabus Point 1, Ohio County Comm'n v. Manchin, 171 W.Va. 552, 301 S.E.2d 183 (1983) ("Judicial interpretation of a statute is warranted only if the statute is ambiguous and the initial step in such interpretative inquiry is to ascertain the legislative intent."). Consequently, the circuit court should have allowed the petitioners to participate in the permanency hearing.

Having found that the petitioners should have been permitted to participate in the permanency hearing, this Court finds it necessary to grant the writ and return this case to the circuit court for another permanency hearing to allow the petitioners the opportunity to be heard. Nonetheless, in order to avoid any unnecessary disruption, until it is determined what custodial arrangement is in the best interests of D.D., legal and physical custody of D.D. should remain with K.M. Should the circuit court determine that any further change of physical and legal custody is required, it must be accomplished via a gradual transition. As discussed more fully below, changes of custody can be traumatic for children if not done in a gradual manner.

B. Concurrent Planning for Permanency

In reviewing this matter, the DHHR's handling of this case from the beginning to the present day is troubling. Based upon the record below, it is apparent that little, if any concurrent planning[9] occurred during the first two years of D.D.'s life. As previously discussed, D.D. was born addicted to crack cocaine. Therefore, shortly after her birth, the DHHR began proceedings to terminate parental rights. It does not appear, however, that the DHHR sought placement with anyone other than the foster parents at that time. While foster care may have indeed been the only option immediately available, K.M. was not contacted by the DHHR until D.D. was one year old.[10] The significant lapse in time by the DHHR is curious due to the fact that it has consistently maintained that it believes that permanent placement with a blood relative is required pursuant to its internal policies.

If the DHHR's policy is to seek permanent placement with a relative, then it should have been seeking a relative placement with the potential for permanency at the outset. It is well-established that every child is entitled to permanency to the greatest extent the legal system can ensure it. See State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W.Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996); In re Jonathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996); In re Brian D., 194 W.Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995); In re Lindsey C., 196 W.Va. 395, 473 S.E.2d 110 (1995) (Workman, J., dissenting); In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

[9]This Court has explained that: "Concurrent planning, wherein a permanent placement plan for the child(ren) in the event reunification with the family is unsuccessful is developed contemporaneously with reunification efforts, is in the best interests of children in abuse and neglect proceedings." Syllabus Point 5, In re Billy Joe M., 206 W.Va. 1, 521 S.E.2d 173 (1999).

[10]The record does not reflect when L.W. or K.M. learned that D.D. was born.

The DHHR should have acted very early to begin concurrent planning and permanency in D.D.'s life in "the level of custody, care, commitment, nurturing and discipline that is consistent with ... [a] child's best interests." State v. Michael M., 202 W.Va. 350, 358, 504 S.E.2d 177, 185 (1998). This Court observed in Amy M., supra, that a child deserves "resolution and permanency" in his or her life and deserves the right to rely on his or her caretakers "to be there to provide the basic nurturance of life." 196 W.Va. at 260, 470 S.E.2d at 214. Moreover, "the best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children." Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W.Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) (citation omitted). See In re Micah Alyn R., 202 W.Va. 400, 409, 504 S.E.2d 635, 644 (1998) (Workman, J., concurring) ("concurrent planning for permanency should occur even where parental rights are not terminated. This should be the practice in all abuse and neglect cases, so that there is a permanency plan for children where family reconciliation efforts are not successful for whatever reason."). In this case, more concurrent planning should have occurred to give D.D. resolution and permanency in her life in a manner that thoroughly considered her best interests.

C. Relative Placement

With regard to placement with a blood relative, this Court is concerned by the DHHR's contention that it is required to place a child with virtually any relative instead of with a foster parent regardless of the emotional bond formed with the foster parents, the length of stay in their home, or the many additional factors important for consideration of a child's best interests. It appears that the DHHR may be conducting its adoption policy in a manner that is inconsistent with West Virginia law. The DHHR explains that in the May 18, 2010, order, the circuit court determined that the DHHR correctly chose to move D.D. to her paternal aunt's house on March 29, 2010, based on the DHHR's internal regulations which provide for a preference for placement with a relative. The DHHR's Adoption Policy § 7.3 states, in part,

> A Grandparent or an adult relative with a positive home study certifying the home for adoption must be given preference over the non-relative home even if the non-relative home has the appearance of a better placement choice.

(Emphasis added). The DHHR states that its internal policy is based on federal law in that the Social Security Act governing the requirements for the award of federal funds to state child welfare programs provides:

> [T]he State shall consider giving preference to an adult relative over a non-related caregiver when determining a placement for a child, provided that the relative caregiver meets all relevant State child protection standards.

42 U.S.C.A. 671(a)(19). (Emphasis added). Given the language in the applicable federal law and in the Department's policy, the DHHR maintains that it correctly determined that D.D.'s paternal aunt, as a relative, must be given preference over the petitioners, who were non-relatives. Accordingly, the DHHR contends that the circuit court's determination that a relative must be given preference was in accordance with state and federal law.[11]

It is clear from our jurisprudence that the only statutory preference within our laws regarding the adoption of a child involves grandparents and reunification of siblings. For example, this Court has explained that:

[11]The record before this Court indicates that the DHHR made its decisions regarding the placement of D.D. based primarily upon its internal preference to place a child with a relative. For example, during the September 10, 2009, multi-disciplinary treatment team meeting, which was attended by one of the petitioners, D.D.'s possible relatives for placement were discussed in the event that the biological father's rights were terminated. It was further determined that D.D.'s paternal aunt, K.M., would be contacted to determine if she would even like to be considered for permanent placement. Conversely, however, the MDT notes of that meeting indicate that the petitioner stated that she was interested in adopting D.D.

Likewise, during the November 2, 2009, MDT meeting, of which both petitioners were present, placement of D.D. with K.M. was discussed extensively. The petitioners requested that a "bonding evaluation" be completed on the child because they stated they were very bonded to the child and that the child referred to them as "mother" and "father" and that the MDT should do what was in the best interest of the child and not the family. The DHHR stated that the case was not at that point as the blood relatives of the child must be considered for potential placement of the child. The notes from that meeting further state:

> Jason Prettyman, discussed at the MDT meeting that he had previously spoken with the foster parents about the issues of placement preference in this case to the foster parents. It was previously explained that the DHHR must considered [sic] relatives of the child and must consider the adoptive parents of the siblings of the child as well. Christina recalled this conversation that she had with Jason Prettyman about placement preference.

> West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a) provides for grandparent preference in determining adoptive placement for a child where parental rights have been terminated and also incorporates a best interests analysis within that determination by including the requirement that the DHHR find that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents prior to granting custody to the grandparents. The statute contemplates that placement with grandparents is presumptively in the best interests of the child, and the preference for grandparent placement may be overcome only where the record reviewed in its entirety establishes that such placement is not in the best interests of the child.

Syllabus Point 4, Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W.Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005). It does not appear, however, that a preference is granted to blood relatives generally. Nevertheless, it seems that the DHHR interprets "shall consider giving preference to an adult relative over a non-relative caregiver" as meaning that it must place a child with any available relative regardless of whether the best interests of the child are served by non-relative placement. Such an interpretation far exceeds any West Virginia statutory requirements and is inconsistent with a federal requirement that the family preference be "considered." See 42 U.S.C.A. 671(a)(19). Compliance with federal policy is certainly important as such compliance is often tied directly to federal funding that is so critical to the implementation and administration of many worthwhile programs. Simply stated, compliance with federal law does not require that a child be placed with a blood relative, it only requires that such placement be considered.

Moreover, even with regard to this State's statutory preference for considering grandparents for adoption of a child in situations wherein the parental rights have been terminated, this Court has clarified that such a preference is not an absolute directive to place children with their grandparents in all circumstances. In re Elizabeth F., 225 W.Va. 780, 786-787, 696 S.E.2d 296, 302-303 (2010). In In re Elizabeth F., this Court explained that "an integral part of the implementation of the grandparent preference, as with all decisions concerning minor children, is the best interests of the child." 225 W.Va. at 787, 696 S.E.2d at 303. Moreover,

> [o]nce a court exercising proper jurisdiction has made a determination upon sufficient proof that a child has been neglected and his natural parents were so derelict in their duties as to be unfit, the welfare of the infant is the polar star by which the discretion of the court is to be guided in making its award of legal custody.

Syllabus Point 8, in part, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). Accord Syllabus Point 3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) ("[T]he primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect ... must be the health and welfare of the children."); Syllabus Point 5, in part, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996) ("In ... custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child."). This Court further explained In re Elizabeth F. that:

> Thus, adoption by a child's grandparents is permitted only if such adoptive placement serves the child's best interests. If, upon a thorough review of the entire record, the circuit court believes that a grandparental adoption is not in the subject child's best interests, it is not obligated to prefer the > grandparents over another, alternative placement that does serve the child's best interests. See Syl. pts. 4 & 5, Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W.Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801. Because the circuit court accorded the grandparents an absolute preference in this case despite its expressed concerns about the propriety of such a placement, we reverse the circuit court's decision.

225 W.Va. at 787, 696 S.E.2d at 303. In consideration of all of the above, it is clear that the petitioners in this case received little to no actual consideration for permanency in spite of the fact that they cared for this child for twenty-two consecutive months. More importantly, the failure to consider the petitioners for permanency also resulted in their inability to present evidence to the circuit court regarding the child's best interests based upon their continuous and long-term care for that child.

D. Gradual Transition

Finally, the manner in which D.D. was removed from the custody of the petitioners and placed with K.M. is concerning. D.D. was removed from the petitioners' home after twenty-two months of continuous care by the petitioners. This seems to have been done in a manner vastly inconsistent with our case law. For instance, it has been long understood that the law governing child custody directs that a child's best interests are best served by a gradual transition to a new home. In that regard, Syllabus Point 3 in James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991) provides,

> It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever > possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives.

This concept has been reiterated on several other occasions. Accord In re Maranda T., 223 W.Va. 512, 678 S.E.2d 18 (2009); Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W.Va. 512, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005); In re Desarae M., 214 W.Va. 657, 591 S.E.2d 215 (2003); In re Jade E.G., 212 W.Va. 715, 575 S.E.2d 325 (2002); In re Edward B., 210 W.Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001); In re Brian James D., 209 W.Va. 537, 550 S.E.2d 73 (2001); In re Zachary William R., 203 W.Va. 616, 509 S.E.2d 897 (1998); Matter of Taylor B., 201 W.Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997); In re Jonathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996); State ex rel. Virginia M. v. Eugene S., 197 W.Va. 456, 475 S.E.2d 548 (1996); Weber v. Weber, 193 W.Va. 551, 457 S.E.2d 488 (1995); Michael Scott M. v. Victoria L.M., 192 W.Va. 678, 453 S.E.2d 661 (1994); Feaster v. Feaster, 192 W.Va. 337, 452 S.E.2d 428 (1994); Robert Darrell O. v. Theresa Ann O., 192 W.Va. 461, 452 S.E.2d 919 (1994); Alonzo v. Jacqueline F., 191 W.Va. 248, 445 S.E.2d 189 (1994); Snyder v. Scheerer, 190 W.Va. 64, 436 S.E.2d 299 (1993).

The record shows that a gradual transition did not occur in transferring the child to K.M.'s home. The child was taken from the petitioners' home and all contact with her ceased at that time. The DHHR argues in its brief to this Court that "[b]y their own admission the [petitioners] have not had any visitation with [D.D.] since she was removed from their care." While that is true, it certainly was not the petitioners' choice for that to have occurred. In fact, it highlights the very problem with the circuit court's failure to provide for an appropriate transition of this child to a new home. The petitioners consistently informed the DHHR that they wished to adopt this child. Nonetheless, the DHHR removed the child from their home with virtually no notice and then abruptly ended all contact with the child for whom they had consistently provided care and nurturance for twenty-two months.

In Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989), in recognizing that a gradual six-month transition of custody from the stepfather to the biological father was warranted, this Court observed with respect to the child's longtime residence with her stepfather and half-brother that "[t]hese familial surroundings are the only ones she has ever known, and it is undisputed that she has developed a close and loving relationship with her stepfather." 182 W.Va. at 450, 388 S.E.2d at 323. Thus, by recognizing the significant role her stepfather had played in the child's life as her psychological parent, this Court accorded visitation privileges to him, as well as to the child's half-brother, despite the ultimate award of the child's custody to her biological father. Similarly, in Maynard, supra, this Court required the circuit court to establish a plan for a gradual shift of custody.

As this Court stated in In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W.Va. 346, 355, 532 S.E.2d 64, 73 (2000), "[e]xplicit in both Honaker v. Burnside and James M. v. Maynard is the principle that the circuit court, and not the Department or a private agency, bears the burden of crafting a plan for the gradual transition of custody." Moreover, "[w]hen a circuit court determines that a gradual change in permanent custodians is necessary, the circuit court may not delegate to a private institution its duty to develop and monitor any plan for the gradual transition of custody of the child(ren)." Syllabus Point 7, In re George Glen B., Jr. Upon reviewing the transcript of the March 29, 2010, permanency hearing, it is clear that the circuit court did not develop or consider any plan for a gradual transition of D.D. to K.M. Said another way, the record is devoid of any discussion by the circuit court with the petitioners (because the petitioners were not permitted to participate in the hearing), the DHHR, or the guardian ad litem regarding any reasonable concerns that would arise from an abrupt change of custody. There was no discussion concerning a sufficient adjustment period nor was there a discussion about whether or not the petitioners should be allowed continued visitation with this child who referred to them as mother and father. A child should not be treated like a sack full of potatoes picked up from a local grocery store. The law requires that there must be a gradual transition in cases such as the one before us.

Clearly "[t]he best interests of a child are served by preserving important relationships in that child's life." Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. Treadway v. McCoy, 189

W.Va. 210, 429 S.E.2d 492 (1993). As stated, the petitioners were the foster parents of D.D. for nearly two years and had formed a significant relationship with the child. Nonetheless, it appears that she was removed from the one stable home she had known, and was placed elsewhere, without any type of gradual transition and without affording her foster parents any visitation. Pending further resolution of these issues, it is difficult to see how the circuit court could direct the removal of this child from the petitioners' home without taking into consideration anything regarding the first two years of the child's life. Nor did the court even consider the child's right to continued relationship with those to whom she had bonded. See Syllabus Point 11, In re Jonathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996) ("A child has a right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond, including foster parents, provided that a determination is made that such continued contact is in the best interests of the child.").

It seems that the circuit court did not have a sufficient record to support its determination to remove the child while not even considering visitation by the petitioners.[12]

[12]The petitioners also contend that the circuit court's May 18, 2010, order denying their motion to intervene was clearly erroneous as a matter of law. It is unnecessary to address this issue in light of our holding that the circuit court shall hold a hearing to allow the petitioners to be heard with regard to permanency of the child. This Court does, however, wish to point out that the circuit court erroneously determined in its May 18, 2010, order that the petitioners lacked standing to intervene due to the fact that they were "former" foster parents on the date that the motion to intervene was actually considered by the circuit court. As discussed, the petitioners filed a motion to intervene on March 26, 2010, in the permanency proceedings on March 29, 2010. They were the physical custodians of D.D.

Unfortunately, in denying the petitioners the opportunity to participate in the permanency hearing, the circuit court has created a quandary—a child who knew and bonded with one family for nearly two years and who now has likely bonded with another parent for approximately ten months. The task now before the circuit court is made more difficult by this conundrum as the question of the child's best interests is now even more complicated. Therefore, the circuit court should act immediately to hold further hearings with full participation by all parties on the best interests of this child and her proper permanent placement. Because this Court has said that children have a right to continued association with those to whom they have formed close emotional relationships, the circuit court should also consider whether the current circumstances justify continued association/visitation by the child with whichever family ultimately is not chosen as her permanent custodian. See Syllabus Point 11, In re Jonathan G., supra. To facilitate the commencement and conclusion of the remand proceedings, we issue the mandate of the Court contemporaneously with the issuance of this opinion.

until she was removed from their foster care pursuant to the permanency proceedings on March 29, 2010. The petitioners did have standing to file the motion.

IV.

CONCLUSION

The petitioners were not given notice of and the opportunity to be heard at the permanency hearing as provided by W.Va. § 49-6-5a(c). Based upon the foregoing, this Court grants the writ of prohibition as moulded, and remands this matter to the circuit court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. The mandate of this Court shall issue contemporaneously herewith.

Writ Granted as Moulded.

The Opinion of the Court was delivered PER CURIAM.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "The writ of prohibition will issue only in clear cases where the inferior tribunal is proceeding without, or in excess of, jurisdiction." Syllabus, State ex rel. Vineyard v. O'Brien, 100 W.Va. 163, 130 S.E. 111 (1925).

2. "In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight." Syl. Pt. 4, State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W.Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996).

3. "'Courts are not constituted for the purpose of making advisory decrees or resolving academic disputes.' Mainella v. Gainer, 184 W.Va. 656, 403 S.E.2d 399 (1991).

4. "The best interests of a child are served by preserving important relationships in that child's life." Syl. pt. 2, State ex rel. Treadway v. McCoy, 189 W.Va. 210, 429 S.E.2d 492 (1993).

5. "A child has a right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond, including foster parents, provided that a determination is made that such continued contact is in the best interests of the child." Syl. Pt. 11, In re Jonathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996).

6. "A statutory provision which is clear and unambiguous and plainly expresses the legislative intent will not be interpreted by the courts but will be given full force and effect." Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Epperly, 135 W.Va. 877, 65 S.E.2d 488 (1951).

Per Curiam:

By means of this original jurisdiction action, Kathryn Kutil and Cheryl Hess (hereinafter collectively referred to as "Petitioners") seek a writ of prohibition to bar enforcement of the November 21, 2008, order [1] of the Circuit Court of Fayette County. Petitioners specifically are seeking to prevent the female infant, Baby Girl C. (hereinafter "B.G.C."),[2] from being removed from their foster home. B.G.C. was placed in Petitioners' home as a foster child by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR")[3] shortly after the child's birth. Petitioners are a same sex couple whose home had been approved by DHHR for both foster care and adoption. The removal of the infant was ordered at the conclusion of an abuse and neglect permanency hearing at which the lower court accepted the recommendation that B.G.C.'s case be transferred to the adoption unit of DHHR. In its removal order, the lower court directed that B.G.C. be moved

[1]As related later in this opinion, the order was orally made at the conclusion of an evidentiary hearing held on November 21, 2008, and thereafter incorporated in a written order dated December 2, 2008.

[2]Following our traditional practice in child abuse and neglect matters and other cases involving sensitive facts, we will not reveal the child's last name. See, e.g., In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 226 n. 1, 470 S.E.2d 177, 180 n. 1 (1996).

[3]Both Judge Paul M. Blake (hereinafter "Respondent") and DHHR are named as respondents in the petition before us; however, prohibition does not lie against DHHR under the facts of this case because the agency was not acting in a judicial capacity. See W.Va. Code § 53-1-1 (1923) (Repl. Vol. 2008); State ex rel. Miller v. Smith, 168 W.Va. 745, 756, 285 S.E.2d 500, 506 (1981) (performance of executive duties is not subject to a writ of prohibition).

In consideration of the arguments of the parties,[4] copies of court documents supplied with the briefs as exhibits and applicable legal authorities, we grant the relief requested.

I. Factual and Procedural Background[5]

When B.G.C. was born on December 8, 2007, she tested positive for the presence of cocaine and oxycodone in her bloodstream. On this basis, while B.G.C. was still in the hospital DHHR instituted abuse and neglect proceedings against the biological mother,[6] and was granted custody of B.G.C. on December 13, 2007. At the same time, the court appointed a guardian ad litem (hereinafter "GAL") for B.G.C. Upon discharge of the infant from the hospital on December 24, 2007, DHHR placed B.G.C. directly into Petitioners' home, which had been approved previously by DHHR for both foster parenting and adoption and was then serving as a foster home for several other children.[7]

We have received three amicus briefs supporting Petitioners' position: one jointly authored by the American Civil Liberties Union, American Civil Liberties Union of West Virginia and People for the American Way Foundation; a second representing the collaborative efforts of Foster Care Alumni of America, COLAGE, CASA (Court Appointed Special Advocates) of the Eastern Panhandle, Inc. and Fairness West Virginia; and the third presented by the National Association of Social Workers, National Association of Social Workers – West Virginia Chapter, Evan B. Two amicus briefs were filed in support of Respondents' position: one by The American College of Pediatricians and the other by The Family Policy Council of West Virginia. We value the participation of these groups and the insights their briefs lend to the parties' arguments.

A motion to remove B.G.C. from the foster home was filed by the infant's GAL on January 24, 2008.[8] In support of his motion, the GAL maintained that removal was necessary even though the home appears "to be comfortable and physically safe for the infant respondent . . . [he nonetheless believed] that the best interest of the child is not to be raised, short term or long term, in a homosexual environment and that the same is detrimental to the child's overall welfare and well-being." DHHR and the foster parents filed responses objecting to the motion. The motion was entertained at a January 31, 2008, hearing at which the lower court granted intervenor status to Petitioners. The February 25, 2008, order issued as a result of this hearing reflects that the court determined "not [to] interfere with the current foster care placement at this time" and reserved ruling on the removal motion as well as the GAL's request for full hearing on the motion.

[7]Ms. Kutil's adopted daughter, who had initially been placed by DHHR in the home as a foster child, was among the children present when B.G.C. was placed in the foster home. It is noteworthy that the adoption, which also occurred in Fayette County, was approved by the other judge in the circuit.

[8]The motion also asked the court to enter a statewide injunction against DHHR to prohibit the agency "from placing foster children in homosexual homes," for which the lower court ultimately determined it lacked jurisdiction.

The child's biological mother was granted two improvement periods, however, she failed in her efforts to become a fit parent. The biological mother's parental rights were terminated at a dispositional hearing held on October 8, 2008, which termination is memorialized in a November 5, 2008, order. Shortly following the termination, a multidisciplinary treatment team (hereinafter "MDT") met to discuss B.G.C.'s future. A "MDT/Status Report" dated October 28, 2008, containing the results of this meeting was submitted to the court. The report reflected that the MDT endorsed the transfer of B.G.C.'s case to DHHR's regional adoption unit and recommended that B.G.C. remain in Petitioners' home during the adoption process. The MDT report also related that the team had been informed by the adoption unit supervisor that "there would be no reason for the Adoption Unit to move . . . [B.G.C.] due to family members and siblings being previously ruled out[9] . . . . [and that] the Adoption Unit would be reluctant to 'uproot' a child from the only home she knows." The only member of the MDT who objected to the recommendation was the GAL. Following the release of the MDT report, DHHR issued a permanency plan on [9]In response to an order of the lower court, DHHR had conducted home studies to determine if a custodial arrangement with a family member or sibling was feasible. These efforts resulted in finding that no such acceptable placement existed for B.G.C.

October 31, 2008, indicating the department's position that adoption was in the best interest of B.G.C.

The permanency plan also noted that Petitioners had expressed the desire to adopt B.G.C. followed by a list of reasons why the home would be appropriate for adoption.

A permanency hearing in the abuse and neglect case was held on November 6, 2008, at which the GAL renewed his motion for removal of B.G.C. from a "homosexual home." The lower court set forth its findings from the initial permanency hearing in a November 12, 2008 order. The order begins with a summary of the positions of the parties and then states the observations and findings of the lower court, including the following:

> 29. It also appears to the Court that the fairness showed by the Court by allowing the child to remain with the foster parents pending resolution of the case is now being used to support the argument that, since the child is developing bonds with the intervenors, the child should not be removed from the intervenors' care, and that adoption by the intervenors should be recommended without pursuing adoptive parents which could provide a more traditional home setting.
> 31. The Court FINDS that children need both mother and father and that avenues to such a result should at the least be explored by the DHHR. The Court FINDS that untraditional family settings should not be the first and only route taken by the DHHR when searching for a permanent/adoptive placement for a child.

The November 12 order also includes the following conclusions of law:

> 4. The Court CONCLUDES that Circuit Courts are not required to accept the Permanency Plan of the DHHR and may either accept, reject or modify said recommendation depending on whether or not the Court finds it to be in the best interests of the child at issue.
> 5. The Court CONCLUDES that the polar star in all matters involving children is what is in the best interest of the child.
> 7. The Court CONCLUDES that the standards and guidelines in the Rules applicable for permanency placement review hearings are also applicable and should be considered during the initial permanency plan hearings. Pursuant to these standards and guidelines imposed upon the Courts, the Court must consider, among other things, the appropriateness of the current placement of the child and whether it is the most family-like setting. See Rule 41(a)(6).[10]

---

[10]Although not squarely before us, an argument raised in the amicus brief jointly submitted by the American Civil Liberties Union, the American Civil Liberties Union of West Virginia and the People for the American Way Foundation maintains that the lower court incorrectly relied upon the parenthetical reference to "most family-like" placement in Rule 41(a)(6) to arrive at the conclusion that a traditional home consisting of a mother and father is a preferred foster placement or adoptive home in this state. The first point argued in the brief is that the Abuse and Neglect Rules do not govern adoption proceedings and cannot be used to support the concept that the law favors adoption by married couples. It is then proposed that the provision in Rule 41(a)(6) of the Rules of Procedure for Abuse and Neglect Proceedings (hereinafter "Abuse and Neglect Rules") requiring consideration of whether a foster home placement of an abused and neglected child is "the least restrictive one (most family-like one) available," simply indicates a preference for a foster home over a group home or institutional setting. As further support for this position, reference is made to the following related Abuse and Neglect Rule provisions: Rule 41(a)(10)(E) ("If placement in a group home or institution is recommended [matters for discussion at a permanent placement review conference should include]: (i) An explanation of why

8. The Court CONCLUDES that, if at all possible, it is in the best interest of children to be raised by a traditionally defined family, that is, a family consisting of both a mother and a father. The Court CONCLUDES that non-traditional families, such as the intervenors, should only be considered as appropriate permanent/adoptive placements if the DHHR first makes a sufficient effort to place the child in a traditional home and those efforts fail. In other words, if the DHHR has attempted in good faith to secure a traditional family to adopt the child and the DHHR's attempts fail, then a non-traditional family may be considered as an adoptive placement. This did not occur in the present case.

9. For the above stated reasons, the Court CONCLUDES that it can only tentatively approve the Permanency Plan pending argument/hearing to address the issues raised in this hearing regarding the Permanency Plan, including the extent of the Court's authority over the execution of the Permanency Plan . . . and argument/evidence in support of and in opposition to the guardian ad litem's pending motions.

10. The Court CONCLUDES it is necessary and in the best interest of the child to ORDER that the DHHR place the child in a traditional home setting with a mother and a father. The Court deems such action necessary to materially promote the best interests of the child. In recognition of the bonds that may have formed between the child and the intervenors, and to lessen any stress on the child, the Court CONCLUDES that it is in the best interests of the infant child that the removal from the intervenors' home and placement in a traditional home (Emphasis in original.) The order also set November 21, 2008, as the date on which the evidentiary hearing regarding the permanency plan would be held.

On November 17, 2008, Petitioners petitioned this Court for a writ of prohibition accompanied by a motion for an emergency stay of the lower court's order of removal. The lower court rendered both matters moot by entering an order on November 18, 2008, staying its removal order.

DHHR had objected to the removal of B.G.C. from Petitioner's home until the day of the November 21, 2008, evidentiary hearing. Prior to the hearing convening that day, DHHR informed the lower court by fax that B.G.C. needed to be moved to another foster care home because Petitioners' home was over the capacity limit set for foster homes.[11] At the hearing it was made known that the last foster placement by DHHR in

Petitioners' home had occurred on October 31, 2008, shortly before either of the permanency plan hearings.

The evidence presented at the November 21, 2008, hearing included the testimony of DHHR adoption and child protective service workers, both Petitioners and two expert witnesses – a clinical psychologist called by the GAL, and a clinical/forensic psychiatrist called by Petitioners.[12] At the conclusion of the hearing, the lower court renewed its previous finding that adoption was the proper permanency plan for B.G.C. and ordered from the bench that B.G.C. be removed from Petitioners' home by noon the following day for placement in the home of a married couple DHHR had identified as a potential adoptive home. The lower court later summarized the basis for its action in a December 2, 2008, order. This order included the following relevant findings of fact and conclusions of law:

> 13. The Court FINDS that the Kutil-Hess household may be the most appropriate adoptive placement home for the child, but it is unfair not to allow the child the option to be adopted by a traditional family. The child should be given the opportunity to be adopted by mother-father adoption and not be locked into a single parent adoption.

foster care homes. See 78 C.S.R. 2-3.18 (providing that a foster family home may care for five or less children), contra 78 W.Va. C.S.R. § 2-13.3.a. (providing that the number of children who may reside in a foster home "may not exceed six (6).").

[12]According to their testimony, neither of the experts actually assessed B.G.C.'s foster home relationships or environment.

15. The Court FINDS that the Permanency Plan of transition to the DHHR Adoption Unit is appropriate and should be accepted by this Court.

16. The Court FINDS that [B.G.C.] is presently in the intervenors' home, however, the DHHR has found the intervenors' home is over capacity and has asked the Court to remove the child with a transitional period, based upon that reason. Thus, the Court FINDS that [B.G.C.] should be moved immediately. The Court FINDS that placement of [B.G.C.] in a home with a married mother and father pending such adoption process is most appropriate for the child's well being.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Court CONCLUDES that the intervenors cannot adopt this child as a couple because of statute. The intervenors argue that they are the only proper parties to be considered for the adoption of [B.G.C.]; however, under West Virginia law §48-22-201, only married couples, married persons with consent of their spouse, or single persons may petition to adopt a child. For this reason, the Court CONCLUDES that the intervenors cannot lawfully petition together to adopt B.G.C., only one of the two intervenors may petition for adoption.

2. The Court CONCLUDES that the DHHR's request for removal based upon the fact that the intervenors' home is overcapacity should be GRANTED as it is in the child's best interest. Further considering the well-being of the child, the Court CONCLUDES and ORDERS that the child be removed from the intervenors' home by 12:00 noon November 22, 2008.

Before the written order was issued, Petitioners acted on the pronouncement of the lower court at the November 21 hearing by again seeking an emergency stay by this Court of the removal order. We granted the stay requested on November 26, 2008.[13] Thereafter, on December 9, 2008, this Court granted Petitioners leave to amend their previously filed petition for a writ of prohibition which is now under consideration.

II. Standard of Review

The original jurisdiction authority of this Court to consider matters of prohibition stems from Article VIII, § 3 of the West Virginia Constitution. That authority is further recognized and defined by statute and rule. See W.Va. Code §§ 51-1-3 (1923); 53-1-2 (1933); W.Va. R. App. P. 14. Historically, we have been guarded about granting relief in prohibition, reserving its use for extraordinary situations. As we stated in the syllabus of State ex rel. Vineyard v. O'Brien, 100 W.Va. 163, 130 S.E. 111 (1925), "[t]he writ of prohibition will issue only in clear cases where the inferior tribunal is proceeding without, or in excess of, jurisdiction."

Petitioners do not allege that the lower court acted without jurisdiction of the subject matter and parties in the abuse and neglect action, but instead maintain that the lower court went beyond the bounds of its authority in ordering removal in this case. In such circumstances, we consider those measures outlined in syllabus point four of State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W.Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996), which reads as follows:

> In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight.

With this standard in mind, we proceed to consider whether it was proper for the lower court to order removal of the infant from Petitioners' home.

III. Discussion

Petitioners assert that the lower court was exceeding its legitimate authority by ordering the removal of B.G.C. from their home for placement in a traditional home which the court defined as headed by a mother and a father. Respondent asserts that removal was legally required under the circumstances before it because: (1) Petitioners as a couple are not permitted to adopt a child under the provisions of the adoption statute, and (2) the number of children residing in Petitioners' foster home exceeded the statutory limit. It is upon these legal foundations that Respondent maintains that it was necessary to order removal of the child from the home. Respondent further contends it also was appropriate to order placement of B.G.C. with a suitable married couple interested in adoption given the legislative preference expressed in the adoption statutes for adoption by married couples.

A. Removal

As to Respondent's first ground for removal, it is not at all clear that the issue of joint adoption by unmarried parties was before the court. It is important to keep in mind that the purpose of the permanency hearing in an abuse and neglect case is to determine what type of permanent placement would provide "the level of custody, care, commitment, nurturing and discipline that is consistent with . . . [a] child's best interests." State v. Michael M., 202 W.Va. 350, 358, 504 S.E.2d 177, 185 (1998). And although adoption is the preferred permanent placement for a child when parental rights are terminated,[14] it is but one permanent placement option which DHHR may recommend in its permanency plan.[15]

[14]Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Michael M., supra.

[15]See W.Va. Code § 49-6-5a (2007) (Supp. 2008); R. 41, W. Va. Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect (identifying possible permanent living arrangements which may be recommended in abuse and neglect cases as returning a child to parent(s), adoption, placement of a child with fit and a willing relative, a legal guardian or in another planned permanent arrangement, including institutional settings).

It was made abundantly clear during the course of the hearings in the present case that the permanency plan is designed to recommend a general course of action regarding future placement of a child after parental rights have been terminated, and that it would be premature for DHHR to recommend a particular adoptive home at the permanency hearing. Certainly, DHHR has the responsibility to develop a permanent placement plan for a child contemporaneously with reunification efforts,[16] but the details of the plan necessarily depend on the course of action the court determines to be most suitable under the circumstances. According to the testimony of DHHR workers, a particularized plan for a child whose recommended permanent placement is an adoptive home would not be completed until after the child's case is transferred to DHHR's adoption unit because the agency's operations involving adoptive home selection are run separately from DHHR's operations involving services for abuse and neglect victims. We further note that although Petitioners may have indicated the desire to make B.G.C. a permanent part of their household, there was no formal joint or individual request for adoption pending before the court at the permanency hearings.

This Court has clearly and consistently maintained that "'[c]ourts are not constituted for the purpose of making advisory decrees or resolving academic disputes.' Mainella v. Board of Trustees of Policemen's Pension or Relief Fund of City of Fairmont, 126 W.Va. 183, 185-86, 27 S.E.2d 486, 487-88 (1943)." Syl. Pt. 2, in part, Harshbarger

v. Gainer, 184 W.Va. 656, 403 S.E.2d 399 (1991). It was thus inappropriate for the lower court to rule as a matter of law on the subject of the propriety of joint adoption of a child by a same sex couple because it was not a matter pending before the court. Moreover, Petitioners have represented to this Court that joint adoption is not being sought, and Ms. Kutil has informed DHHR of her interest in adopting B.G.C. as a single person.

We next consider whether overcapacity suffices as a ground for removal of B.G.C. from her home. As was noted earlier, there were seven children residing in Petitioners' foster home during the time period when both permanency hearings occurred. Whether the upper limit for the number of children who may reside in a foster home is five or six,[17] Petitioners' foster home was overcapacity and the situation needed to be corrected.[18] Our concern lies with the manner in which the problem was rectified.

In its response to the pending writ of prohibition, DHHR stated that the change in the agency's position regarding removal of B.G.C. only occurred because of "overcrowding at Petitioners' home and the ready availability of a foster home that was willing and capable at the time to accept the infant, ... [and the agency] did not at that time have a placement available for the children who were most recently placed in the Petitioners' home." DHHR then added, "Nowhere has WVDHHR indicated that the home provided by Petitioners was anything other than loving and nurturing." Despite the number of times that this Court has stated the best interest of the child is the polar star upon which decisions involving children are to be based,[19] DHHR did not even consider whether the individual needs of B.G.C. would be best served by removing her from Petitioners' care, but instead opted for a swift and ready solution to the problem the agency created. The agency simply turned a blind eye to the fact that B.G.C. had been placed in the foster home a number of months before some of the other children then in the home, and ignored any consideration of the impact relocation would have on B.G.C.'s emotional, physical and mental development. By following the lead of DHHR, the lower court erred in not closely examining the individual needs of B.G.C. as well as of the other children placed in Petitioners' home to determine how the best interests of all the children would be served while remedying the overcapacity problem of the foster home.

[18]We find it disconcerting that DHHR just "discovered" the overcapacity issue on the date of the hearing when the agency had created the situation by placing what appears to have been more than one child in the home a month earlier. Even accepting DHHR's representation that the worker who handled the last placement in the home misunderstood relevant procedures, it is certainly not clear why it took a month for the agency to uncover this problem.

No evidence was produced at the hearings as to Petitioners providing anything but quality care in their foster home, or of any particular problems B.G.C. was experiencing in her foster home environment. Consequently, the main concern in solving the overcrowding problem should have been what affect the disruption of relocation would have on the emotional and physical well-being of the individual children in the home. The length of time each of the foster children was in the home no doubt would affect the strength of the emotional bond that had developed between each child and Petitioners as well as their sense of comfort and security with their home environment. The only home B.G.C. had ever known in the eleven months of her life had been Petitioners' foster home. Surely bonding had occurred between the infant and Petitioners to a much larger extent than with children who had lived in the household for a much shorter period of time. We have been clear in pointing out that "[t]he best interests of a child are served by preserving important relationships in that child's life." Syl. pt. 2, State ex rel. Treadway v. McCoy, 189 W.Va. 210, 429 S.E.2d 492 (1993). This concern extends to the relationship a child in foster care has with foster parents. As we held in syllabus point eleven of In re Jonathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996), "[a] child has a right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond, including foster parents, provided that a determination is made that such continued contact is in the best interests of the child." Cf. In re Clifford K., 217 W.Va. 625, 619 S.E.2d 138 (2005) (recognizing that a foster parent may attain the status of psychological parent when the relationship is not temporary in duration and exists with the consent and encouragement of a child's legal parent or guardian). The GAL contends that because B.G.C. is a child under the age of two she is less apt to have bonded with her foster parents. He relies on language we quoted from a Pennsylvania Superior Court in our decision in West Virginia Department of Human Services v. La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W.Va. 330, 332 S.E.2d 632 (1985) to support this proposition. This reliance is misplaced. The fundamental issue decided in La Rea Ann C.L. is that a minor parent's right to revoke the relinquishment of child custody ceases to be absolute when an unreasonable period of time has passed. Id. at Syl. Pt. 2. We further determined that in such circumstances "the best interests of the child not only be considered but be given primary importance." Id. The case was then remanded with instruction to the trial court "to receive evidence to make a finding of fact on the child's best interests presently." Id. at 337, 332 S.E.2d at 638. Thus, whether a given child has bonded with a parental figure is a question of fact.

The situation before us involves a removal decision where the foster home environment or care provided in a foster home is not in question, and removal of a child is necessary to correct problems created by bureaucratic error. When presented with such situations, courts need to safeguard the best interests of the children by examining evidence of the emotional, physical and mental needs of the individual children under the particular circumstances of a case, and then balancing the relative interests of the children in order to decide which child or children would be less traumatized or detrimentally affected by being removed from the home. No such examination or balancing occurred in the present case. However, even though the relevant analysis regarding the best interests of the children placed in Petitioners' home is a significant oversight, it is unnecessary for the lower court to further address that issue as we have been informed that the overcrowding problem has been resolved. During oral argument in this case, the Court was told that the foster home is no longer overcapacity, with only five children, including B.G.C., presently residing in Petitioners' home. Consequently, removal of B.G.C. to resolve an overcrowding problem is moot.

In consideration of the foregoing discussion of the grounds upon which Respondent ordered removal of B.G.C., such action constituted clear error and the writ of prohibition is granted on the removal issue.

B. Adoption

Finding no merit in the grounds for removal asserted by Respondent, we must also consider Respondent's contention that removal of B.G.C. to a foster home representing a more traditional family unit consisting of a married mother and father who are interested in adoption furthers a legislative preference expressed in the adoption statutes.

West Virginia Code § 48-22-201 (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004) provides that > [a]ny person not married or any person, with his or spouse's consent, or any husband and wife jointly, may petition a circuit court of the county wherein such person or persons > reside for a decree of adoption of any minor child or person who may be adopted by the petitioner or petitioners.

The statute thus sets forth three classifications of persons who may adopt: (1) an unmarried person; (2) a married couple jointly, and (3) an individual in a marriage whose spouse consents. Although Respondent recognized that each Petitioner may individually petition to adopt under the statute, he asserts in his brief that the "statutes indicate a preference for adoption by married couples." No statutory citation was supplied to support this position and our research reveals no such stated preference. Nor were we able to locate any legislatively assigned preference for adoption into a traditional home or any statutory definition of a traditional home for adoption purposes. As is evident from the clear language of West Virginia Code § 48-22-201, there is no prioritization among the three classifications of those eligible to adopt a child in this state. "A statutory provision which is clear and unambiguous and plainly expresses the legislative intent will not be interpreted by the courts but will be given full force and effect." Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Epperly, 135 W.Va. 877, 65 S.E.2d 488 (1951).[20] [20]The only express legislative preferences we have found with particular regard to adoption of children in the legal custody of the State involve grandparents and reunification of siblings. Specifically, West Virginia Code § 49-3-1 (a)(3) establishes that a grandparent or grandparents found to be both suitable and willing to adopt a child in DHHR's custody be given priority over other prospective adoptive parents, and West Virginia Code § 49-2-14 (e) & (f) expresses the preference that DHHR reunite siblings for either foster care or adoption purposes if such arrangement is available and is determined to be in the best interests of the children. Neither of these preferences are automatic, however, as they turn on the best interests of the child who is the candidate for adoption.

Notwithstanding Respondent's and GAL's suggestions to the contrary, there simply is no legislative differentiation between categories of eligible candidates for adoption under the terms of West Virginia Code § 48-22-201. Such policy determination is clearly a legislative prerogative, outside of the purview of the courts. The primary concern of courts in adoption cases is whether there is evidence that the recommended adoptive home possesses the necessary attributes to meet the individual and specific needs of the child both at present and in the future.[21]

C. Summary

Central to our deliberation in this case is the reason or motivation underlying Respondent's decision to remove a child from her foster care home. The motion to remove the child was not supported by any allegation that B.G.C. was receiving improper or unwise care and management in her foster home, or that she was being subjected to any other legally recognized undesirable condition or influence. W.Va. Code § 49-2-12 (1970) (Repl. Vol. 2004); see also W.Va. Code § 49-2-14 (2002) (Repl. Vol. 2004) (criteria and procedure for removal of child from foster home). Likewise, no evidence supporting a legal reason for removing the child was presented at the hearings. As a matter of fact, the court was never presented with any actual evaluation of the home or evidence of the quality of the relationship B.G.C. had with Petitioners.Moreover, Respondent deferred hearing testimony from Petitioners' witnesses regarding their parenting abilities. Nevertheless, there also was no indication that Petitioners provided B.G.C. with anything other than a loving and nurturing home. As Respondent observed from the bench at the November 21 hearing, "there has been absolutely no allegation that these women have not cared for [B.G.C.] or the other kids and, in fact, all of the evidence indicates that they have done very well and have provided very well for the children."Without any information that thefoster care placement with Petitioners was not proceeding well, there was no legal reason for the court to remove B.G.C. from the only home she has known.

It is more than apparent that the only reason why Petitioners were being replaced as foster care providers was to promote the adoption of B.G.C. by what Respondent called in his November 12, 2008, order a "traditionally defined family, that is, a family consisting of both a mother and a father." It was only by addressing issues he anticipated would develop and believed would be problems at a later point in this case that Respondent was even able to reach the subject of this conclusion. The conclusion itself thus represents a blurring of legal principlesapplicable to abuse and neglect and adoption. Moreover, even if our current statutes, rules and regulationscould somehow be read to support the adoption preference proposed by Respondent, such a newfound principle would need to be harmonized with established law. Under our current law which encourages adoption by qualified foster parents, one of the Petitioners seeking to adopt B.G.C. individually would at the very least need to be considered if not favored in the selection of the prospective adoptive home.[22]

In the present case, all indications thus far are that B.G.C. has formed a close emotional bond and nurturing relationship with her foster parents, which can not be trivialized or ignored. State ex rel. Treadway v. McCoy; In re Jonathan G. As such, it serves as a classic example of a case in which the permanency plan for adoption should move quickly to the desired result of a permanent home for B.G.C. One of the Petitioners who has already adopted a child[23] and appreciates the tremendous responsibility adoption entails, has recently expressed the desire to adopt B.G.C. Clearly, that Petitioner should not be excluded from consideration for the reason stated by Respondent. These factors all should serve to facilitate the selection process, which needs to be completed as expeditiously as possible in order to further the best interests of B.G.C. and in recognition and support of the parenting investment which has been made.

hearing the lower court ordered DHHR to remove B.G.C. from Petitioners' home by noon the following day (November 22, 2008), and continue foster care placement of the child in the home of a prospective adoptive married couple identified during the hearing. [Petitioners complied with the order and B.G.C. was delivered with her belongings to the prospective adoptive home on November 22.]

11-24-08 Motion to Supreme Court for emergency stay.

11-26-08 Prospective adoptive married couple informed DHHR they would not adopt B.G.C. The child was returned to Petitioners' home later in the day after the motion for the emergency stay was granted by this Court.

12-2-08 Second order of removal memorializing hearing of November 21, 2008, entered. The order directed DHHR to move the child from Petitioners' home because Petitioners were not eligible to adopt the child together under the adoption statute and the number of foster children in Petitioners' home was over the capacity limit. Lower court iterated in this order that it was most appropriate to B.G.C.'s best interests to be placed in a traditional home with a married mother and father pending the adoption process.

SYLLABUS

"Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon appeal of a final order of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County entered on August 29, 2002. Pursuant to that order, the abuse and neglect petition brought against the appellees, Alvin and Stacy P.,[1] concerning their two children, Kyiah and Joseph P., was dismissed.[2] In this appeal, the appellants, the guardian ad litem on behalf of the children and the Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR"), contend that the circuit court erred by dismissing the petition.

This Court has before it the petition for appeal, the entire record, and briefs and argument of counsel. For the reasons set forth below, the final order is reversed, and this case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

[2]The circuit court stayed dismissal of the case for sixty days. By order dated October 28, 2002, this Court continued the stay of the dismissal of the case pending the resolution of this appeal.

I.

FACTS

On April 15, 2002, Alvin P. contacted the DHHR and requested diapers for his son, Joseph. According to the DHHR, it was evident from the phone call that there was stress in the home and, thus, a referral for services was made. On April 25, 2002, a DHHR social worker met with the family which included Alvin P., his wife, Stacy P., and their two children, Kyiah P., who was born on December 24, 2000, and Joseph P., who was born on December 24, 2001. During the meeting, Stacy P. told the social worker that she had four other children removed from her custody by child protective services in Virginia.

Thereafter, the DHHR contacted Amy Whitt of child protective services in Campbell County, Virginia. The DHHR was advised by Ms. Whitt that eight children had been removed from Stacy P. and her parental rights to those children terminated. Ms. Whitt also said that Alvin P. had sexually abused his four-year-old daughter, Samantha P.[3] Ms. Whitt indicated that any children in the custody of Alvin and Stacy P. would be in imminent danger.

Based on this information, the DHHR filed an application for emergency custody of Kyiah and Joseph P. on April 26, 2002. Consequently, the children were immediately removed from their parents' custody. A formal abuse and neglect petition filed by the DHHR on May 1, 2002, asserted that Kyiah and Joseph P. were at risk for abuse and neglect because of the involuntary termination of Stacy and Alvin P.'s parental rights to their other children in Virginia.

A preliminary hearing was held on May 15, 2002. Apparently, child protective service workers from Virginia testified that the parental rights of Alvin and Stacy P. to their other children were not involuntarily terminated.[4] However, they did state that Stacy P. voluntarily terminated her parental rights to two of her other children. Also, they indicated that Alvin P. had sexually abused his daughter, Samantha P. Thereafter, the court ordered that legal custody of the children remain with the DHHR, but afforded the DHHR discretion with regard to the physical custody of the children.

Subsequently, the DHHR returned the children to the home of Stacy P. However, Alvin P. was permanently restrained and enjoined from having contact with the children except for supervised visitation.[5] An adjudicatory hearing was scheduled for August 6, 2002. At that hearing, the DHHR sought and received a continuance in order to travel to Virginia to investigate the allegations of sexual abuse against Alvin P.

The adjudicatory hearing was rescheduled for August 28, 2002. Although the DHHR had subpoenaed case workers from Virginia to testify, they refused to appear contending that they did not have sufficient notice. The DHHR sought another continuance, but the circuit court denied the motion. The court then dismissed the abuse and neglect petition by order entered on August 29, 2002. This appeal followed.

We begin our analysis of this case by setting forth our standard of review. We recently stated that, "For appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000). This Court has also held that:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court > are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

[5]It appears that Alvin P. agreed to move out of the home so the children could be returned to Staci P.

Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

With these standards in mind, we proceed to determine whether the circuit court erred in this case.

III.

DISCUSSION

The sole issue in this case is whether the circuit court erred by dismissing the abuse and neglect petition filed against Alvin and Stacy P. The appellants argue that the dismissal was improper absent a full evidentiary hearing. In support of their argument, the appellants rely upon this Court's holdings in In the Matter of George Glen B., Jr., 205 W.Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863 (1999) ("George I"). In Syllabus Point 2 of George I, this Court held that:

> Where there has been a prior involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling, the issue of whether the parent has remedied the problems which led to the prior involuntary termination sufficient to parent a subsequently-born child must, at minimum, be reviewed by a court, and such review should be initiated on a petition pursuant to the provisions governing the procedure in cases of child neglect or abuse set forth in West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-1 to -12 (1998). Although the requirement that such a petition be filed does not mandate termination in all circumstances, the legislature has reduced the minimum threshold of evidence necessary for termination where one of the factors outlined in West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a) (1998) is present.

Also, in Syllabus Point 4 of George I, this Court stated that:

> When an abuse and neglect petition is brought based solely upon a previous involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) (1998), prior to the lower court's making any disposition regarding the petition, it must allow the development of evidence surrounding the prior involuntary termination(s) and what actions, if any, the parent(s) have taken to remedy the circumstances which led to the prior termination(s).

The appellants acknowledge that through further investigation, they learned that the appellees' parental rights to their other children were never involuntarily terminated. However, they contend that the holdings of George I should nevertheless be applied in this case because child protective services in Virginia had sufficient evidence to terminate the appellees' parental rights to their other children. Stacy P.'s parental rights were not terminated only because she agreed to voluntarily relinquish her rights. Similarly, Alvin P.'s parental rights to Samantha P. were not terminated, but he was denied visitation with her after Virginia child protective services determined that he sexually abused her. Based on these facts, the appellants argue that the circuit court should have held an adjudicatory hearing and allowed them to present evidence concerning the abuse and neglect proceedings that were conducted in Virginia. The appellants maintain that there was good cause for a continuance of the adjudicatory hearing based on the failure of the Virginia social workers to appear to testify.

In response, the appellees argue that the abuse and neglect petition was properly dismissed because the appellants were unable to produce any evidence of a prior involuntary termination of their parental rights. The appellees contend that W.Va. Code § 49-6-5b (1998) only applies where a parent's parental rights have been involuntarily terminated. They further assert that the appellants did not have good cause for a continuance of the adjudicatory hearing. In that regard, the appellees note that the circuit court granted one continuance before dismissing the petition. The appellees say that even with an additional three weeks to secure their witnesses, the appellants were not able to do so. Thus, the appellees conclude that the circuit court's dismissal of the petition should be affirmed.

It is well established that W.Va. Code § 49-6-5b requires the DHHR to join efforts to terminate parental rights where "the parental rights of the parent to a sibling have been terminated involuntarily." In George I, we explained that,

> Quite clearly, the statute contemplates that a prior termination of parental rights to a sibling is, at least, some evidence of a child being threatened with abuse and neglect. The legislature has clearly determined that where there has been a prior involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling, the issue of whether the parent has remedied the problems which led to the prior involuntary termination sufficient to parent a subsequently-born child must, at minimum, be reviewed by a court, and such review should be initiated on a petition pursuant to the provisions governing the procedure in cases of child neglect or abuse set forth in West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-1 to -12 (1998).

205 W.Va. at 442, 518 S.E.2d at 870. In addition, in Syllabus Point 1 of In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W.Va. 346, 532 S.E.2d 64 (2000) ("George II"), this Court held that:

> When the parental rights of a parent to a child have been involuntarily terminated, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998] requires the Department of Health and Human Resources to file a petition, to join in a petition, or to otherwise seek a ruling in any pending proceeding, to terminate parental rights as to any sibling(s) of that child.

It is clear from the record that the DHHR filed the abuse and neglect petition in this case based upon the belief that the appellees had their parental rights to as many as eight other children terminated. However, upon further investigation, the DHHR learned that the appellees' parental rights to their other children were never involuntarily terminated. Yet, the DHHR did confirm that abuse and neglect proceedings had been instituted by child protective services in Virginia against the appellees. Furthermore, the DHHR discovered that Stacy P. agreed to voluntary relinquish her parental rights to two of her other children once she learned that child protective services had instituted termination proceedings. Also, the DHHR discovered that child protective services in Virginia had determined that Alvin P. sexually abused his daughter, Samantha P. Instead of contesting that finding, Alvin P. agreed to no longer visit Samantha P.[6]

Based on these facts, the DHHR sought a continuance of the adjudicatory hearing to gather more evidence including the testimony of the Virginia child protective service workers. The circuit court granted the DHHR's motion, but when a second continuance was requested, the motion was denied. Thereafter, the circuit court dismissed the petition because the DHHR was unable to produce any additional evidence of abuse and neglect of the children. Having reviewed the entire record, we agree with the appellants that the circuit court abused its discretion by dismissing the abuse and neglect petition at this juncture.

While the appellees' parental rights to their other children have not been involuntarily terminated, it is clear from the record that substantial allegations of abuse of neglect by these parents were made in the state of Virginia with respect to their other children.[7] As we stated previously, these allegations resulted in the voluntary termination of Stacy P.'s parental rights to two of her other children. Also, Alvin P. was denied further visitation with his daughter, Samantha P. because he sexually abused her.

The appellees maintain that the abuse and neglect petition should have been dismissed once it was established that their parental rights to their other children were never involuntarily terminated. We disagree. Recently, in In re James G., 211 W.Va. 339, 566 S.E.2d 226 (2002), we considered the effect of a voluntary versus involuntary termination of parental rights on later-born children. In that case, the appellant mother argued that the circuit court had erred by refusing to accept her voluntarily relinquishment of parental rights. The DHHR would not agree to the voluntary termination suggesting that the mother only offered to relinquish her parental rights because she knew they were going to be terminated, and she wanted to limit the DHHR's ability to take action against her should she later have another child. Ultimately, this Court determined that "[a] circuit court has discretion in an abuse and neglect proceeding to accept a proffered voluntary termination of parental rights, or to reject it and proceed to a decision on involuntary termination." Syllabus Point 4, in part, id. However, > children, the absence of one of these factors does not in any way prevent the Department from filing such a petition should conditions warrant. Nothing prevents the Department from conducting an investigation if it believes that a parent who has voluntarily terminated parental rights with respect to one child might be mistreating another child, or from providing such a parent with assistance or counseling where available.

> [w]e note[d] that while W.Va.Code § 49-6-5b (1998) does not include the voluntary termination of parental rights as one of the factors triggering a new petition against a parent with additional

Id., 211 W.Va. at 346, 566 S.E.2d at 233.

In the case sub judice, we find that the conditions warranted the filing of the abuse and neglect petition. Furthermore, based upon the preliminary hearing testimony, there was probable cause for the emergency removal of the children from their home. While the appellees' parental rights to their other children were never involuntarily terminated, there was reason to believe that the appellees might be mistreating Kyiah and Joseph P. Given that possibility, an adjudicatory hearing was required. As this Court has stated on many occasions,

> The guiding principle in any child abuse or neglect proceeding is to do what is best for the child: "First and foremost in a contest involving the custody of a child is the consideration of that child's welfare. It has been held repeatedly by this Court that the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W.Va. 801, 804, 187 S.E.2d 601, 604 (1972); accord, Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W.Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989); State ex rel. Rose L. v. Pancake, 209 W.Va. 188, 192, 544 S.E.2d 403, 407 (2001) (Davis, J. concurring).

Consequently, we find that the circuit court erred when it dismissed the abuse and neglect petition without conducting the adjudicatory hearing. While we recognize that the DHHR had a significant amount of time during which to secure its witnesses for the adjudicatory hearing, we, nonetheless, believe it established good cause for a second continuance. In summary, based on all of the above, especially the need to protect the welfare of these children, the circuit court should have rescheduled the adjudicatory hearing and allowed the DHHR and guardian ad litem to present the testimony of the child protective service workers from Virginia.

IV.

CONCLUSION

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the final order of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County entered on August 29, 2002, is reversed, and this case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I concur in the Court's opinion. I write separately to comment on the circuit judge's decision not to grant the DHHR a second continuance.

Courts are busy forums, in which litigants who fail to bring evidence forward in a timely fashion risk having their cases dismissed. If there is no risk of sanctions for delay, there is a correlative tendency for no one to take deadlines seriously. And especially in priority child abuse cases, the court is on a strict timetable.

In the instant case, the DHHR should have known what the Virginia authorities' position was well before the August 28 hearing, and should have asked for second continuance. Just "showing up" and saying "Sorry, Judge, we're not ready" is not acceptable. For this reason, the circuit court's action was, it appears, entirely understandable.

9. The mandatory language of W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2014) requires that a home study evaluation be conducted by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to determine if any interested grandparent would be a suitable adoptive parent.

10. While the grandparent preference statute, at W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2014), places a mandatory duty on the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to complete a home study before a child may be placed for adoption with an interested grandparent, "the department shall first consider the [grandparent's] suitability and willingness . . . to adopt the child." There is no statutory requirement that a home study be completed in the event that the interested grandparent is found to be an unsuitable adoptive placement and that placement with such grandparent is not in the best interests of the child.

Davis, Justice:

In this case, the Court must determine whether grandparent placement is appropriate for two minor children: L.M.[1] and L.S. The maternal grandparents, B.S. and D.S., the petitioners herein and intervenors below (hereinafter "grandparents"), appeal the circuit court's December 19, 2013, order. By that order, the lower court denied the grandparents' request to intervene and their motion for placement of the minor children in their home. Both the respondent, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR"), as well as the Guardian ad litem (hereinafter "Guardian") for the minor children, assert that the grandparents' home is not a proper placement for the children. Based on the parties' briefs, the appendix record designated for our consideration, and the pertinent authorities, we find that the circuit court's ruling was proper; thus, it is affirmed.

I.

This case involves the proper placement for two children: L.M., a three-year-old boy, and his younger sister, L.S., who is two. The DHHR filed an abuse and neglect petition on January 11, 2013, prior to L.S.'s birth, alleging that L.M. was neglected by his parents as a result of chronic substance abuse. The petition maintained that L.M. had been exposed to drug paraphernalia and that police had seized a clandestine methamphetamine (hereinafter "meth") lab from the mother's home, a trailer that had been purchased for her by her parents, the grandparents herein. The DHHR sought and received custody of L.M., and placed him in foster care. Thereafter, on January 17, 2013, the grandparents filed a motion to intervene and, further, moved for placement of L.M. in their home. The DHHR opposed this motion; however, the circuit court granted physical custody of L.M. to the grandparents.

L.M.'s younger sister, L.S., was born soon thereafter in March 2013. At birth, L.S. tested positive for substantial amounts of alcohol and trace amounts of controlled substances, cotinine and hydrocodone, in her bloodstream. The DHHR amended its petition to include L.S., and was granted custody of L.S. When L.S. was released from the hospital, she also was placed in her grandparents' care. The following day, the DHHR's child protective service (hereinafter "CPS") worker conducted an unannounced home visit to the grandparents' home. While there, the CPS worker took photographs of the children's living environment.

Subsequent to the home inspection, the CPS worker was examining pictures taken of the grandparents' home and compared them with photographs that had been taken of the mother's home on the day the meth lab had been discovered. CPS determined that several baby items in the grandparents' home were the same items that had been in the mother's meth-contaminated home. Specifically, CPS identified a bassinet and a baby swing.

Based upon its concern that the children currently were exposed to items in the grandparents' home that had been contaminated in an unremediated meth environment, the DHHR filed a motion for emergency custody and for the children to be removed from the grandparents' home. The circuit court granted the DHHR's motion to change placement, and the matter was set for a full hearing.

The hearing on the emergency motion for change of placement occurred on April 15, 2013. The DHHR presented evidence that a baby bassinet and indoor baby swing were found in the grandparents' home where the children were placed. It was asserted by the DHHR, through its witnesses' testimony, that these items were the same items that had been contaminated in the mother's trailer where she was managing a clandestine meth lab while L.M. was in the home. The testimony presented by the DHHR focused on a comparison of the colors of the items in question, the ribbons attached thereto, the accessory bag on the side, the bars on the base, and the product warning labels. Further, the DHHR presented testimony that the contamination of the mother's trailer caused by the meth lab resulted in the property being closed, with entry on the premises precluded and removal of items disallowed. It was stated, through a witness at the hearing, that exposure to the trailer or any items that had been inside of the trailer, such as the baby bassinet and swing, created a risk to the public health and safety. It was explained to the circuit court that meth residue on household items can cause adverse health effects, including respiratory issues.

Both grandparents also testified at the hearing on the emergency motion for removal of the children. They testified that they had purchased the trailer for their daughter, the children's mother, and that the trailer was located on the grandparents' property. Further, the trial statements from the grandparents indicated that the baby equipment in their home was not the same as had been in the mother's home but, rather, had been received from friends or elsewhere.

The circuit court, based on the evidence submitted at the emergency hearing regarding placement of the children, found that certain items in the photographs taken at the contaminated trailer were the same currently being used by the grandparents in their home. The lower court found that "it appears the items have been transferred from the unremediated trailer which once contained a methamphetamine lab, to the grandparent's [sic] home for use by them with the infant child." The motion for an emergency change of placement for the children was granted, and the children were removed from the grandparents' care.

Subsequent thereto, the rights of the biological parents were terminated by the circuit court.[2]

On December 2, 2013, the circuit court held a hearing on the grandparents' previously-filed motion to intervene and for placement of the children in their home. The circuit court took judicial notice of the evidence from the April 15, 2013, emergency hearing. CPS testified that placement of the children with the grandparents was concerning based on the fact that the grandparents' own children had trouble in school, and three of them became involved in drugs. Despite the drug issues, the grandparents continued to support and engage with their adult children, including posting bond for the adult children's drug charges. Therefore, CPS voiced concerns that the grandparents would not prevent interaction between the children and the mother, or preclude exposure to others with criminal proclivities, including illicit drug use.

At the hearing, the grandmother testified, reiterating her previous statements that the bassinet and the swing in her home were not from her daughter's trailer. Additionally, the grandparents' counsel proffered to the circuit court that the grandfather's testimony would be the same as he previously had testified. Further, counsel for the grandparents also submitted that another witness had observed the bassinet and swing through the trailer's window on the same day that he had observed similar items in the grandparents' home.

[2]The children's biological parents' rights were terminated July 8, 2013. The mother appealed the termination of her rights to this Court, and such termination was affirmed November 26, 2013. L.M.'s and L.S.'s fathers' rights also were terminated July 8, 2013. Neither father appealed. No parental rights are at issue in the instant case.

The resultant court order, entered December 19, 2013, denied the grandparents' motion to intervene and motion for placement of the children in their home. The circuit court found that, while the grandparents proffered testimony concerning the bassinet and swing, they "did not proffer any new evidence, such as dated photographs to corroborate the proffered testimony, or the testimony of the person from whom the grandparents claimed they obtained the baby bassinet[.]" The circuit court found that there was no new evidence upon which to reconsider its previous finding that the grandparents had knowingly exposed the children to meth-contaminated baby equipment. It also found that, in the past, the grandparents had supported their adult children, who have had issues with drugs and crime, and had failed to protect their grandchildren. The circuit court found that "[t]he presumption in favor of placement with the grandparents has been rebutted in this case, based on clear and convincing evidence that the grandparents have exposed the children to the risk of imminent harm and lack sufficient judgment to ensure the children's safety." The circuit court expressed that it "considered the best interests of the children, including their need for continuity of care and caretakers, and their opportunity for adoption in a stable home environment." Thus, the circuit court denied the grandparents' motion to intervene and for placement of the minor children. The grandparents appealed to this Court.

Currently, both siblings are placed together with a foster family who wants to adopt them. They have lived with this family for over twenty months and, by all accounts, are doing well and are very bonded with the foster parents. The children have not had any contact with the grandparents for over a year and a half. The foster parents have commenced adoption proceedings; however, the underlying judge is awaiting the results of this appeal before proceeding with the adoptions.

This case originated as an abuse and neglect case filed by the DHHR against the biological parents of the children. However, the lower court's findings that the children were abused and neglected children by their parents is no longer a reviewable issue and is not addressed in this appeal. Rather, the matter before this Court involves the proper placement of the minor children. Generally,

> "[t]his Court reviews the circuit court's final order and ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard. We review challenges to findings of fact under a clearly erroneous standard; conclusions of law are reviewed de novo." Syl. Pt. 4, Burgess v. Porterfield, 196 W. Va. 178, 469 S.E.2d 114 (1996).

Syl. pt. 1, Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W. Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005). Specifically, we are mindful that "[q]uestions relating to . . . custody of the children are within the sound discretion of the court and its action with respect to such matters will not be disturbed on appeal unless it clearly appears that such discretion has been abused." Syl., in part, Nichols v. Nichols, 160 W. Va. 514, 236 S.E.2d 36 (1977). Further, "[i]n . . . custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child." Syl. pt. 5, in part, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

To completely resolve the issues before us, we must consider the relevant statute. In this regard, we have held that "'[w]here the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review.' Syllabus point 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W. Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995)." Syl. pt. 3, Alden v. Harpers Ferry Police Civil Serv. Comm'n, 209 W. Va. 83, 543 S.E.2d 364 (2001). Mindful of these applicable standards, we now consider the substantive issues herein raised.

III.

DISCUSSION

On appeal to this Court, the grandparents assert numerous and overlapping assignments of error. All of the appeal issues, however, can be placed into two broad categories: (1) the sufficiency of the evidence, including evidentiary determinations by the circuit court; and (2) the application and mandate of W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2014).[3] We will discuss each of the general categories individually.

A. Evidentiary Issues

First, we will address the evidentiary issues raised by the grandparents. The grandparents' protestations center around the baby swing and baby bassinet and the circuit court's finding that the same items from the meth-contaminated home were being used by the grandparents, as well as the grandparents' allegation that they were not allowed to introduce evidence at the hearing. Conversely, both the DHHR and the Guardian agree with the circuit court's determinations.

Many of the grandparents' arguments can be reduced to the contention that the circuit court's findings were not supported by adequate evidence. Our guiding standard is well-settled:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to a de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the > circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

[3]We note that W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2014) was repealed and recodified during the 2015 Regular Session of the West Virginia Legislature. The new enactment, W. Va. Code § 49-4-114, has minor stylistic changes and will be effective ninety days after the February 19, 2015, approval date. See W. Va. Code § 49-1-103.

Syl. pt. 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

As previously explained, the CPS worker was comparing photographs taken of baby items at the mother's meth-contaminated trailer with pictures of baby equipment taken at the grandparents' home. Based on the concern that the children were being exposed to items that had been tainted with meth, the DHHR filed its emergency motion to move the children's placement. The motion was granted, and a full hearing was held on April 15, 2013. At the hearing, the circuit court heard conflicting testimony from the DHHR and the grandparents regarding the baby equipment. After hearing the testimony, the circuit court stated that

> I think it is the same bassinet. They both have a blue ribbon, in the upper picture . . . there are items laying over the ridge of the bassinet which cover up portions of the - - what would appear to be the blue ribbon. If you look clear to the extreme right, you see the blue ribbon going around the corner. I think it is the same one. I think it came out of that trailer. That is my finding.

Subsequent thereto, at the hearing on the grandparents' motion to intervene, the circuit court took judicial notice of the evidence from the April 15, 2013, emergency hearing. No parties objected to the circuit court's judicial notice of the evidence from the prior hearing.[4] [4]Significantly, the grandparents assert that they were precluded from presenting relevant evidence on the matter of the baby equipment during the hearing on their motion to intervene. Our review of the hearing transcript, however, leads to the conclusion that such a complaint is disingenuous. Early in the hearing, the Guardian moved the circuit court to take judicial notice of the prior evidence on the issue of the baby items. The following exchange occurred between counsel for the grandparents and the circuit court judge:

> [GRANDPARENTS' COUNSEL]: . . . . So just so that I'm clear in my mind, Judge, I'm not allowed to inquire any further into any facts related to that?
> THE COURT: I'm not going to retry that issue, if that is what you mean.
>
> [GRANDPARENTS' COUNSEL]: Yes.
>
> THE COURT: Do you have additional evidence you want put in the record?
>
> [GRANDPARENTS' COUNSEL]: Yes.
>
> THE COURT: I will allow you to do that.
> [GRANDPARENTS' COUNSEL]: Okay.
>
> THE COURT: Is this your witness to do that [referring to the CPS worker who was on the stand]?
> [GRANDPARENTS' COUNSEL]: No, no.

After the witnesses testified, counsel for the grandparents, by way of proffer, argued to the circuit court:

Evidence was heard at two evidentiary hearings, wherein the grandparents could have introduced evidence to refute the photographic evidence submitted by the DHHR. The grandparents chose to rely on their own testimony and the proffered testimony of another individual. In situations concerning the credibility of witnesses, a circuit court's findings are [GRANDPARENTS' COUNSEL]: Both [grandparents] would testify that - - as they have in the past - - that the furniture, the baby furniture the bassinet and the swing - - did not - - that was found, that was in their home, despite similarities in appearance, that these were not items that came from [the mother's] trailer.

[The grandfather] would testify further that he has been to [the mother's] trailer, and the bassinet and the swing that are . . . pictured as having come from [the mother's] trailer and being in the [grandparents'] home, that those items are still in the trailer. And that he has gone from [the mother's] old trailer, has seen those items in the trailer looking through the window, and returned to his home and the items are still in his home. Clearly, not the same items.

THE COURT: He already testified to that, didn't he.

[GRANDPARENTS' COUNSEL]: Well, they did originally, yes. . . . But, in addition, I have a witness . . . who accompanied [the grandfather] to the . . . trailer, and also looked through the window and saw the bassinet and swing there, and then from there immediately went to the [grandparents'] home and saw the similar items in the home.

And one additional witness . . . who is [the grandmother's] mother. She would testify that the high chair that was also in one of the photographs submitted by the Department was given to [the grandmother] by her[.] . . . That is the extent of the proffer, Judge.

afforded deference "because the trial judge was on the spot and is better able than an appellate court to decide whether the error affected substantial rights of the parties." In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. at 237, n.26, 470 S.E.2d at 191, n.26. See also In re Elizabeth Jo "Beth" H., 192 W. Va. 656, 659, 453 S.E.2d 639, 642 (1994) ("Consistent with our cases in other areas, we give appropriate deference to findings of the circuit court. In this regard, the circuit court has a superior sense of what actually transpired during an incident, by virtue of its ability to see and hear the witnesses who have firsthand knowledge of the events. Appellate oversight is therefore deferential, and we should review the circuit court's findings of fact following an evidentiary hearing under the clearly erroneous standard. If the circuit court makes no findings or applies the wrong legal standard, however, no deference attaches to such an application. Of course, if the circuit court's findings of fact are not clearly erroneous and the correct legal standard is applied, the circuit court's ultimate ruling will be affirmed as a matter of law."). The circuit court heard and considered all of the evidence and, as the finder of fact, determined that, although the grandparents proffered testimony concerning the bassinet and swing, there was no new evidence on which to reconsider its previous finding that the grandparents had knowingly exposed the children to meth-contaminated baby equipment. By using the tainted equipment, the circuit court found that the grandparents had exposed the children to the risk of imminent harm and that they lacked sufficient judgment to ensure the children's safety. The circuit court's factual rulings will not be disturbed by this Court.

B. W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2014)

Having ascertained that the evidence was properly considered by the circuit court, we now turn our focus to the application of the grandparent preference statute. In this case, we are called upon to determine whether W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) is mandatory, and, if so, whether the circuit court failed to follow the requirements set forth within the statute. The grandparents contend that the circuit court did not apply the statutory presumption in favor of grandparent placement and, further, failed to consider the results of a home study prior to making a placement determination. Conversely, the DHHR responds that the grandparents did not provide an approved home study, and, more importantly, because the circuit court found that the children were in imminent danger, it was not required to wait for a home study before removing the children from the grandparents' home.

W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) provides, in pertinent part:

> For purposes of any placement of a child for adoption by the department, the department shall first consider the suitability and willingness of any known grandparent or grandparents to adopt the child. Once any such grandparents who are interested in adopting the child have been identified, the department shall conduct a home study evaluation, including home visits and individual interviews by a licensed social worker. If the department determines, based on the home study evaluation, that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents, it shall assure that the grandparents are offered the placement of the child prior to the consideration of any other prospective adoptive parents.

The first step in statutory construction is to identify the intent expressed by the Legislature in promulgating the provision at issue. "The primary object in construing a statute is to ascertain and give effect to the intent of the Legislature." Syl. pt. 1, Smith v. State Workmen's Comp. Comm'r, 159 W. Va. 108, 219 S.E.2d 361 (1975). Next, we look to the particular language used by the Legislature. "Where the language of a statute is clear and without ambiguity the plain meaning is to be accepted without resorting to the rules of interpretation." Syl. pt. 2, State v. Elder, 152 W. Va. 571, 165 S.E.2d 108 (1968). Accord Syl. pt. 5, State v. General Daniel Morgan Post No. 548, Veterans of Foreign Wars, 144 W. Va. 137, 107 S.E.2d 353 (1959) ("When a statute is clear and unambiguous and the legislative intent is plain, the statute should not be interpreted by the courts, and in such case it is the duty of the courts not to construe but to apply the statute."). Finally,

> [i]t is the duty of a court to construe a statute according to its true intent, and give to it such construction as will uphold the law and further justice. It is as well the duty of a court to disregard a construction, though apparently warranted by the literal sense of the words in a statute, when such construction would lead to injustice and absurdity.

Syl. pt. 2, Click v. Click, 98 W. Va. 419, 127 S.E. 194 (1925). Appropriate for the present case, "[t]he law does not require a suitor to do a futile thing." Syl. pt. 2, Brawley v. County Court of Kanawha Cnty., 117 W. Va. 697, 188 S.E. 139 (1936).

In examining this portion of the governing statutory law, this Court has recognized that, to effectuate the legislative intent, a circuit court "must endeavor to secure for a child who has been removed from his or her family a permanent placement with the level of custody, care, commitment, nurturing and discipline that is consistent with the child's best interests." See State v. Michael M., 202 W. Va. 350, 358, 504 S.E.2d 177, 185 (1998) (discussing legislative intent as stated in W. Va. Code § 49-1-1 (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2014)). The specific portion of the statute states: "[o]nce any such grandparents who are interested in adopting the child have been identified, the department shall conduct a home study evaluation[.]" W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) (emphasis added). "'It is well established that the word "shall," in the absence of language in the statute showing a contrary intent on the part of the Legislature, should be afforded a mandatory connotation.' Syllabus Point 1, Nelson v. West Virginia Public Employees Insurance Board, 171 W. Va. 445, 300 S.E.2d 86 (1982)." Syl. pt. 1, E.H. v. Matin, 201 W. Va. 463, 498 S.E.2d 35 (1997). Having determined the legislative intent of the statute and found that the wording is clear and unambiguous, we now specifically hold that the mandatory language of W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2014) requires that a home study evaluation be conducted by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to determine if any interested grandparent would be a suitable adoptive parent.

However, resolution of this case does not come simply by interpreting the statute. Rather, this statute must be applied to the peculiar facts of the present case. We have determined that a home study is a required mandate when a grandparent expresses interest in adopting a child. However, the home study obligation also must comport with the ultimate determination of child placement premised upon the best interests of the child. See Syl. pt. 4, Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W. Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005) ("West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a) provides for grandparent preference in determining adoptive placement for a child where parental rights have been terminated and also incorporates a best interests analysis within that determination by including the requirement that the DHHR find that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents prior to granting custody to the grandparents. The statute contemplates that placement with grandparents is presumptively in the best interests of the child, and the preference for grandparent placement may be overcome only where the record reviewed in its entirety establishes that such placement is not in the best interests of the child."); Syl. pt. 5, Napolean, id. ("By specifying in West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) that the home study must show that the grandparents 'would be suitable adoptive parents,' the Legislature has implicitly included the requirement for an analysis by the Department of Health and Human Resources and circuit courts of the best interests of the child, given all circumstances of the case.").

As this Court consistently has reiterated, in all cases involving children, the polar star is the best interests of the child. "[A] crucial component of the grandparent preference is that the adoptive placement of the subject child with his/her grandparents must serve the child's best interests. Absent such a finding, adoptive placement with the child's grandparents is not proper." In re Elizabeth F., 225 W. Va. 780, 786, 696 S.E.2d 296, 302 (2010). A determination of the child's best interests must be based on all of the circumstances of the case. See generally In re Hunter H., 231 W. Va. 118, 744 S.E.2d 228 (2011). Adoption by a child's grandparents is permitted only if such adoptive placement serves the child's best interests based upon a thorough review of the entire record. See In re Aaron H., 229 W. Va. 677, 735 S.E.2d 274 (2012); see also In re N.P., No. 11-0324, 2011 WL 8199162 (W. Va. Oct. 25, 2011) (unpublished mem. dec.).

Significantly, the lower court in this case found that the children were in danger of imminent harm. Protection of children is one of the most defended principles by this Court. See W. Va. Code § 49-4-105 (allowing removal of child from home and foregoing requirement for hearing on reasonable efforts to maintain the family when child appears in imminent danger of serious bodily or emotional injury or death in any home). See also W. Va. R.P. for Child Abuse and Neglect Procs. 16 (authorizing circuit court to place custody of a child with the DHHR at any time when the child is thought to be in imminent danger). "'[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened . . . .' Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syl. pt. 7, in part, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). By way of example, this Court recently found that the circuit court in an abuse and neglect proceeding did not abuse its discretion in not requiring completion of a home study of a mother's adult daughter for the children's placement when it was clear that the adult daughter was not a suitable placement. In the Interest of J.M., No. 11-1165, 2012 WL 2988787 (W. Va. Mar. 12, 2012) (unpublished mem. dec.). Moreover, this Court has affirmed a lower court's denial of grandparent placement, in the absence of a home study, because the circuit court's decision was not based solely on the lack of a completed home study but also, on other factors, including the length and quality of time the child had lived in the home of the foster parents. In re Aaron H., 229 W. Va. 677, 735 S.E.2d 274 (2012). Additionally, this Court again affirmed a circuit court's finding that occurred in spite of a lack of a home study in the case In re S.S., No. 14-1039, 2015 WL 1332668 (W. Va. Mar. 16, 2015) (unpublished mem. dec.), based upon the court's finding that a home study was unnecessary given that evidence regarding the grandmother's substance abuse enabled the circuit court to determine her suitability as a potential adoptive parent. Notwithstanding this Court's concern over the lack of a home study, especially given the mandatory language of the statute, we recognize that the safety of children is of utmost importance, taking into account the totality of the circumstances and the best interests of the children. In circumstances where it is apparent that an interested grandparent would fail to be found as a suitable placement for a minor child, the charade of continuing a home study is not necessary, and, in fact, could be harmful. See Syl. pt. 2, Newhart v. Pennybacker, 120 W. Va. 774, 200 S.E. 350 (1938) ("Where a particular construction of a statute would result in an absurdity, some other reasonable construction, which will not produce such absurdity, will be made."). Accordingly, we now expressly hold that while the grandparent preference statute, at W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2014), places a mandatory duty on the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources to complete a home study before a child may be placed for adoption with an interested grandparent, "the department shall first consider the [grandparent's] suitability and willingness . . . to adopt the child." There is no statutory requirement that a home study be completed in the event that the interested grandparent is found to be an unsuitable adoptive placement and that placement with such grandparent is not in the best interests of the child.

In the instant case, the minor children were placed with the interested grandparents before a home study had been completed. During the pendency of the home study evaluation process,[5] the DHHR filed an emergency motion based upon its concern with the health and safety of the children. After hearing evidence at both the emergency hearing and at the hearing on the grandparents' motion to intervene and for placement of the minor children, the circuit court found that "[t]he presumption in favor of placement with the grandparents has been rebutted in this case, based on clear and convincing evidence that the grandparents have exposed the children to the risk of imminent harm and lack sufficient judgment to ensure the children's safety." The circuit court expressed that it "considered the best interests of the children, including their need for continuity of care and caretakers, and their opportunity for adoption in a stable home environment." This Court affirms the circuit court's determination that the grandparents were not an appropriate adoptive placement for the minor children.

[5]It is noted that a previous home study had been completed on the grandparents' home. In 2010, during a prior abuse and neglect case, the DHHR submitted a completed home study evaluation, which approved placement of petitioners' grandchild, H.T., in their home. The placement is "approved with concerns" due to prior CPS issues in the home. Because of the age of the 2010 home study, a new home study was undertaken. The new home study had not been completed at the time of the circuit court's denial of the grandparents' placement request in the present case. This Court was informed of the study's findings through a supplemental appendix. The supplement included a letter dated and signed by Lori Hesson of KVC Behavioral Healthcare. The letter stated that the grandparents previously worked with KVC in efforts to obtain custody of L.M. and L.S. The letter stated that the grandparents attended all required trainings, background checks, and home visits. The letter further explained that KVC had been prepared to approve petitioners' home as an (continued...)

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we affirm the December 19, 2013, order of the Circuit Court of Calhoun County.

approved placement; however, KVC then received information regarding the "extensive criminal and CPS history of their children and the current concerns with their grandchildren with whom they have legal guardianship." KVC, accordingly, expressed that the grandparents' home is denied as a proper placement for the children at issue herein.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia

WEST VIRGINIA DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN SERVICES

v.

LA REA ANN C.L.

No. 16645

July 10, 1985

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. The effect of W.Va.Code, 49-3-1(a) [1977, 1984] and of the proviso to W.Va.Code, 48-4-la [1965] (now W.Va.Code, 48-4-5(a) [1984]) is, ordinarily, to make revocable any relinquishment of child custody by a minor parent to a licensed private child welfare agency or to the West Virginia Department of Human Services which has not yet been approved by a court of competent jurisdiction.

2. Where the child has spent a substantial period of time in the home of foster parents, pending a ruling by the trial court on whether to approve a minor parent's relinquishment of child custody to a licensed private child welfare agency or to the West Virginia Department of Human Services, extraordinary circumstances exist which demand that the best interests of the child not only be considered but be given primary importance. In such a case the minor parent's right to revoke his or her relinquishment ceases to be absolute, due to the passage of the unreasonable period of time.

Mary Beth Kershner, Asst. Atty. Gen., Charleston, for appellant.

Cooper & Martin, George M. Cooper, Sutton, for appellee.

Benjamin Snyder, Clendenin, for intervenors.

McHUGH, Justice:

The appellant, the West Virginia Department of Human Services, appeals from the final order of the trial court, which denied the appellant's petition to approve the appellee's relinquishment of parental rights. The trial court held that, although the minor parent had not been coerced by anyone into signing the relinquishment, she had been "under considerable pressure as a result of the circumstances in which she then found herself," at the time of execution of the relinquishment, and that the appellant had violated its own regulations by not informing her of her right to an attorney before deciding to terminate her parental rights by signing a consent to adopt form. This Court has before it the petition for appeal, all matters of record and the briefs filed by the parties, including the intervenors, who are the child's foster parents in this case.

In the year 1980, the appellee, then a pregnant, unmarried 16-year-old, voluntarily placed herself in the temporary custody of the West Virginia Department of Human Services in order to receive the proper care that her parents, both of whom had been declared unfit parents by reason of alcoholism, would not be able to provide her. See footnote 1 After the baby was born, the appellee placed her child under foster care also, so they could be placed in the same foster home, without accepting financial responsibility for the child. See footnote 2

Throughout the pregnancy and thereafter, the appellee debated placing her child up for adoption, and eventually decided to do so, with the explanation that she wanted to live the life of a normal 16-year-old. See footnote 3 Once informed of the ramifications of her actions, although not informed of her right to consult with an attorney before relinquishment, the appellee signed a consent to adopt form. See footnote 4 Thereafter, the infant was transferred to the home of the intervenors, the child's foster parents, where the child resided for about four years pending the trial court's decision on whether to approve the relinquishment.

Several days after the appellee executed the consent to adopt form, the appellee's mother contacted the West Virginia Department of Human Services in efforts to revoke the relinquishment. Thereafter, the Department of Human Services petitioned the trial court to approve the relinquishment. Although an evidentiary hearing was held on the relinquishment and the matter was ripe for a decision, the trial court did not rule until after the appellee herein filed a habeas corpus petition nearly four years later. Arguments on the matter were again heard, and the trial court refused to approve the relinquishment.

The Department of Human Services filed a motion for a new trial and the intervenors filed a motion to reconsider, both of which were denied. The instant case is a consolidation of the matter involving the original petition to approve relinquishment and the habeas corpus proceeding which resulted in a decision by the trial court.

At this point we note the unusual posture in which this case reaches us. The Department of Human Services failed to seek a timely ruling on its petition for approval of the relinquishment. Moreover, the problems could have been avoided by the Department by promptly seeking the approval of the relinquishment by the trial judge in accordance with Code, 49-3-1(a). Turning to the appellee, this Court is surprised that she, through counsel, did not at a much earlier date seek a ruling so as to recover possession of her child. Finally, the trial court obviously should have ruled much sooner than it did.

II

The issue before this Court is whether the trial court correctly refused to approve the relinquishment by the appellee.

The appellant asserts several errors in the trial court's decision. First, it asserts that the trial court erred in concluding that the appellee had the right to revoke her relinquishment as a result of personal misgivings at the time of the hearing on the petition to approve the relinquishment.

The appellant also asserts that the trial court erred by not concluding that the best interests of the child require that the child be left in the care of the intervenors, her foster parents, with whom the infant has been living for almost all of her life. The appellant argues that moving the child to the home of the appellee, her natural mother, with whom she has not lived since she was two-months old, would interfere with the child's emotional well-being and development. See footnote 5 For the reasons stated below, we hold that the ruling of the trial court was not proper and remand this matter for further consideration.

The statutes of this State and the opinions of this Court have traditionally protected the parent-child relationship. For example, this Court, in In Re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 237, 207 S.E.2d 129, 136 (1973), stated that "no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person." Generally, in the absence of neglect or abuse, parents will retain custody and control over their children.

However, in the event that parents no longer wish to retain custody over their children, statutory law allows for a permanent relinquishment of parental rights. This relinquishment of child custody by adult parents and by minor parents to an individual or individuals is generally not revocable. W.Va.Code, 48-4-la [1965], effective at all relevant times herein (now see W.Va.Code, 48-4-3 to -5 [1984]), states, in pertinent part: "[E]xcept where a court of competent jurisdiction finds that such consent or relinquishment of legal custody for adoption was obtained by fraud or duress, no consent or relinquishment of legal custody for adoption of a child, whether given by an adult or a minor, shall be revocable[.]" Read alone, this language would indicate that the appellee, the natural mother, would have no right to revoke relinquishment of parental rights in the absence of fraud or duress. As indicated above, this is precisely the argument asserted by the appellant in this case.

The appellant directs our attention to this Court's opinion in Lane v. Pippin, 110 W.Va. 357, 158 S.E. 673 (1931), the syllabus of which is quoted in syl. pt. 1, In re Adoption of Truslow, 696 167 W.Va. 696, 280 S.E.2d 312 (1981), as follows:

> "An adoption of a child should not be revoked merely because the natural parent or parents, who formally consented to the adoption, subsequently experience a change of mind on the subject. In the absence of fraud in the adoption proceedings or a showing that the best interests of the child would be served by annulling the adoption, the court should refuse to disturb the same."

Lane v. Pippin and Truslow are not controlling in this case. In the instant case, the natural mother is a minor parent, unlike the parents in Lane v. Pippin and Truslow, and the relinquishment here was to the Department of Human Services, not to an individual or individuals. W.Va.Code, 48-4-la [1965] imposes an additional requirement before a relinquishment of child custody by a minor parent to a licensed private child welfare agency or to the Department of Human Services will become final. This section contains this proviso: "[A] relinquishment of legal custody for adoption of a child given by a minor parent or parents to a licensed private child welfare agency or to the state department of welfare [now Department of Human Services] shall be revocable unless the relinquishment was given in compliance with [W.Va.Code, 49-3-1.]" Significantly, W.Va.Code, 49-3- 1(a) [1977, 1984], provides, in pertinent part:

> [I]f either of the parents of such child is under eighteen years of age, such relinquishment shall not be valid unless and until the same shall have been approved in writing by a judge of a court having jurisdiction of adoption proceedings in the county in which such parent may reside or in which such relinquishment is made.

We believe the effect of this provision and of the proviso to W.Va.Code, 48-4-la [1965] (now W.Va.Code, 48-4-5(a) [1984]) is, ordinarily, to make revocable any relinquishment of child custody by a minor parent to a licensed private child welfare agency or to the West Virginia Department of Human Services which has not yet been approved by a court of competent jurisdiction. Therefore, the trial court was correct in concluding that a minor parent normally has the unfettered rights to revoke his or her relinquishment to such agencies before it is approved by a circuit court. Normally, it is only after a relinquishment of child custody by a minor parent to such agencies is approved by a circuit court that W.Va.Code, 48-4-la [1965] (now Code, 48- 4-5(a) [1984]) will ordinarily bar revocation of the relinquishment.

The appellant also maintains, however, that the trial court erred in not granting custody to the intervening foster parents because removing the child from their home was against the child's best interests.

The best interest standard is a widely accepted method of determining custody in this country. In In re Baby Boy Reyna, 55 Cal.App.3d 288, 126 Cal.Rptr. 138 (1976), a California court refused to return an illegitimate infant to its natural father, when to do so would remove him from his "preadoptive" home, where the child lived for five years. Although acknowledging a strong preference for a parent over a nonparent, the court stated, in part, that, "if the award of custody to a parent as against the claim of a nonparent would be harmful to the child, custody must be awarded to the nonparent." 55 Cal.App.3d at 301, 126 Cal.Rptr. at 147.

"Harm" was described in Reyna to include, "uproot[ing] the child from the care and love of the nonparents with whom it has been living for a substantial period of time and plac[ing] it with the father with whom it has never had contact." 55 Cal.App.3d at 302, 126 Cal.Rptr. at 147.

Massachusetts courts have also adopted the best interest approach in child relinquishment cases. In Revocation of Appointment of a Guardian, 360 Mass. 81, 271 N.E.2d 621 (1971), the court did not permit the return of an infant to his natural mother where the mother had not read the relinquishment form which she signed after it had been explained to her. The court expressed an interest in protecting the state adoption system and stated that the "system obviously could be greatly injured if prospective adoptive parents could not rely on the availability of children placed in their custody[.]" 360 Mass. at 85, 271 N.E.2d at 624.

Further, the Massachusetts court held that the predominant consideration in such cases was always the welfare of the child, and that where an infant had been in the home of prospective adoptive parents for a substantial period of time, in that case a year and a half, that "[h]is environment and sense of security should not be disturbed without a clear showing of significant benefit to him." 360 Mass. at 89, 271 N.E.2d at 625.

This Court has not been confronted previously with a case involving relinquishment of child custody by a minor parent to a licensed private child welfare agency or to the West Virginia Department of Human Services which had not been ruled upon by the trial court within a reasonable time and, thus, we have never been presented with the question of whether the best interest standard should be applied to these circumstances. We believe, under the circumstances of this case, where the child has spent a substantial period of time in the home of foster parents, pending a ruling by the trial court on whether to approve a minor parent's relinquishment of child custody, extraordinary circumstances exist which demand that the best interests of the child not only be considered but be given primary importance. In such a case the minor parent's right to revoke his or her relinquishment ceases to be absolute, due to the passage of the unreasonable period of time.

In Commonwealth ex rel. Martino v. Blough, 201 Pa.Super. 346, 191 A.2d 918 (1963), the court in a child custody case considered the "tragic effect that judicial delay has had on this case." 201 Pa.Super. at 351, 191 A.2d at 920. A delay of about two years in Martino was attributable to several persons, namely, the trial court reporter, trial counsel, and the trial court. The appellate court in Martino refused "to go outside of the record" (201 Pa.Super. at 352, 191 A.2d at 920) to examine the current status of the relationships between the then four-year-old child and her natural father and between the child and her foster parents (the natural mother had died when the child was about 14-months old). The court felt "compelled to decide this case on the basis of a status which no longer exists" (id.) due to the two-year judicial delay. We, on the other hand, believe that the appropriate procedure is to remand for development of a record on the existing state of facts, rather than making a decision on a "stale" record.

Martino also discusses the best interest of the child in the context of a changed environment:

> If this child had spent a num ber of years with the [foster parents] when the father sought custody, the probabilities are that it would not have been advisable to subject her to a change d environment and to rem ove her from the home to which she had becom e accustomed. But [the child] was only 19 months old when her fa ther sought custody of her. ... "A child of two years of age or under will form new a ttachments quickly if treated kindly by those into whose care it is given. In that respect it resem bles a young tree whose roots have not yet taken deep hold in th e nourishing earth, but when a child is m uch beyond the age of two years, it becom es strongly attached to those who stand in pare ntal relationship to it and who have tenderly cared for it. Its bonds of affe ction have becom e so strong that to surrender them suddenly may result not only in the child's unhappiness, but also in its physical injury."

201 Pa.Super. at 351, 191 A.2d at 920.

Similarly, in this case, by the time the trial court was ruling on the appellee's relinquishment, the child "had spent a number of years" with the foster parents/intervenors, and was over four years of age. Consequently, her "bonds of affection [for her foster parents may] have become so strong that to surrender them suddenly may result not only in the child's unhappiness, but also in [her] physical injury." Id. The trial court did not, however, consider this extremely important factor. It should do so on remand.

Further, we emphasize that W.Va.Code, 49-3-1(a) [1977, 1984] requires relinquishments by minor parents to a licensed private child welfare agency or to the Department of Human Services to be approved by a judge of competent jurisdiction before the action becomes valid and final. The statute we believe entrusts to the court, as a very important factor in determining whether to approve the relinquishment, the determination of the best interests of the child involved. This is especially important when there is a substantial delay in the trial court's ruling on the relinquishment. See footnote 6

While this Court heretofore has not specifically applied the best interest standard to relinquishment approval cases, a very close analogy may be drawn from this Court's treatment of child custody situations. We have repeatedly held that in contests involving the custody of infants the welfare of the child is of paramount and controlling importance and is the "polar star" by which the discretion of the court will be guided. Specifically, we stated in syl. pt. 4 of State ex rel. Harmon v. Utterback, 144 W.Va. 419, 108 S.E.2d 521 (1959):

> When a parent, by agreem ent or otherwis e, has transferred, relinquished or surrendered the custody of his or her child to a third person and subsequently dem ands the return of the child, the action of the court in determining whether the custody of the child shall rem ain in such third person or whether the child shall be returned to its parent depends upon which course will promote the welfare a nd best interests of the child; and the parent will not be permitted to re claim the custody of the child unless the parent shows that such change of custody will materially promote the moral and physical welfare of the child.

However, this Court placed a limitation on this ruling in later cases. In Hammack v. Wise, 158 W.Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975), we acknowledged our adherence to the "polar star" concept, but stated that the concept will not be invoked to deprive an "unoffending parent" of his or her natural right to the custody of a child. We applied the standard of the "unoffending parent" in Ford v. Ford, 175 W.Va. 25, 303 S.E.2d 253 (1983), and held that a natural mother who left her child in the care of its grandparents under an apparent agreement that the arrangement would be temporary was an "unoffending parent," not having led the caretakers to believe that they might have permanent custody of the infant. Therefore, this Court affirmed the trial court's ruling to return the infant to the natural mother, even in the absence of evidence that to do so would be in the best interests of the child. Specifically, this Court stated:

> Our decision is based on this well-esta blished principle of law [that the natural parent's right to custody of his or her child is param ount to that of any third party] . In th is case the record cont ains no evidence that the appellee intended perm anently to ab andon or relinquish her rights to Michelle when she left the appella nts' home.... There was no agreement > between the parties, either oral or written, that Michelle would be remaining with her grandparents permanently.

172 W.Va. at 27, 303 S.E.2d at 255. On the basis of this finding, coupled with the fact that there was no evidence that the natural mother was an unfit parent, this Court held that the mother was an "unoffending parent" entitled to custody of her child, regardless of whether the child's best interests would be better promoted by continuing to live with her grandparents.

In the case before us, while counsel for the appellant Department of Human Services suggested that the "meaningful relationship" existing between the child and the intervening foster parents should be taken into consideration, the trial court made no finding on the best interests of the child. In In Re DiMatteo, 62 N.C.App. 571, 303 S.E.2d 84 (1983), the Court of Appeals of North Carolina refused to uphold the trial court's decision to return a child to the home of his father without making a finding on the best interests of the child. Instead, the court remanded the case to the trial court with instructions to make a finding on the best interests of the child. We agree with that court's holding that no determination of the child's custody should be made without first giving primary consideration to the child's best interests, with some consideration also given to the interests and the fitness of the natural and foster parents. See footnote 7

Therefore, we remand this case to the trial court with instructions to receive evidence and to make a finding of fact on the child's best interests presently. We emphasize that the appellee clearly did not intend to leave the child with the Department of Human Services for a temporary time, but, rather, executed a permanent relinquishment form. Although she protested the termination of her parental rights at the subsequent relinquishment hearing, it may be relevant that the appellee waited about three years to file a habeas corpus petition to obtain a decision on the issue of the infant's custody and, thus, permitted the arrangement with the foster parents to continue for several years. However, we make no decision at this time on that issue, instead leaving it also to the trial court.

Upon all of the above, the final order of the trial court is reversed, and this matter is remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith, including an order by the trial court ruling on the relinquishment within 60 days after its receipt of this opinion. See footnote 8

Reversed and remanded with directions.

Footnote: 1 The appellee was in the legal custody of the Commonwealth of Virginia while living with her mother and stepfather, in 1980. On July 25, 1980, the appellee was placed in a foster home. Being approximately seven months pregnant, the appellee moved into a "temporary" foster home for a period of 12 days. Thereafter, she moved into her "permanent" foster home. The appellee remained there until about three weeks after the baby was born.

Footnote: 2 The appellee was also able to return to school, while her "permanent" foster parent cared for her newborn daughter. However, there was testimony that conflict arose between her "permanent" foster parent and the appellee when the appellee was not willing to care for the child while not attending school. In October, 1980, the appellee returned to the home of her "temporary" foster parents at her request.

Footnote: 3 There was testimony that the appellee did not care to take the baby out in public because she felt that her motherhood was a poor reflection on herself. Further, the appellee told the trial court that her boyfriend at that time did not want her to retain parental rights to the infant.

Footnote: 4 In October, 1980, the appellee failed to return to her foster home and instead spent the night at her boyfriend's trailer. One of her foster parents and a social worker with the Department of Human Services went to the trailer and took her from there to the office of the Department of Human Services. That day she signed the consent to adopt form.
We note that the putative father of the child was duly notified of the relinquishment hearing. See W.Va.Code, 49-3-1(b) [1977, 1984]; Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645, 92 S.Ct. 1208, 31 L.Ed.2d 551 (1972).

Footnote: 5 The appellant also claims the trial court erred by concluding that the appellee's relinquishment should not be approved because the appellee was not informed of her right to counsel before deciding to relinquish her child. Section 15210(C) of the Social Services Manual utilized by the West Virginia Department of Human Services states the following: When the worker feels that a termination of parental rights is in the child's best interests, but the parent cannot reach a decision to relinquish voluntarily, the worker should discuss with the parents his plan to approach the court to seek guardianship and his reasons for taking this step. The parent should understand his legal rights and should be encouraged to seek legal counsel to represent him.
Instead of focusing on the earlier apparent noncompliance with this regulation, the trial court should have inquired into the factors, such as the best interests of the child, which would have informed the trial court of the material facts existing at the time of its decision nearly four years later.

Footnote: 6 For example, while Ohio Rev.Code Ann. § 5103.16 (Page 1979) and Va.Code § 63.1-204 (1985) do not require court approval of a minor parent's relinquishment of parental rights to an agency, W.Va.Code, 49- 3-1(a) has done so since 1945, thus enabling a judge to consider not only the natural parents' interests but the best interests of the child before approving the relinquishment.

Footnote: 7 In this regard, we note that the record before this Court indicates that the appellee is now married, has another child and is apparently much more mature than she was at the time she executed the relinquishment form.

Footnote: 8 The trial court's delay in ruling in this case was longer than the period of 33 months in State ex rel. Patterson v. Aldredge, 173 W.Va. 446, 317 S.E.2d 805 (1984). In syl. pt. 1 of that case we held:
Under article III, § 17 of the West Virginia Constitution, which provides that "justice shall be administered without sale, denial or delay," and under Canon 3A(5) of the West Virginia Judicial Code of Ethics (1982 Replacement Vol.), which provides that "A judge should dispose promptly of the business of the court," judges have an affirmative duty to render timely decisions on matters properly submitted within a reasonable time following their submission. See also State ex rel. Taylor v. MacQueen, 77 W.Va. 174, 322 S.E.2d 709 (1984) (two-year judicial delay). Child custody cases certainly should be decided promptly. Regardless of who is responsible for the delay in this case, the child is the unfortunate victim.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.' In Re R.J.M., ___ W.Va. ___, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syllabus point 1, Interest of Darla B., 175 W.Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985).

2. Neither W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(b) nor W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(c) mandates that an improvement period must last for twelve months. It is within the court's discretion to grant an improvement period within the applicable statutory requirements; it is also within the court's discretion to terminate the improvement period before the twelve-month time frame has expired if the court is not satisfied that the defendant is making the necessary progress. The only minimum time period set forth in the statute is the three-month period granted in the pre-dispositional section, W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(b).

Brotherton, Justice:

This case involves the appeal of Tauna P., the mother of the above captioned children, from the June 12, 1992, order of the Circuit Court of Wood County which terminated her parental rights, placed the children into protective custody, including her unborn child, and ordered that the Department of Health and Human Services assist the appellant in being surgically sterilized.

The appellant/mother is approximately twenty-three years old. She has five children and has never been married. The children's ages range from approximately six years to one year. On October 4, 1991, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) filed a petition in the Circuit Court of Wood County, pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-6-3 (1990), seeking temporary custody of Lacey, Shanna, Nicholas, and Michelle. Shortly thereafter, the appellant became pregnant with her fifth child. A preliminary hearing was held on October 15, 1991, at which time the court heard evidence. A review of the transcript reveals that since 1989, the appellant has been investigated on numerous occasions by various social service agencies in Ohio and West Virginia for allegations of abuse and neglect of her children. The HHS contends that the appellant also has a history of moving from county to county, which coincided with the social services agencies' investigations of charges of abuse and neglect.

In early 1991, the appellant was living in Washington County, Ohio, when she was charged with neglecting her children. In April, 1991, the appellant agreed to a protection plan in order to prevent the removal of the children. Services were set up for budgeting, parenting skills, housekeeping skills, and nutritional education. The appellant never attended any of the appointments or classes. In May, 1991, the Ohio Department of Human Services planned to take the children from the home because of allegations of drug use and child abandonment, but the appellant moved to Wood County, West Virginia, before they could be removed. Those allegations were not substantiated. On May 31, 1991, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Services received a referral from the Washington County, Ohio, Human Services Department regarding the appellant's neglect charges. Child Protective Services Worker Tracy Morris was assigned to the case.

On August 8, 1991, Morris met with the appellant and discussed enrolling the children in pre-school, infant stimulation classes, and daycare. The appellant failed to keep three appointments to enroll her oldest child, Lacey, in the Headstart Program. By the time Lacey was enrolled, the program was already full for the year. The appellant then enrolled Lacey and Shanna in pre-school, but their attendance was sporadic.

On August 26, 1991, the appellant informed the HHS that her electricity was going to be shut off for nonpayment. The HHS used funds to pay the overdue bill, and shortly thereafter, Morris paid a home visit and observed the appellant strike Shanna and Nicholas.

On August 27, 1991, the appellant again contacted the HHS and told them that her water was being shut off. The appellant also asked if Michelle's father could move in with her. Morris told the appellant that that was not a good idea because of Mr. Smith's past physical abuse of Shanna and because he hit all of the children.See footnote 1 The appellant admitted that the father stayed in the house on the weekends and that she was aware that he hit the children. Michelle's paternal grandmother, Pat, was already living with the appellant and the children, and was believed to be a poor influence.

On September 11, 1991, Morris visited the home again and noted that the children were bruised and the baby, Michelle, was left unattended on an elevated changing table. Michelle also had a case of diaper rash so severe that she was bleeding. Morris reported that the water was still off and that water was being kept in large, unrefrigerated, unprotected containers, in which the children played. On that date, the appellant signed a protective services plan whereby she agreed to provide a safe, clean, and healthy environment for the children, and keep all her utilities on and paid by budgeting her finances. However, by September 16, 1991, all the children were sick with varying degrees of fever, diarrhea, congestion, and coughing. Morris took the appellant and the children to the emergency room, and it was determined that Nicholas had pneumonia and an ear infection. At that time, the appellant was given several prescriptions for the children and asked to bring stool samples back to the hospital in order to determine the cause of the diarrhea. Follow-up appointments were also made.

On September 19, 1991, the appellant signed a protection plan to prevent the removal of her children. The plan stated as follows:

[T]he children are not to be left alone with any member of the _____ family, Mike, [Michelle's father,] and Pat, [Michelle's grandmother], included, or any other person who is not suitable, intoxicated, or under the influence of drugs. The children are not to be hit in any way. Discipline shall be enforced by time-outs or standing in the corner. All shots are to be caught up by October 30th. All medical attention shall be sought as soon as any child appears ill. Follow-up for this treatment will be done as directed . . . . [T]he children were to attend pre-school and/or daycare every day unless ill or services aren't available . . . Diapers will be checked every hour and changed if at all messy . . . and . . . rent and utility bills will be paid on time because the utilities had all been shut off.

Unfortunately, the appellant failed to follow any part of that plan. Prescriptions were not filled, no samples were returned to the hospital, and the children were not taken back for their follow-up appointments, with the exception of Shanna, who saw a physician who wanted tests performed. Those tests were not done. By October 4, 1991, all four children had pneumonia.

On October 4, 1991, the HHS filed a petition in the Circuit Court of Wood County seeking temporary custody of the four children. By order dated October 15, 1991, the court granted the HHS' request. On November 8, 1991, the court held an adjudicatory hearing, and the appellant stipulated to the allegations regarding the medical neglect. The court ruled that the children were neglected children as defined by W.Va. Code § 49-1-3(c) and § 49-1-3(g)(1)(A) (1991), but allowed the appellant an out-of-home improvement period during which the children remained in foster care.See footnote 2

On December 15, 1991, the court signed an agreed order approving the family case plan prepared by the Department of Human Services. On February 4, 1992, the oldest child, Lacey, was returned to the appellant's home because she had been acting out in school and it was believed that her conduct occurred because she missed her mother. The other children remained in foster care. On March 20, 1992, the court conducted a review of the improvement period. At that time, the evidence showed that the appellant had not complied with any of the requirements in the family case plan. Further, since Lacey had been returned to the appellant's care on February 4, 1992, the child had missed several days of pre-school, her behavior was quite violent while she was with her mother, and the child was dressed in old, ill-fitting, inappropriate clothes instead of wearing the new clothes purchased for her while she was in foster care. It was also revealed that the appellant was approximately four months pregnant, although she had not received any prenatal care. The appellant stated that she had intended to have her tubes tied after Michelle was born, but had not had it done.

On May 1, 1992, the court reviewed the improvement period and ordered it discontinued. On June 12, 1992, a dispositional hearing was held, and the court terminated the appellant's parental rights. Evidence taken at that hearing was essentially the same as that heard in October, 1991, and March 20, 1992. The appellant's caseworker, Ms. Morris, also recommended termination of the parental rights. Ms. Morris noted that during the improvement period, the appellant only made an effort to follow the plan while living at the Eve Shelter, where she attended some meetings and had two hours of counseling. Once she left the shelter, Ms. Morris stated the appellant reverted to her old habits. The court then ordered that:

> [I]nasmuch as the respondent-mother has indicated upon the record that she desires to be surgically sterilized after the birth of this unborn child, the Court hereby ORDERS that the Department of Health and Human Services assist the respondent-mother and ensure that such procedure is performed after the birth of this child, and to provide financial assistance as is available for such procedure to be performed.

The court also held that the Department of Human Services "shall take protective custody . . . and maintain such custody until further order of the Court" following the birth of the fifth child. It appears that the child is, at this moment, still in the appellant's home. Following the birth of the fifth child, the appellant voluntarily opted for a five-year Norplant contraceptive implant rather than a tubal ligation.

It is from this ruling that the appellant files the current appeal. Specifically, the appellant argued that the court erred in (1) terminating the respondent's improvement period early; (2) terminating the respondent's parental rights; (3) making its findings based upon "abundantly clear" evidence rather than by clear and convincing evidence as required by W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(c); (4) that the court exceeded its jurisdiction when it ordered the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Services to insure that the respondent mother be sterilized; and (5) that the court exceeded its jurisdiction when it ordered the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Services to take custody of the unborn child.

I.

The appellant argues that the court erred in terminating her improvement period after only six months, when the March 9, 1992, report of the Department of Health and Human Services provided for a twelve-month improvement period. Specifically, the appellant contends that W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(6)(c) (1992) forbids the court from terminating the improvement period less than six months after it was granted. We disagree.

As in any child welfare case, the best interests of the child are foremost in cases involving the termination of parental rights. "[A]ll parental rights in child custody matters are subordinate to the interests of the innocent child." David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W.Va. 57, 385 S.E.2d 912, 916 (1989). In syllabus point 1 of Interest of Darla B., 175 W.Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985), this Court held:

"[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements." In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

While there is no absolute right to an improvement period in this State, W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(b) provides that an improvement period shall be allowed unless there are compelling reasons to justify the denial of an improvement period. See Matter of Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989). Thus, the Legislature clearly intended to encourage improvement periods prior to the termination of any parental rights. In State ex rel. W.Va. Department of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987), the Court quoted State v. Stritchfield, 167 W.Va. 683, 692-93, 280 S.E.2d 315, 321 (1981):

. . . the statute presumes the entitlement of a parent to an opportunity to ameliorate the conditions or circumstances upon which a child neglect or abuse proceeding is based pending final adjudication, no doubt in recognition of the fundamental right of a parent to the custody of minor children until the unfitness of the parent is proven . . . . Id. at 184.

At the November 8, 1991, hearing, the appellant was granted an improvement period for an indefinite time. The improvement period was terminated after approximately six months.See footnote 3 Contrary to the appellant's argument, nothing in W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(6)(c) or § 49-6-2(b) mandates a twelve-month improvement period. West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(b) permits a pre-dispositional improvement period:

In any proceeding under this article, the parents or custodians may, prior to final hearing, move to be allowed an improvement period of three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based. The court shall allow one such improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof, but may require temporary custody in the state department or other agency during the improvement period. An order granting such improvement period shall require the department to prepare and submit to the court a family case plan in accordance with the provisions of section three [§ 49-6D-3], article six-d of this chapter. (Emphasis added.)

By contrast, W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(6)(c) contemplates a post-dispositional improvement period not to exceed twelve months:

The court may as an alternative disposition allow to the parents or custodians an improvement period not to exceed twelve months. During this period the parental rights shall not be permanently terminated and the court shall require the parent to rectify the conditions upon which the determination was based. No more than one such post-dispositional improvement period may be granted. The court may order the child to be placed with the parents, a relative, the state department or other appropriate placement during the period. At the end of the period the court shall hold a hearing to determine whether the conditions have been adequately improved, and at the conclusion of such hearing, shall make a further dispositional order in accordance with this section. (Emphasis added.)

Thus, neither the post-dispositional improvement period nor the pre-dispositional improvement period is required to extend for twelve months.See footnote 4

In this case, the improvement period was allowed under W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(b), the pre-dispositional improvement period section, which allows a time frame of three to twelve months. The appellant's improvement period lasted approximately six months, well beyond the three-month minimum. Further, regardless of which Code section permitted the improvement period, nothing in either W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(b) or W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(c) mandates that an improvement period must last for twelve months. It is within the court's discretion to grant an improvement period within the applicable statutory requirements; it is also within the court's discretion to terminate the improvement period if the court is not satisfied that the defendant is making the necessary progress before the twelve-month time frame has expired. The only minimum time necessary by statute is the three months required in the pre-dispositional section, W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(b).

Unfortunately, there is little evidence of any attempt by the appellant to ameliorate the circumstances which precipitated the removal of her children. The only evidence of any improvement occurred while the appellant lived in a shelter, when she attended a few Al-Anon and AA meetings, as well as a women's support group and two hours of counseling. As soon as she left the shelter, however, she reverted to her old habits and failed to attend any meetings, counseling sessions, classes, do the STEP book reports, journals, or the required volunteer work. Further, at the March 20, 1992, hearing, it was revealed that she was living with another man with a drinking problem. She also missed several scheduled visits with her children. Thus, it was clear to the lower court, as it is to this Court, that if she could not achieve even a few of the goals in her improvement plan while the children lived away from her, then she would have even less success while she had to care for five children. Consequently, we conclude that the Circuit Court of Wood County did not exceed its authority in terminating the improvement period when it did.

II.

In her second argument, the appellant contends that her parental rights were improperly terminated under W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(c), which provides that parental rights shall not be terminated during the improvement period. In this case, the parental rights were terminated after the improvement period was discontinued. Thus, W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(6)(c) was not violated. Since the appellant does not argue that the court erred in terminating the parental rights based upon the merits of the case, neither shall we. Suffice it to say that the facts more than supported the court's decision to terminate her parental rights based upon her neglect of the children.See footnote 5

III.

The appellant next complains that the court used the wrong standard in making its decision to terminate parental rights. The appellant argues that W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) requires that any finding be made by "clear and convincing" evidence rather than the "abundantly clear" evidence standard used by the Wood County Circuit Court in this case. Again, we disagree.

While we agree that the standard of proof for terminating parental rights is clear and convincing evidence, we have never required that those magic words be uttered in order to properly terminate parental rights. State v. Krystal T., 185 W.Va. 391, 407 S.E.2d 395 (1991). The State claims that the phrases "abundantly clear" and "clear and convincing evidence" are interchangeable. In James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), the Court affirmed a termination of parental rights, stating that "the record is abundantly clear that these parents were unfit, and that accordingly, the lower court should have terminated parental rights . . . ." Id. at 409. Although it would be preferable for the trial courts to use the phrase "clear and convincing evidence," we cannot find that the use of the words "abundantly clear" was enough to negate the finding in this case.

IV.

The appellant's final claim is perhaps the most provocative. The appellant argues that the trial court exceeded its jurisdiction by ordering that the Department of Health and Human Services insure that she be sterilized.See footnote 6 The appellant argues that her right to bear children is a "fundamental and natural right" under the United States Constitution, being one of those rights which "grows out of the nature of man and not law." She also argues that the court order violates her personal rights under the United States Constitution because the order invades her right to personal security in her life, limb, body, health, and personal liberty.See footnote 7

The State counters that it did not order the appellant sterilized; instead, it ordered the HHS to assist the appellant in her expressed desire to be sterilized.See footnote 8 Further, although the appellant appealed the court's order, she voluntarily obtained a five-year Norplant contraceptive implant. Thus, the issue of whether the court could order that the defendant be sterilized is moot. It seems, however, that such an order could not be upheld. Another jurisdiction has concluded that statutory authority is required before the court can order involuntary sterilization even in felony child abuse cases.See footnote 9 No case law seems to exist in any jurisdiction in which involuntary sterilization was ordered in situations involving misdemeanor child abuse or unprosecuted cases of child abuse.

Accordingly, we affirm the June 12, 1992, order of the Circuit Court of Wood County. Affirmed.

Footnote: 1In October, 1990, while Michelle's father, Mike, and her grandmother, Pat, were watching the children, Shanna was severely beaten and bruised by either the father or Pat. There are also other incidences where teachers or daycare providers noted bruises on the children. At one point, Lacey told the daycare provider that her mother hit her with a board. They also noted that the children's clothes were often filthy, ill-fitting, and inappropriate.

Footnote: 2As part of the improvement period, the court required that the appellant do the following:

(1) read a chapter of the STEP book and write a one page report each week; (2) attend the next available STEP classes; (3) secure a doctor and dentist and take children to all routine appointments; (4) seek medical and dental help when the children become ill or need services; (5) enroll children in and have them regularly attend programs to enrich their development; (6) volunteer at the Wee People Pre-school; (7) attend Al-Anon meetings; (8) have no contact with any member of the family of Michelle's father; (9) initiate individual therapy; (10) keep a journal of thoughts, ideas and daily activities; (11) seek employment or apply for AFDC when children are returned; (12) make a monthly budget; (13) move to safe, adequately-sized housing; (14) obtain utilities in her name; (15) notify her case worker whenever she moves; (16) provide a list to the Department with the name and number of two places where she sought employment; (17) attend all regularly scheduled visits with the children; and (18) notify the Department if she cannot visit her children (R. at 23-27).

Footnote: 3The improvement period in this case began following the November 8, 1991, adjudicatory hearing and terminated on May 1, 1992. Counsel made references to a twelve-month period, but no definite time limitation was set out at that hearing.

Footnote: 4The procedure under which an improvement period and subsequent termination of parental rights can happen is structured by statute. In State v. T.C., 172 W.Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983), this Court stated that before any court can make any of the dispositional alternatives found under W.Va. Code § 49-6-5, the court must have held a hearing under W.Va. Code § 49-6-2 to determine whether the child was abused or neglected. Id. at 688. Only after a determination of neglect or abuse under W.Va. Code § 49-6-2 can the HHS proceed under W.Va. Code § 49-6-5. Id. Under § 49-6-5, the HHS is required to file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, describing what is planned for the child.

Once the court has the case plan, the court will then proceed with a dispositional hearing, with both the petitioner and respondents having an opportunity to be heard. Following the dispositional hearing, the court has the following options: (1) Dismiss the petition; (2) Refer the child, the parents and other family members to an agency for assistance and dismiss the petition; (3) Return the child to the parent's home under the supervision of the state department; (4) Order terms of supervision meant to assist the child and parents; or (5) Upon finding that the abusing parent was unwilling or unable to provide adequately for the child's needs, commit the child to a welfare agency or a suitable person who will be appointed guardian by the court. W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a) (1992). Under W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(c), the legislature permitted the court to allow, as an alternative disposition, the parents a second chance at an improvement period not to exceed twelve months.

Footnote: 5The appellant also claimed that the trial court erred in placing her unborn child in protective custody. Nothing in W.Va. Code § 49-6-1 et seq. forbids the court's actions. Indeed, given her history, the court would have been remiss to not flag HHS that the child's care needed to be monitored. The infant is currently living with the appellant and is being monitored by Ms. Morris for HHS. "Protective custody" merely means the child would come under the auspices of HHS once born. No decision to terminate parental rights could happen until the statutory requirements, listed in footnote 4, were met.

Footnote: 6West Virginia Code § 27-26-1 et seq. (1992) authorizes the sterilization of mental defectives, as opposed to criminals.

Footnote: 7See also Note, Sterilization Under Federally Funded Family Planning Programs, 11 New England Law Review 589 (1976).

Footnote: 8This Court acknowledges the appellant's constitutional argument regarding her right to bear children. However, just as the Constitution limits our right to free speech in cases of "fighting words" or speech that endangers public safety, so too must any right to bear children be limited by actions which endanger the safety of those children. This Court has an equal duty to protect the constitutional rights of children, set out in Amendment XIV to the United States Constitution. The Constitution guarantees their right not to be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Further, Article III of the Constitution of the State of West Virginia [Bill of Rights] provides:

§ 1. All men [persons] are, by nature, equally free and independent, and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity, namely: the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and of pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.

The right to bear children carries with it the responsibility for both parents to care for, nurture, and provide for the children to the best of their joint abilities. At a minimum, the parents must see to the children's health and safety and equip the children, through parenting and education, to provide for themselves as adults. In other words, the parents must help the child to obtain a quality and productive life.

The facts of this case show parents who care little for the welfare of their children. Unfortunately, this is not an isolated situation -- similar cases appear before this Court on an increasingly regular basis. We find ourselves settling for temporary solutions, such as removing the abused children to foster care, rather than doing anything to prevent reoccurrences. Most of these children have little or no chance of achieving their constitutional rights to property, happiness and safety, let alone a normal life.

Sex education is a necessity in a state with a high rate of teenage pregnancies and illegitimate births. Of even greater necessity is a program emphasizing the awesome responsibilities that parents owe their children, particularly where there seems to be a complete lack of responsibility for the children they create. While it seems unlikely that this State would require sterilization of men and women who are convicted of a felony related to the neglect and/or abuse of the children they conceive, the introduction of a long term but temporary contraceptive implant (Norplant) makes this option more palatable. However, this decision belongs in the hands of the Legislature or HHS, not the Court. What we do emphasize is that something must be done to stop the tide of neglected, abused children. It is not fair to them, and the State cannot afford the results of unchecked neglect. As we noted above, a constitutional right is guaranteed only until abused. Neither this State nor the children can afford to let this abuse continue.

Footnote: 9See Buck v. Bell, 274 U.S. 200, 47 S.Ct. 584, 71 L.Ed. 1000 (1927) for an early decision approving of a Virginia statute which permitted the sterilization of "imbeciles." See also Smith v. Superior Court of the State of Arizona in and for Coconino County, 725 P.2d 1101 (Ariz. 1986), in which the Arizona Supreme Court held that the trial court did not have jurisdiction to require that defendants convicted of felony child abuse be sterilized as a condition of a reduced sentence, absent statutory authorization. The Arizona Court noted that some jurisdictions recognized the power of courts to order sterilization, although the Court found the majority of jurisdictions required statutory authorization:

Admittedly, there is a minority view authorizing sterilization of incompetents without specific statutory authority." Wyatt v. Aderholt, 368 F.Supp. 1383 (M.D.Alaska 1974); In re C.D.M., 627 P.2d 607 (Alaska 1981); In re Guardianship of Hayes, 93 Wash. 228, 608 P.2d 635 (1980). The California Supreme Court has gone so far as to invalidate a specific statute prohibiting sterilization. Conservatorship of Valerie N., 40 Cal.3d 143, 154, 707 P.2d 760, 771-72, 219 Cal.Rptr. 387, 404 (1985). . . .

More recent cases have held that sterilization should not be allowed absent a specific statute authorizing such procedure. This appears to be the majority view. See In re C.D.M., 627 P.2d at 607; Guardianship of Tulley, 83 Cal.App.3d 698, 700, 146 Cal.Rptr. 266, 268 (1978), cert. denied, 440 U.S. 967, 99 S.Ct. 1519, 59 L.Ed.2d 783 (1979); Annot., "Jurisdiction of Court to Permit Sterilization of Mentally Defective Person in Absence of Specific Statutory Authority," 74 A.L.R.3d 1210, 1212 (1976). 725 P.2d at 1103-04. SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'Rulings on the admissibility of evidence are largely within a trial court's sound discretion and should not be disturbed unless there has been an abuse of discretion.' State v. Louk, 171 W. Va. 639, 301 S.E.2d 596, 599 (1983)." Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Peyatt, 173 W. Va. 317, 315 S.E.2d 574 (1983).

2. "The discretion of the trial court in ruling on the propriety of argument by counsel before the jury will not be interfered with by the appellate court, unless it appears that the rights of the complaining party have been prejudiced, or that manifest injustice resulted therefrom." Syl. Pt. 3, State v. Boggs, 103 W. Va. 641, 138 S.E.321 (1927).

3. "'Pursuant to Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 124 S.Ct. 1354, 158 L.Ed.2d 177 (2004), the Confrontation Clause contained within the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution bars the admission of a testimonial statement by a witness who does not appear at trial, unless the witness is unavailable to testify and the accused had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the witness.' Syllabus Point 6, State v. Mechling, 219 W. Va. 366, 633 S.E.2d 311 (2006)." Syl. Pt. 1, State v. Jessica Jane M., 226 W. Va. 242, 700 S.E.2d 302 (2010).

4. Where the out-of-court statements of a non-testifying individual are introduced into evidence solely to provide foundation or context for understanding a defendant's responses to those statements, the statements are offered for a non-hearsay purpose and the introduction of the evidence does not violate the defendant's rights under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 124 S.Ct. 1354, 158 L.Ed.2d 177 (2004) and State v. Mechling, 219 W. Va. 366, 633 S.E.2d 311 (2006).

5. "Errors involving deprivation of constitutional rights will be regarded as harmless only if there is no reasonable possibility that the violation contributed to the conviction." Syl. Pt. 20, State v. Thomas, 157 W. Va. 640, 203 S.E.2d 445 (1974)

6. "'"A judgment will not be reversed for any error in the record introduced by or invited by the party seeking reversal." Syl. Pt. 21, State v. Riley, 151 W. Va. 364, 151 S.E.2d 308 (1966).' Syllabus point 4, State v. Johnson, 197 W. Va. 575, 476 S.E.2d 522 (1996)." Syl. Pt. 4, State v. Mann, 205 W. Va. 303, 518 S.E.2d 60 (1999).

7. "'An appellant or plaintiff in error will not be permitted to complain of error in the admission of evidence which he offered or elicited, and this is true even of a defendant in a criminal case.' Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Bowman, 155 W. Va. 562, 184 S.E.2d 314 (1971)." Syl. Pt. 3, State v. Crabtree, 198 W. Va. 620, 482 S.E.2d 605 (1996).

8. "A judgment of conviction will not be set aside because of improper remarks made by a prosecuting attorney to a jury which do not clearly prejudice the accused or result in manifest injustice." Syl. Pt. 5, State v. Sugg, 193 W. Va. 388, 456 S.E.2d 469 (1995).

9. "Four factors are taken into account in determining whether improper prosecutorial comment is so damaging as to require reversal: (1) the degree to which the prosecutor's remarks have a tendency to mislead the jury and to prejudice the accused; (2) whether the remarks were isolated or extensive; (3) absent the remarks, the strength of competent proof introduced to establish the guilt of the accused; and (4) whether the comments were deliberately placed before the jury to divert attention to extraneous matters." Syl. Pt. 6, State v. Sugg, 193 W. Va. 388, 456 S.E.2d 469 (1995).

Workman, Justice:

The petitioner, Jason Paul Lambert, was convicted in the Circuit Court of Marion County, West Virginia, of one count of sexual abuse by a parent, guardian or custodian, and one count of distribution and display of obscene matter to a minor. The victim, S.W.,[1] who was four years old at the time of the offenses, was deemed incompetent to testify. On appeal, the petitioner claims that admission at trial of certain of S.W.'s out-of-court statements violated his rights under the United States Constitution, Amendment VI, and the West Virginia Constitution, article III, section 14; and that the prosecuting attorney's closing argument contained statements so egregious as to constitute plain error.[2]

After careful consideration of the parties' briefs, the oral argument, the appendix record, and the applicable law, we affirm the judgment of the circuit court.

I. PROCEDURAL AND FACTUAL HISTORY

The petitioner was indicted in the February, 2011, term of court for the felony offenses of sexual abuse by a parent, guardian or custodian, West Virginia Code § 61-8D-5

[1]Because of the sensitive nature of the facts alleged in this case, we follow our normal practice and refer to the child by her initials rather than by her full name. See In re Cesar L., 221 W. Va. 249, 252 n.1, 654 S.E.2d 373, 376 n.1 (2007); In re Randy H., 220 W. Va. 122, 125 n.1, 640 S.E.2d 185, 188 n.1 (2006); In re Clifford K., 217 W. Va. 625, 630 n.1, 619 S.E.2d 138, 143 n.1 (2005); State ex rel. W. Va. Dep't of Human Servs. v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 689 n.1, 356 S.E.2d 181, 182 n.1 (1987).

[2]There was no contemporaneous objection made at trial to the closing argument.

(2010), and distribution and display of obscene matter to a minor, West Virginia Code § 61-8A-2(a) (2010). Both offenses were alleged to have occurred on December 4-5, 2010, at a time when the petitioner was caring for the victim, S.W., and her sister. The factual underpinning for the charges was that the petitioner, with S.W. present and observing, went into his bedroom and masturbated to ejaculation while watching a pornographic film on his television set. The petitioner's defense, boiled down to its essence, was that although the child was in the bedroom while these acts took place, the petitioner didn't intend for her to see what he was doing.

The investigation that led to the charges against the petitioner began after S.W. reported to her mother that "Uncle Jason" had "showed me his tail." Thereafter, Trooper Adam Scott spoke with S.W.'s mother, conducted a forensic interview of the child, and took a statement from the petitioner. Trooper Scott's interrogation technique included confronting the petitioner with information allegedly given to him by S.W. – whether true or not – to test his initial protestations of innocence. Ultimately, the petitioner admitted to Trooper Scott that he had masturbated in his bedroom while watching a pornographic film, but that he didn't realize S.W. was present, or, alternatively, that S.W. was positioned in such a way that she could not have seen either the masturbation or the pornography. Significantly, although the petitioner maintained that he never intentionally exposed himself to the child, he admitted that she had probably seen him and that's why he asked her "not to tell."

During the discovery phase of the criminal proceedings, S.W. was evaluated by a psychologist to determine her competency to testify. Based on the psychologist's report, and after a full evidentiary hearing at which the psychologist testified, the circuit court held that > as a matter of law, the Court finds that S.W. the alleged victim in this matter is not competent to testify, and does GRANT the defendant's motion to preclude said minor child's testimony and all testimony regarding the statements of said minor child in this matter. The Court's finding is based on the conclusion that because of the age of the child the probative value is outweighed by the prejudicial effect of her testimony and statements to the defendant (sic) in this proceeding.

During the trial, the issue of S.W.'s out-of-court statements came up in three different contexts. First, S.W.'s mother was permitted to testify as to the child's disclosure to her of the incident, see text supra. The circuit court deemed this testimony admissible because it was offered not for the truth of the child's statement, but to show how and why the criminal investigation began. Second, Trooper Scott was permitted to play a tape recorded interview of the petitioner, during the course of which interview the trooper referred several times to information that S.W. had allegedly given him. The court deemed this testimony admissible because it was offered not for the truth of the child's statements, but to illustrate the officer's investigative technique, and to give context to the petitioner's answers to the officer's questions. Third, Stacy Miller, a Child Protective Services worker, was permitted to reiterate the child's statement to her mother; further, she testified that in a search of the petitioner's home, she and Trooper Scott found "[l]otions that the child had referenced." The court deemed the former testimony admissible because it was offered not for the truth of the child's statement, but to show how and why CPS became involved in the case. With respect to the latter testimony, the court instructed the witness: "Just don't reference what was told to you by the child since she will not be testifying. Leave her out of it. Just say what you saw."

With respect to the testimony of all three of these witnesses, the circuit court specifically admonished the jury that S.W.'s statements were not being offered for the truth of what the child had said. Following the testimony of S.W.'s mother, the court instructed the jury that > [t]his child is five years old. She won't testify. She's not old enough to testify, or mature enough to testify, which is not uncommon. This comment that she made to her mother is not offered for the truth of that matter. It's not offered to prove that it actually happened. It's just offered to you for your consideration to kind of show you how this investigation got started. Okay? Not that the child's statements were true, but rather those statements to her mother are what started the investigation.

During the testimony of Trooper Scott, the court instructed the jury that

> [t]he Court has previously determined as a matter of law that this [tape recorded statement of the petitioner's interview] is admissible for your consideration. Let me mention one thing also. The trooper has talked about his interview techniques. I don't know whether you've seen Law and Order on TV or that sort of thing, but sometimes when troopers ask questions of suspects, they don't always – the troopers don't always tell the truth. They may sometimes use techniques in which they lie to the suspect to try to trick them and that sort of thing. I don't know whether that happens in this case. I haven't seen this transcript and I haven't heard the interview. But the trooper may refer to things that he may in his conversation with Mr. Lambert [sic], he may mention things that he says the child said > to him, this four-year-old child that I've determined cannot testify. What he says the child said to him, what the trooper says the child said to him, may or may not be true. And it's not being offered for that truth. Just like yesterday when I told you, I think Ms. Kragenbrink testified to what the child told her, and I told you that you couldn't consider that statement for the truth of the statement of the child, it's the same thing with what Trooper Scott says to Mr. Lambert. What Trooper Scott says the child said to him isn't being offered for the truth of those statements, but rather that's the technique employed by Trooper Scott in getting responses from Mr. Lambert. All right? So if you would please view those statements of Trooper Scott in the CD with caution. Ms. Hawkins, go ahead.

During the testimony of the CPS worker, the court instructed the jury that "[l]et me give the jury the same cautionary instruction that I did before. That testimony by Ms. Miller is not offered for the truth of those reports, but rather to demonstrate what caused the investigation by CPS."

At the conclusion of the trial, the jury found the petitioner guilty on both charges. The circuit court denied the petitioner's Motion for Judgment of Acquittal or in the Alternative a New Trial, and on May 11, 2012, sentenced him to a ten to twenty year term of imprisonment on the sexual abuse charge, to be served concurrent with a five year term of imprisonment on the display of pornography to a minor charge. This appeal followed.

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

In this case, we are initially called upon to address a challenge to the admission of evidence by the trial court. As a general matter, we have held that "'[r]ulings on the admissibility of evidence are largely within a trial court's sound discretion and should not be disturbed unless there has been an abuse of discretion.' State v. Louk, 171 W. Va. 639, 301 S.E.2d 596, 599 (1983)." Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Peyatt, 173 W. Va. 317, 315 S.E.2d 574 (1983). However, the admissibility issue raised in this case is challenged on constitutional grounds. As framed, the issue presents a question of law. This Court has held that "[w]e review questions of law de novo." May v. May, 214 W. Va. 394, 398, 589 S.E.2d 536, 540 (2003); see also State v. Whitt, 220 W. Va. 685, 690, 649 S.E.2d 258, 263 (2007) ("Our review of the constitutional issue raised in this case is plenary."); United States v. Powers, 500 F.3d 500, 505 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Generally, we review alleged violations of the Confrontation Clause de novo." (citation omitted)).

With respect to the petitioner's claim that the State's closing argument was improper, this Court has held that

> In reviewing allegedly improper comments made by a prosecutor during closing argument, we are mindful that '[c]ounsel necessarily have great latitude in the argument of a case,' State v. Clifford, 58 W. Va. 681, 687, 52 S.E. 864, 866 (1906) (citation omitted), and that "[u]ndue restriction should not be placed on a prosecuting attorney in his argument to the jury.' State v. Davis, 139 W. Va. 645, 653, 81 S.E.2d 95, 101 (1954), overruled, in part, on other grounds, State v. Bragg, 140 W. Va. 585, 87 S.E.2d 689 (1955). Accordingly, "[t]he discretion of the trial court in ruling on the propriety of argument by counsel before the jury will not be interfered with by the appellate court, unless it appears that the rights of the complaining party have been prejudiced, or that manifest injustice resulted therefrom.' Syllabus Point 3, State v. Boggs, 103 W. Va. 641, 138 S.E. 321 (1927).

State v. Messer, 223 W. Va. 197, 203, 672 S.E.2d 333, 339 (2008) (citing State v. Graham, 208 W. Va. 463, 468, 541 S.E.2d 341, 346 (2000)).

III. DISCUSSION

A. Confrontation Clause Challenge

The petitioner claims that admission of the out-of-court statements of the victim, one of which was recounted verbatim by S.W.'s mother and the others which could be inferred[3] from Trooper Scott's interrogation of the petitioner and the testimony of Stacy Miller, violated his right to confront the witnesses against him. U.S. Const. amend. VI; W. Va. Const., art. III, § 14.

> 'Pursuant to Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 124 S.Ct. 1354, 158 L.Ed.2d 177 (2004), the Confrontation Clause contained within the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution bars the admission of a testimonial statement by a witness who does not appear at trial, unless the witness is unavailable to testify and the accused had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the witness.' Syllabus Point 6, State v. Mechling, 219 W. Va. 366, 633 S.E.2d 311 (2006).

Syl. Pt. 1, State v. Jessica Jane M., 226 W. Va. 242, 700 S.E.2d 302 (2010). In this regard, it has been established that only hearsay statements fall within the prohibition of the Crawford/Mechling rule. See State v. Waldron, 228 W. Va. 577, 581, 723 S.E.2d 402, 406

[3]See text infra. Trooper Scott intimated to the petitioner during questioning – whether true or not – that information about the offense had been given to him by S.W., and Ms. Miller let it be known that S.W. had said something to her about the petitioner's use of lotion.

(2012) (holding that "[i]t is important to emphasize again that, aside from the testimonial versus nontestimonial issue, a crucial aspect of Crawford is that it only covers hearsay, i.e., out-of-court statements 'offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.'" (quoting United States v. Tolliver, 454 F.3d 660, 665-66 (7th Cir. 2006), cert. denied, 549 U.S. 1149 (2007)). Mindful of this authority, we turn to the specific statements at issue in this case.

The statement made by S.W. to her mother, that "Uncle Jason" had "showed me his tail," was not hearsay, as it was offered "not to prove the truth of the matter asserted, but to explain why [the mother] took [S.W.] to [the authorities]." State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W. Va. 641, 657, 398 S.E.2d 123, 139 (1990); see also State v. James B., Sr., 204 W. Va. 48, 52-54, 511 S.E.2d 459, 463-65 (1998); Jessica Jane M., 226 W. Va. at 248-49, 700 S.E.2d at 308-09; State v. Simmons, No. 35540, slip op. at 4 (W. Va. filed Feb. 11, 2011) ("The mother's testimony describes what her daughter told her, which was the explanation as to why she called her pastor and took A.M. to the hospital. The child's statement was the impetus for the mother's actions.").

Clearly, under our case law there is no Crawford/Mechling question presented with respect to the statement made by S.W. to her mother, and the statement, not being offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, was properly admitted at the petitioner's trial.

The statements of the child fairly inferrable from Trooper Scott's interrogation of the petitioner are likewise not hearsay as they were not introduced at trial to prove the truth of the matters therein. Trooper Scott testified as follows:

> Q: You're allowed to lie during these interviews, aren't you?
> A: We're allowed to what we call bluff. We may bluff about evidence we may or may not have. We're allowed to talk about polygraph examinations and the possibility of a person taking it and how he would come out upon that. And we are constitutionally, and it's been deemed in the supreme court, valid uses of interrogation to sometimes present a false statement, yes.
> Q: Well, this bluff, that means you can lie, doesn't it?
>
> A: Sure.
> Q: Tell them false information?
>
> A: Yes.
>
> Q: And in fact, you did tell false information to Mr. Lambert, didn't you?
> A: I believe there was a small aspect of it, yes.

Consistent with Trooper Scott's testimony, the circuit court instructed the jury that "[the trooper] may mention things that he says the child said to him . . . . What he says the child said to him, what the trooper says the child said to him, may or may not be true." (Emphasis supplied).

In Waldron, where the issue was whether the out-of-court statements of an informant, made during a recorded conversation with the defendant, were hearsay, we concluded that they were not, noting that "the informant's statements gave context to the Defendant's admissible statements." 228 W. Va. at 583, 723 S.E.2d at 408 (emphasis supplied); see United States v. Barraza, 365 Fed.App'x 526, 530 (4th Cir. 2010) (non-testifying informant's statements made in tape recorded conversation with defendant are not hearsay, as "they are offered at trial only to provide context for the defendant's statements and not for the truth of the matter asserted."); Tolliver, 454 F.3d at 666 ("In this case, as pointed out by the government, Shye's statements were admissible to put Dunklin's admissions on the tape into context, making the admissions intelligible for the jury. Statements providing context for other admissible statements are not hearsay because they are not offered for their truth.") (internal footnote omitted); United States v. Walter, 434 F.3d 30, 35 (1st Cir. 2006) ("Crawford . . . does not call into question this Court's precedents holding that statements introduced solely to place a defendant's admissions into context are not hearsay, and as such, do not run afoul of the Confrontation Clause."); Restivo v. Lattimore, No. SA CV 08-1028-MMM(E), 2010 WL 5563893, at *9 (C.D.Cal. Sept. 7, 2010) ("Ochoa's alleged statements were not introduced for the truth of the matters asserted. Rather, the court allowed the jury to hear Detective McShane's assertions concerning Ochoa's alleged statements for the sole purpose of giving context to Petitioner's interview statements."); State v. Roque, 141 P.3d 368, 388 (Ariz. 2006) (en banc) ("In this case, however, there was no evidence presented that Dawn actually made the statements that the detectives used in questioning Roque . . . . [b]ecause the statements allegedly made by Dawn were never introduced for their truth, they were not testimonial hearsay statements barred by the Confrontation Clause.").

In a case closely on point factually with the instant case, Estes v. State, 249 P.3d 313 (Alaska Ct. App. 2011), the defendant, Estes, objected to admission of her statement given to state troopers on the ground that during the interrogation, the "troopers referred to out-of-court statements purportedly made by Estes' husband, Deremer . . . admitt[ing] his guilt of the murder, but . . . also incriminat[ing] Estes." Id. at 315. The Court of Appeals of Alaska held that the introduction of this evidence did not violate the Confrontation Clause because > the State did not offer this evidence as proof of the matters asserted in the statements attributed to Deremer. Rather . . . the troopers' assertions about what Deremer said, were offered to provide the foundation or context for understanding the statements Estes made when she responded to these assertions about what Deremer purportedly said. As [the trial court] recognized, the probative aspect of this evidence was not that Deremer had said these things (if, in fact, Deremer did say these things). Rather, the probative aspect of this evidence lay in the fact that Estes was told that Deremer had said these things, and in how she responded to these assertions.

Id. The court concluded that > because the evidence of Deremer's purported out-of-court statements was offered for a non-hearsay purpose, the introduction of that evidence did not implicate Estes's Sixth Amendment right of confrontation. As the United States Supreme Court explained in Crawford v. Washington, the Sixth Amendment's confrontation clause bars evidence that is both "testimonial" and "hearsay", but it does not bar testimonial evidence if that evidence is not hearsay: 'The [Confrontation] Clause . . . does not bar the use of testimonial statements for purposes other than establishing the truth of the matter asserted.' Crawford, 541 U.S. at 59 n.9, 124 S.Ct. at 1369.

Estes, 249 P.3d at 316.

We agree with the reasoning of the Estes court, which is consistent with both our case law and also the substantial weight of authority from other jurisdictions. Accordingly, we hold that where the out-of-court statements of a non-testifying individual are introduced into evidence solely to provide foundation or context for understanding a defendant's responses to those statements, the statements are offered for a non-hearsay purpose and the introduction of the evidence does not violate the defendant's rights under Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 124 S.Ct. 1354, 158 L.Ed.2d 177 (2004) and State v. Mechling, 219 W. Va. 366, 633 S.E.2d 311 (2006).

In light of the foregoing, we conclude that there is no Crawford/Mechling question presented with respect to the child's out-of-court statements which were inferrable from the testimony of Trooper Scott; and those statements, not being offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, were properly admitted at the petitioner's trial.

The statement made by S.W. to her mother and then reiterated by Stacy Miller, the CPS worker, was offered to explain why CPS was contacted,[4] and was therefore not hearsay.

[4]The circuit court specifically instructed the jury "[t]hat testimony by Ms. Miller is not offered for the truth of those reports, but rather to demonstrate what caused the investigation by CPS."

See text supra. Ms. Miller's testimony that during Trooper Scott's search of the petitioner's home he found "[l]otions that the child had referenced[,]" is more problematic, because it served to tell the jury both that the petitioner had used lotions as an aid to masturbation and that this information came from S.W.[5] The circuit court was obviously concerned about this testimony and took prompt action to curtail further problems, instructing the witness: "Just don't reference what was told to you by the child since she will not be testifying. Leave her out of it. Just say what you saw." Thereafter, Ms. Miller made no further references to anything that S.W. had said.

Under these circumstances, and upon a full review of the record, this Court concludes that even if the reference to S.W.'s out-of-court statement about lotion was error under Crawford /Mechling, any error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. "Errors involving deprivation of constitutional rights will be regarded as harmless only if there is no reasonable possibility that the violation contributed to the conviction." Syl. Pt. 20, State v. Thomas, 157 W. Va. 640, 203 S.E.2d 445 (1974); see also State v. Kelley, 192 W. Va. 124, 130, 451 S.E.2d 425, 431 (1994). In this case, the statement was a fleeting reference in a trial otherwise free of error. In his statement to Trooper Scott, the petitioner admitted all of the [5]Neither the prosecutor at trial, nor the State on appeal, put forward a non-hearsay rationale to support admission of this statement.

factual allegations underpinning the charges against him; his defense was that he didn't intend for the child to see him masturbate and didn't intend for the child to see the pornographic movie. Thus, the fact that S.W. may have mentioned lotion at some point to Stacy Miller was negligible in light of the totality of the evidence against the petitioner. The circuit court admonished the witness, and the witness complied by thereafter "leav[ing S.W.] out of it."

B. The State's Closing Argument

The petitioner alleges that certain comments made by the State in its rebuttal closing argument were prejudicial; that they were an attempt to bolster the credibility of S.W., who had not testified at trial; and that they infected the integrity of the proceedings and denied the petitioner due process of law, such as to require reversal under the plain error doctrine.

Upon careful review of the record, this Court deems it unnecessary to reach the issue of plain error, because the comments complained of, even if error, were invited. In this regard, it is well established in our case law that "'"[a] judgment will not be reversed for any error in the record introduced by or invited by the party seeking reversal." Syl. Pt. 21, State v. Riley, 151 W. Va. 364, 151 S.E.2d 308 (1966).' Syllabus point 4, State v. Johnson, 197 W. Va. 575, 476 S.E.2d 522 (1996)." Syl. Pt. 4, State v. Mann, 205 W. Va. 303, 518 S.E.2d 60 (1999). As Justice Cleckley explained in State v. Crabtree, 198 W. Va. 620, 482 S.E.2d 605 (1996), > 'Invited error' is a cardinal rule of appellate review applied to a wide range of conduct. It is a branch of the doctrine of waiver which prevents a party from inducing an inappropriate or erroneous response and then later seeking to profit from that error. The idea of invited error is not to make the evidence admissible but to protect principles underlying notions of judicial economy and integrity by allocating appropriate responsibility for the inducement of error. Having induced an error, a party in a normal case may not at a later stage of the trial use the error to set aside its immediate and adverse consequences.

With these principles in mind, we turn to the petitioner's argument that the State's closing argument was improper and prejudicial. The relevant portion of the State's rebuttal argument is as follows:

> The child's not being credible is not the same as the child not being competent. I wish, oh how I wish you could have heard her talk or met her or seen her. But she's four. And you have to reach a certain developmental level to be a witness in a trial . . . But when you're four you're just not old enough to be able to be a witness in court. That doesn't mean she wasn't telling the truth, that she's a liar or anything like that. She didn't have any reason to make up these allegations against Jason Lambert. She had nothing to gain.

Not mentioned by the petitioner is the fact that these comments were made in direct response to defense counsel's closing argument, in which counsel stated that

> [t]he only professional who interviewed this child was the forensic clinical psychologist whose report and testimony resulted in the Court's determination that the child was not competent to testify, because she lacked the ability to know the difference between telling the truth and a lie. That she did not > have the ability to understand the importance and duty to tell the truth. Because she did not have the capacity to observe, remember, and relate events accurately.

Defense counsel's comments were both a mischaracterization of the psychologist's report[6] – which was not, in any event, before the jury – and also a mischaracterization of the circuit court's basis for deeming S.W. to be incompetent to testify. In the court's order of November 17, 2011, the court's conclusion that the child was incompetent was "based on the conclusion that because of the age of the child the probative value is outweighed by the prejudicial effect of her testimony and statements to the defendant in this proceeding." This was completely consistent with the court's instruction to the jury that "[t]his child is five years old. She won't testify. She's not old enough to testify, or mature enough to testify, which is not uncommon."

Under these circumstances, it is apparent that the petitioner's complaint falls squarely within the invited error doctrine. "'An appellant or plaintiff in error will not be permitted to complain of error in the admission of evidence which he offered or elicited, and this is true even of a defendant in a criminal case.' Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Bowman, 155 W. Va. 562, 184

[6]The psychologist who examined S.W. opined that she had the ability, albeit marginal, to distinguish between telling the truth and a lie, and that he was "leaning" toward finding her competent after his first interview. After his second interview, he deemed the child to be incompetent based primarily on her inability to consistently recall details about a recent trip to Florida.

S.E.2d 314 (1971)." Syl. Pt. 3, Crabtree, 198 W. Va. at 623, 482 S.E.2d at 608; see State v. Flippo, 212 W. Va. 560, 588 n.44, 575 S.E.2d 170, 198 n.44 (2002); Mann, 205 W. Va. at 312-13, 518 S.E.2d at 69-70. Here, the petitioner's counsel argued to the jury, in misleading fashion and based upon evidence not before the jury, that the reason S.W. had been deemed incompetent was because she was a liar. The State responded, reasonably in our view, that because the child was too young to take the witness stand, that "doesn't mean she wasn't telling the truth, that she's a liar or anything like that."[7]

Finally, we note that even if we were to view the State's closing argument as error, we would not reverse this case on that ground. "A judgment of conviction will not be set aside because of improper remarks made by a prosecuting attorney to a jury which do not clearly prejudice the accused or result in manifest injustice." Syl. Pt. 5, State v. Sugg, 193 W. Va. 388, 456 S.E.2d 469 (1995). Further,

> [f]our factors are taken into account in determining whether improper prosecutorial comment is so damaging as to require reversal: (1) the degree to which the prosecutor's remarks have a tendency to mislead the jury and to prejudice the accused; (2) whether the remarks were isolated or extensive; (3) absent the remarks, the strength of competent proof introduced to establish > the guilt of the accused; and (4) whether the comments were deliberately placed before the jury to divert attention to extraneous matters.

[7]There is an exception to the invited error doctrine "when application of the rule would result in a manifest injustice[,]" Crabtree, 198 W. Va. at 628, 482 S.E.2d at 613, and where application of the exception to the rule "'is necessary to preserve the integrity of the judicial process or to prevent a miscarriage of justice.'" Id. (citing Wilson v. Lindler, 995 F.2d 1256, 1262 (4th Cir. 1993)). As clearly demonstrated by the facts herein, see text supra, this case does not fall within the exception to the rule.

Syl. Pt. 6, Sugg, 193 W. Va. at 393, 456 S.E.2d at 474. The ultimate test "is whether the remarks 'so infected the trial with unfairness as to make the resulting conviction a denial of due process.'" Id. at 405, 456 S.E.2d at 486 (citing Donnelly v. DeChristoforo, 416 U.S. 637, 643 (1974)).

In the instant case, the petitioner fails to meet any of the factors set forth in Sugg. The prosecutor's remarks did not have a tendency to mislead or prejudice the jury; to the contrary, they were intended to rebut an argument made by defense counsel that did have a tendency to mislead the jury. The remarks were isolated, and were offset by the circuit court's repeated instructions to the jury that any statements made by S.W. to her mother, the trooper or the CPS worker were not introduced for the truth of the matter. Absent the remarks in the prosecutor's rebuttal closing argument, the State's evidence against the petitioner was strong; that evidence included, inter alia, the petitioner's admissions that he had masturbated and watched a pornographic video while the child was "probably" in the room, and pictures of the room demonstrating that the petitioner could not have been unaware of the child's presence and that the child could not have been shielded from seeing what the petitioner was doing. Finally, the remarks were not made to divert the jury's attention with extraneous matters; again, the petitioner's counsel invited the remarks by telling the jury that S.W. had been deemed incompetent because she didn't tell the truth – a misrepresentation of the psychologist's report, which was not in any event in evidence at trial.

In short, there was no manifest injustice that would require this Court to reverse the petitioner's conviction. The petitioner had a fair trial and his conviction will stand.

IV. Conclusion

The judgment of the Circuit Court of Marion County, West Virginia, is affirmed.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "W. Va. Code, 49–1–3(a) (1984), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Betty J.W., 179 W. Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988).

3. "In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

4. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

5. "Where it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the . . . case [will be] remanded for compliance with that process[.]" Syl. Pt. 5, in part, In re Edward B., 210 W. Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001).

6. "To facilitate the prompt, fair and thorough resolution of abuse and neglect actions, if, in the course of a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, a circuit court discerns from the evidence or allegations presented that reasonable cause exists to believe that additional abuse or neglect has occurred or is imminent which is not encompassed by the allegations contained in the Department of Health and Human Resource's petition, then pursuant to Rule 19 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings [1997] the circuit court has the inherent authority to compel the Department to amend its petition to encompass the evidence or allegations." Syl. Pt. 5, In re Randy H., 220 W. Va. 122, 640 S.E.2d 185 (2006).

7. "In a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. Lipscomb v. Joplin, 131 W. Va. 302, 47 S.E.2d 221 (1948).

8. "In cases involving the abuse and neglect of children, when it appears from this Court's review of the record on appeal that the health and welfare of a child may be at risk as a result of the child's custodial placement, regardless of whether that placement is an issue raised in the appeal, this Court will take such action as it deems appropriate and necessary to protect that child." Syl. Pt. 6, In re: Timber M. and Reuben M., No. 12-1138 (W. Va. June 5, 2013).

9. "Where a trial court order terminating parental rights merely declares that there is no reasonable likelihood that a parent can eliminate the conditions of neglect, without explicitly stating factual findings in the order or on the record supporting such conclusion, and fails to state statutory findings required by West Virginia Code § 49–6–5(a)(6) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001) on the record or in the order, the order is inadequate." Syl. Pt. 4, in part, In re Edward B., 210 W. Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001).

Per Curiam:

Petitioners/respondents below, Matthew H. and April B., challenge the Circuit Court of Gilmer County's October 3, 2011, and September 12, 2012, orders adjudicating them abusive and neglectful and terminating their parental rights, respectively, to Lilith H., Wyllow H., and Natalie H. in this consolidated appeal. Petitioners assert that the circuit court erred in finding that an altercation involving Matthew H. and April B.'s father, which was witnessed by the children, constituted abuse and/or neglect and further that the circuit court erred in terminating their parental rights following what they contend was a successful completion of their respective improvement periods.

Upon careful review of the briefs, the appendix record, the arguments of the parties, and the applicable legal authority, we find that the circuit court erred in adjudicating Matthew H. and April B. abusive and neglectful and in terminating their parental rights on the basis of allegations which were not the subject of the adjudication. Therefore, we reverse the circuit court's adjudication and subsequent disposition and remand this case for further proceedings, as appropriate, consistent with this opinion.

I. FACTS AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

On August 6, 2011, a physical altercation occurred between petitioner Matthew H. and Randy B.,[1] petitioner April B.'s father, at petitioners' home; the home was owned by Randy B., but petitioners were living there. Randy B. was riding past the home on an ATV when Matthew H. made an obscene gesture toward him. Randy B. stopped his ATV and approached Matthew H. and a verbal argument ensued, followed by an exchange of blows. It is unclear who threw the first punch; however, the parties indisputably engaged in mutual combat. Randy B. admitted to choking Matthew H., who was later diagnosed with a fractured eye socket. At the time the altercation began, petitioner April B. was inside the house with the children, Lilith H., Wyllow H., and Natalie H.[2] As the altercation progressed, April B. came out of the house to attempt to intervene; she then also became involved in the physical altercation and struck her father. At some point during April B.'s involvement in the altercation--whether simultaneously with or subsequent to is unclear--the three children also came outside and observed the altercation. Matthew H. then threatened to get a gun and went into the house; Randy B. left and Matthew H. alleges that Randy B. also threatened to return with a gun. Witnesses indicated that Matthew H. then emerged from his house with his hands behind his back as though he had a weapon, but there is no evidence that he actually obtained a weapon. The police were called to the scene and domestic battery charges were filed against Matthew H., April B., and Randy B. Notably, April B. immediately filed a domestic violence petition against her father, Randy B.

The Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") filed an abuse and neglect petition on August 10, 2011, alleging that there existed "an imminent danger to the children's physical well being" inasmuch as they "witnessed their father and grandfather fighting and punching each other" and "their father and grandfather have both threatened to shoot each other." As to April B., the petition alleged that she "appear[ed] emotionally and mentally unable to protect the children." The petition further alleged that the children "had head lice, and fleas upon their person. Their clothing and bodies were dirty and the body odor indicated poor hygiene."[3] Finally, the petition also noted that the petitioners had been investigated twice previously—in January, 2007, and May, 2011--but that "no abuse or neglect was substantiated."

[3] These allegations were apparently not substantiated inasmuch as the case worker who filed the petition testified that the children "were not so filthy as to seem neglected." Further, no witness testified to seeing fleas upon the children, and the case worker was uncertain whether the children actually had head lice. Moreover, as discussed more fully infra, although there was testimony about the cleanliness of the home in which the children were living at the time of the altercation, no such allegations were ever made part of the petition, nor were they identified as part of the basis of the circuit court's adjudication or disposition.

At the preliminary hearing on August 18, 2011, the investigating officer testified consistent with the above version of events, but noted that there had been previous altercations between Matthew H. and Randy B. involving gun threats. When he served the criminal complaint on Matthew H., he noted that there were "animals everywhere," flies and gnats in the house around the lights, and the floor was dirty. He observed no food lying around, but characterized the house as "disgusting." The DHHR caseworker who filed the petition testified that during her initial home visit subsequent to the petition, she observed many exotic and other animals,[4] noted the home was "cluttered," a trash can overflowing, dishes with rotting food on them in the sink, as well as an odor. Although she did not include the condition of the home in her petition because she had not yet been there at the time of filing, she testified she thought it was serious enough to include. However, the record reveals no formal amendment of the petition to include the condition of the home.

The circuit court found that sufficient imminent danger existed such as to remove the children from the home and ordered petitioners to undergo psychological evaluations; they were granted six hours of unsupervised visitation every weekend. The court predicated its ruling on the "domestic violence" which occurred in front of the children, rejecting Matthew H.'s argument that the underlying cause of the violence had been addressed by virtue of the domestic violence petition filed against Randy B.

On September 1, 2011, an adjudication hearing was held during which the court heard testimony from various witnesses regarding the altercation, including Randy B., who testified consistent with the facts noted above, adding that 1) the verbal altercation began because he was evicting petitioners from the home effective August 23; and 2) he and Matthew H. had a history of verbal altercations and threats. Notably, no testimony was adduced regarding the condition of the children, the home, or any issues between April B. and Matthew H. and the circuit court made no reference to any such issues in its oral findings or order. Nonetheless, the circuit court adjudicated the children abused and neglected, finding that Matthew H. "had an altercation . . . with the maternal grandfather and threatened to get a firearm in the presence of the Infant respondents" and April B. "failed to protect the Infant Respondents."[5] The circuit court granted six hours a week supervised visitation because the guardian ad litem expressed concerns that the children were being "coached" and that the case was being discussed with them.

[5] During its ruling, although not contained in the adjudication order, the circuit court stated that April "failed to take appropriate action to protect the health, safety and welfare of the children by bringing them to the scene where this altercation was occurring[.]" (emphasis added). As indicated above, the undisputed testimony indicates that the altercation took place outside the petitioners' home, from which petitioners contend the children emerged unbeknownst to anyone, during the course of the altercation.

Subsequent to the adjudication, the guardian ad litem filed a motion to compel the DHHR to amend its petition or file a new one to include allegations regarding the condition of the children and home. At a hearing on the motion on September 22, 2011, the guardian ad litem argued that she had interviewed the children, who noted that they did not like foster care because they had to bathe every day. She testified that the children stated that they did not previously bathe every day because their mother had to heat the water on the stove. The guardian ad litem further represented that she had visited the home and taken photos a few days after the family moved out, noting that the condition of the home was "very, very poor."

The circuit court ruled that since adjudication had already occurred, the petition could not be amended to include new allegations, but all parties agreed that the court could consider the condition of the home for purposes of disposition.[6] As such, the

> the Court is of the opinion that any relevant information as to the condition of the home, as to conditions that need to be addressed, can be presented at the dispositional hearing, and neither the State of West Virginia nor the Guardian Ad Litem would be prohibited from submitting evidence in regards to these alleged deficiencies. I don't think we're limited to the deficiencies outlined in the petition for adjudication or the time before this adjudication. As it comes to disposition I think the Court can and the Court will address all deficiencies out of which this case arises.

(emphasis added). Although petitioners' respective counsel objected to the motion to compel, they agreed that allegations regarding the home and children could be considered (continued . . .)

State called the DHHR caseworker, who testified that the residence did not appear to be a safe, fit, and habitable place for the children to reside, but noted further that the petitioners had subsequently moved into a residence she had not inspected. Nevertheless, she recommended an improvement period for petitioners.

As a result of the foregoing testimony, the court "reluctantly" granted a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period to include a substance abuse evaluation,[7] drug counseling, anger management, individual and family counseling, batterers' counseling, and parenting classes. On March 12, 2012, petitioners were granted a ninety-day extension of their improvement period. On June 11, 2012, the court changed visitation to two, four-hour supervised visits per week due to reports that the parents were "still arguing and did not disclose to the MDT team that they were getting evicted"; the court further found that the petitioners were "blaming and threatening everyone involved by the court at disposition and were prepared to go forward with the hearing. This ruling was not assigned as error in this appeal. However, as discussed infra, neither the condition of the children nor the home ultimately formed the basis of the court's disposition, based on the order and transcript.

[7] Evidence was adduced during the September 22, 2011, hearing regarding Matthew H.'s positive drug test at the preliminary hearing; he tested positive for THC and proxyphene, a narcotic pain reliever. April B.'s drug test was negative. However, the substance abuse evaluation apparently revealed that petitioners had no substance abuse issues and therefore, services were unnecessary in that regard. During oral argument, however, counsel represented that post-termination visitation was recently suspended, in part, due to Matthew H. testing positive for methamphetamine.

in the case rather then [sic] taking responsibility for their own actions and behaviors." The court then set the case for disposition.

On August 30, 2012, the court held a dispositional hearing and terminated the petitioners' parental rights. The court heard testimony from a variety of service providers, whose testimony centered exclusively around the allegedly contentious relationship between April B. and Matthew H.[8] No testimony was adduced regarding the relationship between Matthew H. and Randy B., the condition of the children, or the home. With the exception of seven batterers' intervention classes out of a total thirty-two classes required, the witnesses testified that petitioners completed all aspects of their [8] In particular, the court heard testimony from April B.'s counselor, who testified that Matthew H. was "mentally and verbally abusive" to April B. when he was not taking his medications and "says mean and hurtful things to her" and "calls her names to the girls." The counselor further testified, however, that she thought that since Matthew H. had recently obtained employment, it was likely that the "psychological abuse" would cease. A co-worker of April B. further testified about an incident which occurred just prior to the hearing where Matthew H. showed up at April B.'s workplace, raising his voice to her and attempting to confront her regarding what Matthew H. described as allegations that April B. had been unfaithful to him.

Matthew H.'s therapist testified that initially he was uncooperative in counseling sessions, but had substantially improved in the two months preceding the hearing. She testified that he was being "open-minded" and "putting into practice the anger management that we have been going over." She testified that he called in for sessions when he was out of town working, even when his insurance would not cover it.

improvement period.[9] The worker who supervised petitioners' visitation testified that no visits were cancelled and that all interactions were familial and affectionate.

Nevertheless, the DHHR caseworker testified that it was in the children's best interest to remain in the custody of the DHHR. In support, she stated that the children advised her that their parents argued in front of them; however, she further testified that the kids loved their parents and had a strong bond with them. She noted that in petitioners' "provider reports" that Matthew H. had threatened the lives of "everyone in the case." The guardian ad litem likewise argued in support of termination, stating to the court that the petitioners had failed to take responsibility for the acts giving rise to the proceedings and simply "didn't get it."

The DHHR representative was further critical of April B. because she had "remained in the relationship with Matthew." She conceded April B. had successfully completed services, but "she continues to maintain contact and live in the same residence where there's emotional, psychological violence and even physical violence that was reported[.]" [10] However, April B. testified that she remained committed to her relationship with Matthew H., but "if it comes to the point between him and my children, of course, I would choose my children." Critically, when pressed on why she had not previously acted on her willingness to leave Matthew H., she responded that "[a]s of the last MDT meeting, we were all under the impression that you were sending the kids home" and "there was hope that we would still be a family unit and not a broken family." She testified that the CPS worker told her "our goal at CPS is to reunite the family, not break the family up."[11]

[9] The DHHR worker testified that Matthew H. had attended twenty-five out of thirty-two batterers' intervention sessions as well as counseling and psychiatric appointments. She was critical of his failure to attend the final seven sessions of batterers' intervention, but testified that he had obtained employment in Pennsylvania and that the program could not accommodate his travel schedule. Petitioners testified that they attempted to coordinate an alternate program in Pennsylvania where he could complete the sessions, but were unsuccessful.

[10] There is no indication in the appendix record of any evidence of physical violence between April B. and Matthew H.

[11] The appendix does not contain any documents reflecting the family case plan established, nor is the content of it mentioned in any of the hearing transcripts. Although we find it unnecessary to assess the petitioners' compliance with their improvement period, as discussed infra, we note that April B.'s testimony suggests that the family case plan did not set forth the requirement that April B. leave Matthew H. Certainly, the requirements of the improvement period as set forth in the circuit court's order included no such directive.

As such, we note that in this case, it appears that to the extent successful completion of April B.'s improvement period was conditioned on her termination of her relationship with Matthew H., such requirement was not clearly expressed to her. The clear expression of the meaningful steps required of a parent to successfully complete his or her improvement period is > designed to foreclose a natural parent from being placed in an amphorous [sic] improvement period where there are no detailed standards by which the improvement steps can be measured. It also provides a meaningful blueprint that the DHS can monitor and which will also give the court specific

Following this testimony, the circuit court terminated the petitioners' parental rights. The court noted that April B. appeared physically intimated and fearful of Matthew H., but that she was wholly unwilling to do anything to separate herself from his behavior.[12] The court indicated that she had "several opportunities during the course of this case" to leave Matthew H. but had not done so. The court found that Matthew H. wanted to "blame everybody but himself." As a result, the circuit court found that there were no "reasonable grounds that the conditions out of which this abuse and neglect arose, can or will be corrected within the foreseeable future[.]" This appeal followed.

> information to determine whether the terms of the improvement period were met.

State ex rel. West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 693-94, 356 S.E.2d 181, 186-87 (1987).

[12] The court stated:

> I have never seen a witness that physically appeared to be any more intimidated or fearful of someone than the respondent mother does to the respondent father in this case, but I also have never seen anyone . . . less willing to accept that issue and to correct that situation.

In spite of this finding, the circuit court at no time undertook an analysis of whether April B. was a "battered parent" as defined by West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(3) (2011) and therefore to be afforded such treatment as a "battered parent" with regard to adjudication and disposition.

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court has held, with regard to our review of abuse and neglect findings:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). With these principles in mind, we turn to the petitioners' assignments of error.

III. DISCUSSION

Adjudication

Petitioner Matthew H. asserts that the circuit court erred in adjudicating him abusive and/or neglectful because he merely acted in self-defense during the altercation, which he contends was instigated by Randy B. Petitioner April B. adopts a similar argument and contends that, for her part, she was merely attempting to break up the altercation. Both parties contend that the children "ventured" from the home unbeknownst to them. The DHHR counters that it was Matthew H. who instigated the fight by gesturing to Randy B. and then refusing to "stand down" when the fight escalated. The DHHR takes the position that April B. chose to protect Matthew H. rather than her children in attempting to intervene in the altercation. The guardian ad litem essentially argues simply that domestic violence occurred in front of the children and is therefore per se abuse and/or neglect.

Although the circuit court did not identify the statutory basis for its adjudication and referred simply to the children as being "abused and/or neglected," it presumably based its adjudication on West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(1)(D) (2011), which defines an "abused child" as one "whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by . . . [d]omestic violence as defined in section two hundred two [§ 48-27-202] article twenty-seven, chapter forty-eight of this code." West Virginia Code § 48-27-202 (2010) defines "domestic violence," as the "occurrence of one or more of the following acts between family or household members," which "acts" include "[a]ttempting to cause or intentionally, knowingly or recklessly causing physical harm to another[.]"[13] Upon determining that Matthew H. abused the children by subjecting them to "domestic violence," the circuit court ostensibly then derived April B.'s adjudication from the following:

[13] West Virginia Code § 48-27-204 (2002) provides the operative definition of "family or household members." The circuit court, however, did not undertake an analysis of the statutory definition to ensure that the statute contemplated the relationship between Randy B. and Matthew H.; nonetheless, they do appear to qualify as "family or household members" by operation of West Virginia Code § 48-27-204(8).

> W. Va. Code, 49–1–3(a) (1984), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent.

Syl. Pt. 3, In re Betty J.W., 179 W.Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988).

Although this Court does have concerns about the health and welfare of the subject children as discussed more fully infra, we are nonetheless left with the firm conviction that the circuit court's finding that the children were abused and/or neglected because they witnessed the altercation between their father and grandfather was clearly erroneous. We reach this conclusion without delving into the genuine dispute between the parties as to which combatant is most "at fault" for having instigated the altercation. Rather, we find that this unfortunate, yet isolated occurrence, was not sufficient to constitute abuse and/or neglect on the part of Matthew H., nor was the fact that the children witnessed this occurrence sufficient to constitute abuse and/or neglect on the part of April B. Moreover, during oral argument in this matter, counsel represented that the children are currently placed with Randy B., the fellow combatant and alleged aggressor which gave rise to the adjudication. We can discern no conceivable justice in stripping petitioners of their children for certain behaviors, only to place the children with another who engaged in precisely the same conduct.

While this Court is quick to note that we are disturbed by and strongly disapprove of all three combatants' behavior and seeming disregard for the proximity of small children to their exchange, we find that the circumstances of this particular case are simply too attenuated from the type of household domestic violence from which an abuse and neglect adjudication may derive. To that end, although the altercation may definitionally qualify as "domestic violence" under West Virginia Code § 48-27-202, we note that Randy B. did not reside in the household with Matthew H. and the children; as such, the children's exposure to their vitriol was limited. Randy B. testified that April B. had severely restricted his interaction with the family as a direct result of the animosity. We find that, although both Matthew H. and Randy B. testified to a history of verbal altercations and threats, the record is devoid of any evidence of prior, much less recurrent, physical violence between them. Although previous verbal incidents—at least one of which involved Randy B.—were cursorily alleged in the petition, the DHHR noted that such allegations were unsubstantiated.

With respect to April B., we simply cannot find that her actions, in attempting to intervene and thereby becoming involved in the altercation is tantamount to "aid[ing] or protect[ing]" Matthew H. or constitutes neglect of her children. While cooler heads would certainly indicate that a wiser course would have been to call the police, we cannot say that she neglected her children by choosing in the heat of the moment to attempt to bring the altercation—bearing witness to which the circuit court found caused the children emotional harm—to an end. We find no evidence that petitioners knowingly subjected the children to this incident, despite the strong likelihood that, as children, they may venture outdoors, curious about the commotion. Finally, we believe the unexpected and isolated nature of this event is underscored by petitioners' efforts to ensure that such an event did not recur by obtaining a DVP against Randy B.

This is not to say, however, that the children were not disturbed by witnessing the altercation and that the contentious relationship between their father and grandfather is not a constant source of anxiety and concern to them. However, neither parents, nor the courts through exercise of the State's parens patriae powers, can ensure a childhood experience entirely free from emotional upset and occasional unpleasantness which obtains from the complexities of human relationships. We simply cannot agree, under these particular circumstances, that the petitioners created an environment of abuse and/or neglect which threatened their children's health or welfare sufficient to justify their adjudication as abusive and/or neglectful.

In difficult cases such as this, we have often reminded lower courts that

> [i]n the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions.

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). While we do not lightly—and seldom do—disturb the results of the lower courts' Herculean efforts to balance the safety and well-being of children, while protecting parents' fundamental rights, this case leaves us with the firm conviction that the circuit court clearly erred in its finding of abuse and/or neglect and we therefore reverse the court's October 3, 2011, order to that effect.

Disposition

Having determined the circuit court's adjudication to be error, it is procedurally unnecessary to determine whether the circuit court likewise erred in terminating the petitioners' parental rights. Nevertheless, we write further to address the troubling development of this case—both factually and legally. This Court cannot turn a blind eye toward the abuse and neglect allegations which lurk in the periphery of this matter, merely because they evaded proper handling below. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996). See also State v. Julie G., 201 W. Va. 764, 776, 500 S.E.2d 877, 889 (1997) (Workman, C. J., dissenting) ("Courts are [] statutorily reposed with a strong obligation to oversee and protect each child who comes before them."). Our review of this matter reveals that the DHHR failed to properly amend the petition prior to adjudication and the circuit court failed to permit proper amendment post-adjudication, such as to encompass all of the allegations made evident during the course of the proceeding. Furthermore, we find that the circuit court's analysis and findings in support of the disposition were deficient. These errors are of such a nature and magnitude such as to render the proceedings below a failure of their essential purpose.

1. Failure to Amend Petition

We observe that the petitioners' second assignment of error regarding the circuit court's termination of their parental rights, merely circles around, but does not identify, the most problematic aspect of the court's disposition. Petitioners contend that the circuit court erred in terminating their parental rights because they successfully completed their improvement periods. Whether or not that is the case, this Court declines to address, as noted above. However, this Court takes notice of the plain error permeating the disposition wherein the circuit court terminated the parental rights on the basis of allegations and issues which were never properly made subject of the adjudication. "[I]t is within the authority of this Court to 'sua sponte, in the interest of justice, notice plain error.'" Cartwright v. McComas, 223 W. Va. 161, 164, 672 S.E.2d 297, 300 (2008) (quoting Syl. Pt. 1, in part, State v. Myers, 204 W.Va. 449, 513 S.E.2d 676 (1998)). We find that this error was occasioned by the circuit court's erroneous reading and application of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings regarding amendments to petitions, as well as the DHHR's lack of diligence with respect to additional abuse and neglect issues. To that end,

> [w]here it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has > been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the . . . case [will be] remanded for compliance with that process[.]

Syl. Pt. 5, in part, In re Edward B., 210 W.Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001).

Rule 19 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect governs amendments to petitions and provided, at the time of this adjudication, that petitions may be amended at any time until the final adjudicatory hearing, provided that the adverse party was granted sufficient time to respond to the amendment. Critically, Rule 19 further provided that "[a]fter the final adjudicatory hearing begins, a petition may be amended if the amendment does not prejudice an adverse party." (emphasis added). During the course of the proceedings below—following adjudication, but prior to disposition—Rule 19 was amended to, in part, provide further direction to circuit courts in dealing with post-adjudicatory amendments. The Rule now reads, in pertinent part:

> (b) Amendments after the adjudicatory hearing. – If new allegations arise after the final adjudicatory hearing, the allegations should be included in an amended petition rather than in a separate petition in a new civil action, and the final adjudicatory hearing shall be re-opened for the purpose of hearing evidence on the new allegations in the amended petition. [14]

[14] It should be noted that this amendment merely provides further procedural guidance to the circuit court in handling new allegations, i.e. such allegations may be addressed by way of amended petition and re-opening the adjudication, rather than requiring a new action to be filed. In no way does the amendment set forth a "new" requirement that post-adjudicatory allegations must be acknowledged and properly, systematically adjudicated. Any interpretation that Rule 19 previously suggested that post-adjudicatory allegations must simply be disregarded if prejudice would result from their inclusion in the pending proceeding is wildly inconsistent with the "clear language (continued . . .)

West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect (2012) (footnote added).

In the case below, the guardian ad litem moved to compel the DHHR to amend its petition to include allegations regarding the condition of the children and the home; the circuit court summarily found that such amendment could not occur post-adjudication, in clear contravention of Rule 19, even as it then existed. The circuit court reached this conclusion despite counsel for both petitioners conceding that they were not prejudiced by the court's consideration of such evidence for purposes of disposition. See n.6, infra. Accordingly, the record is devoid of anything but the initial, troubling evidence regarding the hygiene of the children and unsanitary condition of the home adduced during the preliminary hearing; at the adjudicatory hearing, the parents had moved into a home that the DHHR had not inspected. The DHHR caseworker testified that she believed the condition of the home was serious enough to include in the petition, yet the circuit court did not permit amendment of the petition, nor, more importantly, base any portion of his adjudication on those allegations. Subsequent thereto, there is absolutely no reference to whether proper care and treatment which directly affected the physical well being of the subject children was an ongoing concern. As such, these troubling allegations wholly eluded meaningful adjudication and commensurate attention during the improvement period.

and substantive tenor of abuse and neglect law[.]" Julie G., 201 W. Va. at 776, 500 S.E.2d at 889 (1997) (Workman, C. J., dissenting).

However, despite our concern regarding the neglect allegations regarding the children and the home which "fell through the cracks" due to the circuit court's erroneous handling of the requested amendment, we are most startled by the fact that at no time did the DHHR, the guardian ad litem, or the circuit court even discuss the necessity of amending the subject petition to include the relationship between the petitioners as a part of the subject adjudication. April B. and Matthew H.'s contentious relationship overwhelmed the evidence regarding their improvement period and formed the sole basis of the court's termination of their parental rights. Yet, at no time did the circuit court make a finding that their interactions, while unsettling, rose to the level of "domestic violence" pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-27-202, such as to render the children "abused children" pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(1)(D). Rather, the circuit court made its erroneous threshold finding that the altercation between Matthew H. and Randy B. rendered the children abused and neglected, then insinuated itself into the quarrelsome relationship between April B. and Matthew H. The circuit court then terminated their parental rights on the basis of their continued acrimony, which was never even alleged to constitute abuse and/or neglect in the petition or at any time during the proceedings. This action served to "back door" adjudication. See Syl. Pt. 2, Julie G., 201 W. Va. 764, 500 S.E.2d 877 (limiting basis of adjudication to conditions existing at time of, and as alleged in, the petition); cf. Syl. Pt. 6, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408

S.E.2d 365 (1991) (requiring court, at conclusion of improvement period, to determine if sufficient improvement has been made in context of all circumstances of case).[15]

To that end, this Court has provided clear guidance to courts on their authority, if not obligation, to compel newly-discovered or developed abuse and neglect allegations to be made part of a petition:

> To facilitate the prompt, fair and thorough resolution of abuse and neglect actions, if, in the course of a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, a circuit court discerns from the evidence or allegations presented that reasonable cause exists to believe that additional abuse or neglect has occurred or is imminent which is not encompassed by the allegations contained in the Department of Health and Human Resource's petition, then pursuant to Rule 19 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings [1997] the circuit court has the inherent authority to compel the Department to amend its petition to encompass the evidence or allegations.

Syl. Pt. 5, In re Randy H., 220 W.Va. 122, 640 S.E.2d 185 (2006). In Randy H., we found that the circuit court had the authority to compel the DHHR to investigate allegations which arose post-petition and "a duty to make findings of fact and conclusions of law regarding those allegations." Id. at 127, 640 S.E.2d at 190; see also In re T.W., 230 W.Va. 172, 737 S.E.2d 69 (2012).

[15] See also Julie G., 201 W. Va. at 776, 500 S.E.2d at 889 (Workman, C. J., dissenting) ("While . . . evidence concerning matters not alleged in the original petition [may not] alone support an adjudication of abuse and neglect absent an amendment, such evidence is clearly relevant insofar as it would 'tend[] to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable[.]'" (citing W.V.R.E. 401)).

It is clear to this Court that there remain unaddressed issues within this family that, due to a confluence of errors, were not appropriately adjudicated. These issues obviously include, but may not be limited to, whether the petitioners cared for the children and their home in a manner which ensured their safety and welfare, and further whether their volatile relationship constitutes "domestic violence" sufficient to render the children abused as a result of their exposure thereto. As described above, none of these concerning allegations were ever properly adjudicated; the purported "domestic violence" between the petitioners arose seemingly out of thin air at some point in the proceedings as the underpinning of the abuse and neglect petition. This Court has recently held:

> In cases involving the abuse and neglect of children, when it appears from this Court's review of the record on appeal that the health and welfare of a child may be at risk as a result of the child's custodial placement, regardless of whether that placement is an issue raised in the appeal, this Court will take such action as it deems appropriate and necessary to protect that child.

Syl. Pt. 6, In re: Timber M. and Reuben M., No. 12-1138 (W. Va. June 5, 2013).

Accordingly, upon remand, the DHHR is directed to file an amended petition, if appropriate, to include any and all allegations which it believes threaten the health or welfare of these children, to the extent that adequate grounds exist for such amendment. To the extent an adequate basis exists, such amendment should include but is not limited to any alleged "domestic violence" between the petitioners, allegations of neglect of the children and/or the petitioners' home, and any additional allegations which may have developed during the course of these proceedings. Further, the circuit court is directed to hold proceedings immediately upon remand for purposes of restoring custody to petitioners. However, before the children are returned to petitioners, in light of the Court's foregoing concerns, the circuit court is directed to 1) undertake any measures necessary to preliminarily ensure that Matthew H. and April B. can currently provide the children with a fit and suitable home; and 2) address the most recent substance abuse allegations against Matthew H., including but not limited to any drug testing protocols it deems necessary pending further proceedings, if any.

2. Deficiencies in Dispositional Findings

Finally, in review of the circuit court's disposition and order, we are once again compelled to remind courts that "[i]n a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." Syl. Pt. 2, State ex rel. Lipscomb v. Joplin, 131 W.Va. 302, 47 S.E.2d 221 (1948). We note that the circuit court's disposition order appears largely perfunctory[16] and further that the disposition hearing was geared more toward castigating and punishing the petitioners rather than engaging in any meaningful analysis of the best interests of the children. The failure of this most critical analysis is mirrored in the deficiencies contained in the order itself.

[16] In particular, most of the orders entered in this matter appear to have been assembled pro forma and are lacking in supporting findings. Most critically, however, the disposition order contains no particularized factual findings regarding the improvement period and makes only conclusory statements to partially attempt to track the language of West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (2011), as discussed more fully infra.

This Court has held:

> Where a trial court order terminating parental rights merely declares that there is no reasonable likelihood that a parent can eliminate the conditions of neglect, without explicitly stating factual findings in the order or on the record supporting such conclusion, and fails to state statutory findings required by West Virginia Code § 49–6–5(a)(6) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001) on the record or in the order, the order is inadequate.

Syl. Pt. 4, in part, In re Edward B., 210 W. Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620. We note that the disposition order only summarily states that "there is no reasonable likelihood that the condition of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future,"[17] with no findings in support of this critical conclusion. Moreover, the remaining findings required by West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) are entirely absent including: 1) why continuation in the home is not in the best interests of the children; 2) why reunification is not in the best interests of the children; and 3) a description of the efforts made by the DHHR to preserve and reunify the family.[18] We again caution the circuit courts that "[t]ermination of parental rights [is] the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the [17] We recognize that the transcript of the disposition hearing contained slightly more detail than the disposition order, but note that the circuit court's conclusions were still lacking in factual findings and support. But see In re Jamie Nicole H., 205 W. Va. 176, 517 S.E.2d 41 (1999) (upholding termination where transcript, rather than order, supported finding that there was no reasonable likelihood conditions could be corrected).

[18] The circuit court's findings in this particular regard would have proven helpful given the testimony given by the DHHR caseworker regarding April B.'s failure to leave Matthew H.

disposition of neglected children" and must be supported by adequate findings. Syl. Pt. 2, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980). The statutory requirements are designed to ensure that this most serious remedy is adequately justified and not utilized improvidently.

IV. CONCLUSION

Based upon the foregoing, we reverse the October 3, 2011 and September 12, 2012, orders of the Circuit Court of Gilmer County and remand this matter for amendment of the petition, as appropriate, and further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

IN THE MATTER OF LINDSEY C.

Submitted: October 31, 1995
Filed: December 14, 1995

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. Any failure by litigants to observe carefully the requirements of our appellate rules is expressly disapproved; in appropriate circumstances an appeal may be dismissed by reason of a disregard of those rules.

2. The procedure in abuse and neglect cases is governed by provisions internal to W.Va. Code § 49-1-1, et seq., and such other procedural requirements of the Code or general law as obtain. Except for Rules 5(b), 5(e) and 80, the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure for Trial Courts of Record are not applicable to such cases.

3. In abuse and neglect proceedings the appointment of a guardian ad litem is required for adult respondents who are involuntarily hospitalized for mental illness, whether or not such adult respondents have also been adjudicated incompetent.

4. It is error to enter a decree terminating parental rights after a suggestion of involuntary hospitalization for mental illness of the affected parent or custodian without first having appointed a guardian ad litem for such parent or custodian.

5. A parent or custodian named in an abuse and neglect petition who is involuntarily hospitalized for mental illness but who retains all of his or her civil rights, must be effectively served with process, including, if service is personal or by mail, service of a copy of any petition or other pleading upon which an order terminating parental rights may be based.

6. In abuse and neglect cases, service of original process on a guardian ad litem appointed for a parent or custodian involuntarily hospitalized for mental illness whose legal capacity has not been terminated by law cannot be substituted in lieu of service on the hospitalized parent or custodian where the parental rights of such person may be terminated under the process to be served.

7. "In child neglect proceedings which may result in the termination of parental rights to the custody of natural children, indigent parents are entitled to the assistance of counsel because of the requirements of the Due Process clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions." Syllabus point 1, State ex rel. LeMaster v. Oakley, 157 W.Va. 590, 203 S.E.2d 140 (1974).

8. Circuit courts should appoint counsel for parents and custodians required to be named as respondents in abuse and neglect proceedings as an incident of the making of the order filing each abuse and neglect petition. Upon the appearance of such persons before the court, evidence should be promptly taken, by affidavit and otherwise, to ascertain whether the parties for whom counsel has been appointed are or are not able to pay for counsel. In those cases in which the evidence rebuts the presumption of inability to pay as to one or more of the parents or custodians, the appointment of counsel for any such party should be promptly terminated upon the substitution of other counsel or the knowing, intelligent waiver of the right to counsel. Counsel appointed in these circumstances are entitled to compensation as permitted by law.

9. If the appointment of a guardian ad litem is required for a parent or custodian, the trial court may also provide in its order appointing counsel or in a later order, a direction that the appointment imposes on that counsel the additional status of guardian ad litem, with the attendant duties of protecting the interests of the persons for whom such counsel is appointed guardian ad litem and the attendant duty on the court to see to the protection of such person's interests until and unless it later appears that such person's circumstances do not require the continued protection of a guardian ad litem or that the two functions cannot be performed by the same attorney.

Albright, Justice:
This is an appeal of a juvenile abuse and neglect case conducted under the authority of W.Va. Code § 49-1-1, et seq. Appellant, Terri C., the natural mother of the infant, Lindsey C., born June 1, 1992, now appeals an order entered March 1, 1995, terminating her parental rights after a hearing held by the Circuit Court of Ohio County, West Virginia, February 1, 1995. Appellant argues that the lower court erred in failing to appoint counsel for her in the proceedings below and in terminating her parental rights without properly serving her with copies of the original petition and proper notice. The only appearances noted for appellant in the proceedings below are by letter dated April 17, 1995, filed below May 26, 1995, authorizing appellant's counsel here to investigate the file, and by the filing of this appeal in the circuit clerk's office, June 30, 1995.

A recitation of the factual and procedural history of the case is necessary before we discuss the law as it applies in this instance.

In January, 1992, appellant was committed to a mental hospital in Pennsylvania from which she was released June 8, 1992, following the birth of Lindsey C., June 1, 1992. The discharge summary for that hospitalization, a copy of which was filed in the court record in this proceeding August 24, 1994, discloses that appellant was suffering from a serious mental disorder, controllable at least in part by medication but complicated by "a chronic history of noncompliance with after care treatment and additional stress of bringing up a newborn child". She was discharged to return to West Virginia and, according to the discharge summary, "the Base Service Unit in West Virginia was informed as well as Children and Youth Services . . . ."

In March, 1993, appellant was admitted to Weston State Hospital in West Virginia for psychiatric problems. She remained hospitalized approximately thirty days, during which time her child, Lindsey C., stayed in the actual custody of her father, Zachary C., to whom appellant was married. After appellant's return from Weston she apparently resided in an apartment in Wheeling with her husband. In May of 1993, appellant filed a domestic violence petition against her husband, Zachary C., and an Ohio County magistrate awarded appellant temporary custody of Lindsey C., after which it appears that appellant and her husband did not reside together.

In August, 1993, the Department of Health & Human Resources (hereafter "DHHR" or "the Department") received a referral regarding suspected neglect of Lindsey C. by appellant. According to a DHHR Court Summary dated May 6, 1994, within two days of that referral appellant was again committed to Weston State Hospital. Lindsey C. was delivered into the actual custody of her father, Zachary C., who then apparently occupied the apartment vacated by appellant incident to her hospitalization, probably the apartment from which the child was later removed. The record does not disclose whether any action was taken at that time to vest or confirm legal custody of Lindsey C. in Zachary C. incident to the transfer to him of her actual custody. The record does not disclose any further orders regarding the legal custody of Lindsey C. except those entered in this proceeding, later described. The DHHR commenced a series of visitations to the father's apartment. After several such visits, the DHHR was satisfied with the circumstances in which Zachary C. was maintaining the child and ceased visitations and all other child protective services. During this time, while hospitalized at Weston, Terri C. claimed that Zachary C. had sexually abused their child, but the DHHR found those allegations to be without merit and took no other action with respect to such allegations.

The DHHR Court Summary previously mentioned states that at approximately 9:00 p.m. on Thursday, April 21, 1994, Wheeling police officers received a report that Zachary C. had been seen intoxicated on the street near his residence with Lindsey C. in his custody. Police officers found Lindsey C. in her father's apartment at about 9:55 p.m. that same evening. She was unharmed and with her father, who was said to be drunk and unconscious. The police immediately took Lindsey C. to the home of an acquaintance of her father. According to the summary, Lindsey C.'s father was expected to pick her up from the home of the acquaintance about 5:00 p.m. the next day and had commented that he soon planned to take Lindsey C. to live in Kansas. The DHHR believed the child had been in a dangerous situation in her father's apartment and faced imminent danger if returned to his custody, so the DHHR decided to take immediate custody of Lindsey C. At about 3:30 p.m. that next day, Friday, April 22, 1994, Wheeling police officers removed the child from the home of her father's acquaintance and delivered her to a DHHR child protective service worker, who then placed her in a foster home licensed by the DHHR. The record is silent as to the whereabouts of appellant at that time except that the DHHR Court Summary of May 6, 1994, reports that the nearest relative then known who might have been able to take custody of Lindsey C. was M.B., the maternal grandmother, who lived over one hundred miles away in another state.

On Friday, April 29, 1994, the Circuit Court of Ohio County entered an order, styled an order nunc pro tunc as of Tuesday, April 26, 1994, awarding temporary emergency custody of Lindsey C. to the DHHR. This emergency order recites that on Monday, April 25, 1994, the DHHR filed a petition requesting ratification of emergency custody of the child, Lindsey C., because the parents, Zachary C. and Terri C., the appellant, had neglected and abused the child. Specifically, the petition alleged that appellant abused and neglected the child by abandoning her.

The DHHR petition, which apparently was actually filed Friday, April 29, 1994,See footnote 1 asked the court, inter alia, to ratify removal of the child from her parents' custody and place the child in the custody of the DHHR and, ultimately, to terminate the parental rights of both parents.

In the nunc pro tunc order entered Friday, April 29, 1994, the circuit court set a hearing for May 6, 1994, and appointed counsel for the child and the father. The order states that an attorney for the mother/appellant "shall be selected later". The order does not address the issue of appointment of a guardian ad litem for appellant nor does it address the service of process on appellant.

The order reflecting the action of the court May 6, 1994, shows that the court took no action regarding service of notice on appellant or appointment of counsel or a guardian ad litem for appellant.

On May 9, 1994, an attested copy of the emergency order and the abuse and neglect petition was sent by certified mail to appellant. The address used for that mailing was that of M.B., the maternal grandmother of Lindsey C., who had earlier been identified for the court below as the "closest known relative" able to take custody of Lindsey C. The petition and order were not successfully delivered as addressed; they were forwarded to a Wheeling address, apparently the address from which the child had been taken by the State, and was returned by the postal service to the circuit clerk May _?_, 1994,See footnote 2 marked "moved, left no address, return to sender".

On May 23, 1994, the court ordered a home study to evaluate the suitability of the home of M.B.,the maternal grandmother, who had expressed interest in receiving temporary custody of Lindsey C. The address for this home study was the same as that to which the copy of the petition and emergency order, addressed to appellant, had been previously, unsuccessfully mailed.

The home study for M.B. and her husband was completed about June 10, 1994, and the court below held another hearing on June 28, 1994. An order for that day recites that the court received information concerning the whereabouts of appellant, but no further action was taken to appoint a guardian ad litem or counsel for her or to serve process on her by any means. Further proceedings on July 11 and August 4, 1994, did not deal with appellant other than to note her absence. On August 4, 1994, the court was advised that the sister and brother-in-law of the father, Zachary C., were interested in obtaining custody of Lindsey C. The court ordered a child protective service worker to undertake a thorough investigation of their suitability to receive custody of Lindsey C.

Meanwhile, in Minnesota, a petition was filed against appellant on June 6, 1994, seeking her commitment by judicial order to a mental institution. A hearing on the petition was held on June 23, 1994, at which time appellant was represented by Minnesota counsel. An order entered on that date by the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, in Clay County, Minnesota, stated that there was clear and convincing evidence appellant was mentally ill and, although she did not represent a danger to others, she did represent a danger to herself. Appellant was involuntarily committed at a Fergus Fall, Minnesota, mental institution for an initial period of up to six months.

In West Virginia, the court and the DHHR were aware of appellant's hospitalization by August 19, 1994. A paper filed that day, but dated August 16, 1994, contains the following notations regarding appellant: "mother . . . need attorney appointed for her . . . mental institution -- Minn. . . . per [name of child protective service worker] . . . need to notice . . . ." This paper includes the address of the mental institution and the name and phone number of a social worker there as well as an emergency phone number.

Another hearing in the abuse and neglect case was held in Ohio County on August 22, 1994, and the order for that day recites that the child protective service worker had located appellant in Minnesota and given information regarding her whereabouts to the "prosecutor's office". The order also recited that the court received a report of a home study for the sister and brother-in-law of Zachary C., as a potential home for Lindsey C., and required that the comments of the child's guardian ad litem be provided the court "at the next Abuse and Neglect Docket Day".

On August 25, 1994, a postal return receipt for certified mail was included in the court file. This receipt showed that a mailing addressed to appellant at the mental institution previously noted in the file was accepted on August 22, 1994, by a person whose signature is not legible. Appellant claims that no such mailing was ever delivered to her. This mailing is presumably evidence of the State's second attempt to serve appellant by mail with a copy of the petition and other process essential to the commencement of an action charging her with abuse and neglect of Lindsey C. It is noted that the court below also received at that time the copy of the discharge summary describing appellant's Pennsylvania hospitalization in 1992 and had before it the diagnosis of serious mental disorder contained in that summary.

It appears that no further proceedings were had until October, 1994. Two orders reflecting a hearing held on October 11, 1994, noted again that appellant did not appear "in person or by counsel". At that time, the Court ordered certain actions preparatory to awarding custody of Lindsey C. to the sister and brother-in-law of Zachary C., formally appointed them "guardians" of Lindsey C. and ordered that efforts be made to effect delivery of the child to them at their home in a distant state. One of the orders for that day reflects that the court made the following findings with respect to appellant:

> 5. [Appellant] has abandoned and continues to abandon Lindsey [C.].
> 6. [Appellant] has neglected Lindsey [C.].
> * * *
> 8. [Appellant] is presently unwilling or unable to provide adequately for the needs of Lindsey [C.].
> 9. [Appellant] has received actual notice of these proceedings.
>
> 10. That continuation in the home is contrary to the best interests and welfare of the infant based upon the neglect by [Zachary C.] and the neglect and abandonment by [appellant].
> 11. That the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources made a reasonable effort to prevent placement of Lindsey outside her home given the neglect and abandonment by [appellant] and [Zachary C.'s] unwillingness or inability to provide supervision and care of Lindsey.
> 12.That the neglect and abandonment by [appellant] and [Zachary C.'s] unwillingness or inability to provide supervision and care of Lindsey make such efforts unreasonable.

It does not appear from the orders that any sworn testimony was heard that day, October 11, 1994. In any event, we cannot discern from the record before us what reliable evidence was adduced to support these findings.

At an October 30, 1994 hearing, after again noting the absence of appellant, the lower court ordered Lindsey C. delivered to her new guardians. The court also formally received the home study report on the new guardians at a hearing on December 12, 1994, at which time the court again noted appellant did not appear in person or by counsel.

A hearing was held on December 21, 1994, in Minnesota. The court there received a written report from the treatment facility where appellant was incident to the possible termination of her initial commitment there. Appellant was recommitted until March 21, 1995, and transferred to a group home in Little Falls, Minnesota. It appears that appellant remained there in state custody until her release on April 24, 1995.

At a January 13, 1995 hearing in the Circuit Court of Ohio County, a protective service case worker told the court for what appears to be the first time "that [appellant] had made inquiries about Lindsey". On that day, the guardian ad litem for Lindsey C. served a motion, noticed for hearing February 1, 1995, requesting that the court appoint a guardian ad litem for appellant "whose whereabouts are now known and thereafter to address the issue of disposition as to the parental rights of [appellant] in consideration of the court's findings at the October 11, 1995 [sic]" hearing that "appellant had abandoned, neglected and was then unwilling or unable to care for" Lindsey C. and for other relief. A copy of the motion and notice of a February 1, 1995, hearing were apparently sent to appellant by certified mail, addressed to the group home in Minnesota.

A West Virginia protective service worker telephoned the Minnesota group home on January 18, 1995, and left a message with a staff member that if appellant wanted to appear in court, she must come to West Virginia. The West Virginia child protective service worker also spoke by telephone to appellant's caseworker in Minnesota on January 31, 1995. The protective service worker was told that appellant was court-ordered to remain at the group home for at least two more months and that appellant was required to make another court appearance in Minnesota before she could be released.

The order for the proceedings of February 1, 1995, is dated March 1, 1995, and is the order from which this appeal is taken. The order notes again that appellant did not appear in person or by counsel. It recites that the court considered the motion of the child's guardian ad litem that a guardian ad litem be appointed for appellant but reflects no action on that motion. The order further states that the court was "advised" by the assistant prosecuting attorney present that the State mailed a copy of the abuse and neglect petition to appellant. The order fails to state whether the court took any sworn testimony. It does recite that the court heard "representations" by, and received a report from, a child protective service worker and did find that appellant "received NOTICE of these proceedings and her right to be represented by counsel in these proceedings". The court then made findings necessary to termination of appellant's parental rights and ordered the DHHR to file a "permanency plan".

On February 21, 1995, at the direction of the circuit court judge, a letter addressed to the judge, dated February 17, 1995, was filed. It was signed by a new child protective service worker in the case, and related that on February 14, 1995, the assistant director of the group home to which appellant had been committed in Minnesota had spoken to the worker, questioning the termination of appellant's parental rights and reporting that appellant had "received no notification to seek legal representation". The group home director further advised that he intended to advocate strongly in favor of appellant, "in terms of appealing".

At a March 1, 1995 hearing, which again does not note the taking of any sworn testimony, appellant was "enjoined from contacting, harassing or interfering, either directly or indirectly, with Lindsey" or the new guardians. The order further noted that appellant's appeal time would expire four months after the March 1, 1995 date of the order terminating the parental rights of appellant and directs that a copy of the order be sent to appellant at the group home. The court file contains a postal return receipt, signed by "Rita Werner" on March 13, 1995, for mail addressed to appellant at the group home.

By letter dated March 14, 1995, ordered filed by the circuit judge and actually filed in Ohio County on March 20, 1995, appellant's counsel in her Minnesota commitment proceedings advised that appellant had been further committed to involuntary hospitalization for a period of up to twelve months from December 21, 1994. In the same letter appellant's Minnesota counsel stated that neither he nor appellant had been aware of the West Virginia proceedings. He stated that appellant had anticipated reunification with her daughter "in some fashion" and had been "unable to effectively assert her wishes" until shortly before his letter. The letter was concluded with a request that counsel be appointed in West Virginia to "raise the appropriate issues".

Meanwhile, in Minnesota appellant was again alleged to be mentally ill in a petition for judicial commitment filed on March 15, 1995. A hearing was held on March 23, 1995, to determine whether it was necessary to have appellant involuntarily hospitalized until the judicial commitment hearing, and it was determined that she would be hospitalized at the White Shell Facility, Little Falls, Minnesota. A final hearing was held on April 13, 1995, and in an order entered April 25, 1995, the District Court in Minnesota found the state failed to meet its burden and prove by clear and convincing evidence that appellant was mentally ill. Thus, she was released from state custody.

As noted, by letter dated April 17, 1995, and filed with the Circuit Court of Ohio County May 26, 1995, appellant authorized her present counsel to investigate her case, and the present appeal was filed with the circuit clerk of Ohio County, June 30, 1995.

Appellant now argues that the circuit court erred as a matter of law in failing to appoint counsel in this abuse and neglect proceeding and erred in proceeding against her when she had not been served properly with the abuse and neglect petition and notices of hearings. More specifically, appellant argues that an indigent parent must be appointed counsel in a parental rights termination action and that a parent cannot be divested of parental rights if that parent has not been afforded proper notice. The appellees, Zachary C. and the Department of Health and Human Resources, have filed briefs in opposition, as has the guardian ad litem for the child, Lindsey C. In addition, by a cross assignment of error, the Department of Health and Human Resources contends that appellant violated Rule 60(b), Rules of Civil Procedure, by failing to move the trial court for relief prior to filing the appeal and violated the Rules of Appellate Procedure by failing to order transcripts of the hearings below and by failing to serve opposing counsel with a copy of the petition of appeal. Appellee DHHR asks therefore that the appeal be dismissed as improvidently granted.

Any failure by litigants to observe carefully the requirements of our appellate rules is expressly disapproved; in appropriate circumstances an appeal may be dismissed by reason of a disregard of those rules. In this case we note that appellees have appeared and vigorously defended this appeal, notwithstanding the failure of appellant's counsel to timely serve and certify service of the petition of appeal. We have before us a certified record sufficient to decide the crucial issues in the case.

We turn next to the contention of appellee DHHR that Rule 60(b), R.C.P. was violated because that contention focuses the case on the procedural requirements of the case below upon which it turns. This is a juvenile abuse and neglect proceeding, brought under the provisions of W.Va. Code § 49-1-1, et seq. Rule 81(a), R.C.P., in pertinent part, provides:

> Rule 81. Applicability in General. (a) To what proceedings applicable. -- . . .
> (7) Juvenile proceedings. -- Rules 5(b), 5(e) and 80 apply, but the other rules do not apply, to juvenile proceedings brought under the provisions of Chapter 49 [§ 49-1-1 et seq.] of the West Virginia Code.

Accordingly, the procedure in abuse and neglect cases is governed by provisions internal to W.Va. Code § 49-1-1, et seq., and such other procedural requirements of the Code or general law as obtain. Except for Rules 5(b), 5(e) and 80, the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure for Trial Courts of Record are not applicable to such cases. See footnote 3

As noted, appellant assigns as error that she was not properly served with a copy of the petition and notice of hearing prepared at the commencement of this proceeding. West Virginia Code § 49-6-1(b) mandates the service on a parent or custodian of a copy of any petition charging abuse and neglect of a child, together with a notice of hearing, and provides for service by mail or publication when personal service is not accomplished. See footnote 4

Appellant complains specifically that when service of the petition and notice by mail was attempted in this case in lieu of personal service, she did not sign the postal return receipt upon which the court below apparently based its first finding that the notice and petition had been duly served. Appellant asserts that, in fact, she never received or saw the petition during the pendency of the action below. Clearly, if appellant did not sign the postal receipt, the requirements of W.Va. Code § 49-6-1(b) for service of the notice and petition by mail have not been met. See footnote 5 The record before us is totally devoid of any inquiry by the court below to determine whose signature appears on the postal receipt which might contradict appellant's assertion in this appeal.

Appellees suggest to this Court that if the service of process by mail is defective, such defect is cured by the fact that appellant was found by the court below to have had actual notice of the proceedings. We do not reach the question of whether such a defect would be cured if appellant had actual notice. Anterior to that question is the question of whether the court below was required to appoint a guardian ad litem for appellant and the question of what impact the failure to do so has on the validity of the order below terminating the parental rights of appellant. We conclude that the court was required to appoint a guardian ad litem and that the order terminating the parental rights of appellant must be set aside because of the failure of the court below to do so.

West Virginia Code § 56-4-10 is applicable to juvenile proceedings. It provides, in pertinent part:

> The proceedings in a suit wherein an infant or insane person is a party shall not be stayed because of such infancy or insanity, but the court in which the suit is pending, or the judge thereof in vacation, or the clerk thereof at rules, shall appoint some discreet and competent attorney at law as guardian ad litem to such infant or insane defendant, whether such defendant shall have been served with process or not, and after such appointment no process need be served on such infant or insane person . . . Every guardian ad litem shall faithfully represent the interest or estate of the infant or insane person for whom he is appointed, and it shall be the duty of the court > to see that the estate of such defendant is so represented and protected . . . . See footnote 6

As early as April 29, 1994, the court below was advised by the fourth allegation in the abuse and neglect petition filed in this case that appellant had a history of mental illness. The DHHR Court Summary received by the court on May 6, 1994, gave some detail concerning that history, including at least approximate dates for prior hospitalizations. Then in August, 1994, the court received and noted information that appellant was in a mental institution in Minnesota. This was followed by the attempted, but apparently ineffective, service of process on appellant by certified mail at that mental institution after the court was advised that appellant had been located there and information regarding appellant's whereabouts had been given to the prosecuting attorney serving as counsel for the DHHR in this proceeding. At various stages throughout the proceedings, opportunities arose by which the court below was repeatedly made aware that appellant was hospitalized and restrained from appearing in court, or claimed not to have been served in a manner consistent with the plain directions of the statute, or was not represented by counsel in Ohio County, or desired to appear and defend and could not. Moreover, in 1995, before the court below made its order terminating the parental rights of appellant, the guardian ad litem appointed for the child, Lindsey C., served notice of a hearing for her motion requesting the appointment of a guardian ad litem for appellant. The order of the court below for that hearing dated February 1, 1995, reflects that the motion "as it relates to representation of" appellant was considered but reflects no action by the court granting or denying the motion. (That order, as previously noted, gives rise to this appeal.)

This Court held long ago that the suggestion of the lack of legal capacity imposes on the court the duty to appoint a guardian ad litem. Hays v. Camden's Heirs, 38 W.Va. 109, 18 S.E. 461 (1893), was an action in equity to sell lands allegedly forfeited to the State for non-entry on the land books. The trial court was advised that one of the owners was an infant by an exception taken to the report of a commissioner in chancery. Discussing that circumstance, this Court, citing the predecessor section to the current W.Va. Code § 49- 6-10, said:

> Under section 13, c. 125, Code 1887, it was the duty of the court to have appointed a guardian ad litem to the infant defendant, not because the court was selling the land of the infant, or of any strict construction in this case, but because the law requires it; . . . especially as the guardian, as next friend, appeared and suggested such infancy, and virtually asked such appointment. Under such > circumstances it would have been done, and would be error not to do, in any court, as far as I know.

Id. at 465.

In the case before us, the mental condition of appellant was clearly and strongly suggested to the trial court by the initial petition and by subsequent events. The court also had before it a written motion, duly set for hearing, asking for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for appellant. The motion was filed and brought on for hearing by the guardian ad litem for the child, Lindsey C., whose interests in a prompt conclusion of the proceeding would have been both protected and advanced by the appointment of a guardian ad litem for appellant. See footnote 7

We are mindful that the court below did not have clear and direct proof before it that appellant was "insane" within the meaning of W.Va. Code § 56-4-10. We have also noted that, although Minnesota had on June 23, 1994, adjudicated appellant to be mentally ill and likely to be a danger to herself, and had required her confinement to continue until April, 1995, the statutory law of Minnesota preserved to appellant her capacity to sue and be sued, notwithstanding her adjudication and involuntary confinement. See footnote 8 Indeed, with respect to persons involuntarily hospitalized in West Virginia, W.Va. Code § 27-5-9(a), enacted in 1974, expressly preserves the legal capacity of persons involuntarily committed to a mental health facility, absent a separate and distinct proceeding to declare the patient "incompetent". See footnote 9 That section was part of a comprehensive updating of mental health law in this State, which now recognizes modern, more enlightened realities about mental illness and mental retardation. West Virginia law now provides persons suspected of suffering from mental illness or mental retardation, as well as patients involuntarily hospitalized, with an array of substantive and procedural protections not fully recognized or not fully articulated in earlier statutory enactments. See footnote 10 Finally, we note that prior to 1974, involuntary hospitalization for an indeterminate period deprived the patient of legal capacity. See footnote 11

Accordingly, we are squarely confronted with the question of whether W.Va. Code § 56-4-10, relating to "insane" persons and last re-enacted by our Legislature in 1931, applies today in abuse and neglect proceedings only to adult persons who have been adjudicated incompetent, or applies with equal force to adult persons who have been involuntarily hospitalized by reason of mental illness but are not deprived of their civil rights in the absence of a separate and distinct declaration of incompetency. We conclude that in abuse and neglect proceedings the appointment of a guardian ad litem is required for adult respondents who are involuntarily hospitalized for mental illness, whether or not such adult respondents have also been adjudicated incompetent.

As noted, before 1974, the involuntary hospitalization of an adult for an indeterminate time by reason of mental illness would have required the appointment of a guardian ad litem under the provisions of W.Va. Code § 56-4-10. Put another way, the Legislature, in enacting W.Va. Code § 56-4-10, clearly contemplated that the section would be relied upon to require the appointment of a guardian ad litem for a mentally ill adult person involuntarily committed to a mental institution for an indeterminate period. The action of the Legislature in 1974, preserving capacity to such persons to sue or be sued in the absence of a separate incompetency finding, does not in our view mandate that the courts may not or should not appoint a guardian ad litem to protect the interests of such persons when they sue or are sued. We rely in part on a well recognized rule of statutory construction:

> Legislation is often written in terms which are broad enough to cover many situations which could not be anticipated at the time of enactment . . . . So a statute, expressed in general terms and written in the present or future tense, will be applied, not only to existing but also prospectively to future things and conditions.

As declared by the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals: '. . . It is a general rule in the construction of statutes that legislative enactments in general and comprehensive terms, and prospective in operation, apply to persons, subjects and businesses within their general purview and scope, though coming into existence after their passage, where the language fairly includes them.'

Norman J. Singer, 2B Sutherland Statutory Construction § 49.02, at 2 (5th ed. 1992), citing Cain v. Bowlby, 114 F.2d 519 (10th Cir. 1940).

Courts in other jurisdictions which have considered whether a guardian ad litem should be appointed for a person with mental illness who has not been adjudged incompetent appear to have uniformly favored appointment. See In re the Matter of R.A.D. and J.D., 231 Mont. 143, 753 P.2d 862, 870 (1988) (requiring consideration of the appointment of a guardian ad litem even where the adult mentally ill person was represented by counsel); Williams v. Pyles, 363 S.W.2d 675, 678 (Mo. 1963) (holding judgment voidable if rendered without appointment of guardian ad litem); McKenna v. Garvey, 191 Mass. 96, 77 N.E. 782, 784 (1906) (allowing a mentally ill person not adjudged incompetent to sue and be sued but noting that the appointment of guardians ad litem for such litigants is the general and equitable practice); Hawley v. New York, 28 Misc.2d 150, 217 N.Y.S.2d 107 (N.Y. Ct. Cl. 1961); Sengstack v. Sengstack, 4 N.Y.2d 502, 151 N.E.2d 887, 891, 176 N.Y.S.2d 337 (1958) (construing statutes authorizing appointment of a guardian ad litem to include unadjudicated incompetents); Graham v. Graham, 40 Wash.2d 64, 240 P.2d 564, 566 (1952) (recognizing the duty of the court, after full hearing, to withhold or cancel appointment if a mentally ill but unadjudicated person timely objects and shows cause); and Annotation, Capacity of one who is mentally incompetent but not so adjudicated to sue in his own name, 71 A.L.R.2d 1247 (1960).

The practical reasons for requiring appointment of a guardian ad litem in cases of involuntary commitment are readily apparent. First, despite the patient's continuing legal capacity, involuntary hospitalization imposes substantially all of the adverse effects of incarceration. These include the likely inability to freely move about, to prepare one's case, to consult with counsel conveniently, and to travel to and from court and other places that might be necessary or helpful in preparing and assisting in one's case. Second, until the guardian ad litem conducts at least an initial investigation and reports to the court, it can not be known whether the mentally ill person actually received notice of the pending case or, if service of process is on its face good and sufficient, whether the mentally ill person understood the notice and fully appreciated the right to be heard and the right to be represented by counsel. In the case of indigent persons, the right to have counsel appointed to represent the litigant might or might not be fully appreciated. Until and unless an appreciation of such matters is established on the record, the ultimate finality of the court's dispositional orders may be subject to attack, either on direct appeal or by petition for an extraordinary writ. Last, the public interest in the finality of dispositional orders in these cases is a very persuasive, practical reason for the timely appointment of a guardian ad litem in these circumstances. For all these reasons, we hold, as in Hays, that it is error to enter a decree terminating parental rights after a suggestion of involuntary hospitalization for mental illness of the affected parent or custodian without first having appointed a guardian ad litem for such parent or custodian. See Hays v. Camden's Heirs, 38 W.Va. 109, 18 S.E. 461 (1893).

Having found that the appointment of a guardian ad litem is required in accord with W.Va. Code § 56-4-10 for an adult person involuntarily hospitalized, we caution against complete reliance on the provisions of that Code section with respect to the service of process and notice upon the guardian ad litem in lieu of service on an involuntarily hospitalized person for whom the court does not have before it clear evidence of an adjudication of incompetency. In pertinent part W.Va. Code § 56-4-10 provides, ". . . and after such appointment no process need be served on such infant or insane person". In light of the statute [W.Va. Code § 27-5-9(a)] preserving the civil rights of persons involuntarily hospitalized unless that person has been adjudicated an incompetent in a separate proceeding, service of process and notices on the guardian ad litem alone could result in a failure to provide that level of notice and opportunity for meaningful hearing that is constitutionally required in any effort by the State to terminate parental rights. See State ex rel. McCartney v. Nuzum, 161 W.Va. 740, 248 S.E.2d 318 (1978) (requirements for the content of a petition charging abuse and neglect); In re Sutton, 132 W.Va. 875, 53 S.E.2d 839 (1949) (right of parents to notice of hearing); State ex rel. LeMaster v. Oakley, 157 W.Va. 590, 203 S.E.2d 140 (1974) (right to counsel in parental rights termination cases).See footnote 12 Those constitutionally required rights have been included in the requirements for the initiation of an abuse and neglect proceeding. West Virginia Code § 49-6-1(b) states:

> (b) The petition and notice of the hearing shall be served upon both parents and any other custodian, giving to such parents or custodian at least ten days' notice . . . A notice of hearing shall specify the time and place of the hearing, the right to counsel of the child and parents or other custodians at every stage of the proceedings and the fact that such proceedings can result in the permanent termination of the parental rights. Failure to object to defects in the petition and notice shall not be construed as a waiver.

In addition, W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(a) provides:

> (a) In any proceeding under the provisions of this article, the child, his parents, his custodian or other persons standing in loco parentis to him . . . shall have the right to be represented by counsel at every stage of the proceedings and shall be informed by the court of their right to be so represented and that if they cannot pay for the services of counsel, that counsel will be appointed. If . . . [such persons] cannot pay for the services of counsel, the court shall, by order entered of record, at least ten days prior to the date set for hearing, appoint an attorney or attorneys to represent [such parties] and so inform the parties . . . The court may allow to each attorney so appointed a fee in the same amount which appointed counsel can receive in felony cases . . . .

A parent or custodian named in an abuse and neglect petition who is involuntarily hospitalized for mental illness but who retains all of his or her civil rights, must be effectively served with process, including, if service is personal or by mail, service of a copy of any petition or other pleading upon which an order terminating parental rights may be based. In the consideration of any waiver of rights by reason of the failure to respond to process or by reason of other inaction, an affirmative record of service of process consistent with due process requirements of notice and meaningful opportunity to be heard may be pivotal to establishing that such waiver is effective, knowing and intelligent. Accordingly, in abuse and neglect cases, service of original process on a guardian ad litem appointed for a parent or custodian involuntarily hospitalized for mental illness whose legal capacity has not been terminated by law cannot be substituted in lieu of service on the hospitalized parent or custodian where the parental rights of such person may be terminated under the process to be served.

We turn now to the issue of the appointment of counsel. As set out in W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(a), appointment of counsel for parents and other custodians in abuse and neglect cases is contemplated in cases where the parent "cannot pay for the services of counsel . . . ."See footnote 13 "In child neglect proceedings which may result in the termination of parental rights to the custody of natural children, indigent parents are entitled to the assistance of counsel because of the requirements of the Due Process clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions." Syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. LeMaster v. Oakley, 157 W.Va. 590, 203 S.E.2d 140 (1974). Appellant here argues that the court below erred in not appointing counsel for her, at least as soon as it appeared that appellant was confined in a mental institution. It is reasonable to assert on the record before us that the trial court below never had before it any clear, direct evidence from which it might conclude that appellant was unable to "pay for the services of counsel" and therefore never reached the issue of appointing counsel. On the other hand, it is equally reasonable to assert that at least when the court below learned of the hospitalization of appellant, in addition to her history as reflected by the Court Summary filed May 6, 1994, the court below had before it a strong suggestion of indigency.

In considering the contention that the court below erred in not appointing counsel for appellant, we take notice of the exceedingly high percentage of abuse and neglect cases coming before this Court in which appointed counsel appear on behalf of parents or custodians. It is reasonable to conclude that the experience of the trial courts of this State in that regard mirrors the experience here. We believe that that experience justifies the trial courts in indulging a presumption that the parent or parents and custodians entitled by law to be named in abuse and neglect petitions "cannot pay for the services of counsel". This presumption is also justified by the high importance which our State and its citizens attach to prompt and effective protection for abused and neglected children and to full, fair and meaningful opportunity for parents and custodians to be heard when allegations of abuse and neglect are made.

Therefore, circuit courts should appoint counsel for parents and custodians required to be named as respondents in abuse and neglect proceedings as an incident of the making of the order filing each abuse and neglect petition. Upon the appearance of such persons before the court, evidence should be promptly taken, by affidavit and otherwise, to ascertain whether the parties for whom counsel has been appointed are or are not able to pay for counsel. In those cases in which the evidence rebuts the presumption of inability to pay as to one or more of the parents or custodians, the appointment of counsel for any such party should be promptly terminated upon the substitution of other counsel or the knowing, intelligent waiver of the right to counsel. Counsel appointed in these circumstances are entitled to compensation as permitted by law. See footnote 14

We endorse the appointment of counsel for parents or custodians incident to the filing of an abuse and neglect petition as both judicially and financially economical. Judicial economy is achieved by the early appointment of counsel in that the case can then be promptly heard at its various stages with the expectation that all of the parties will be fully advised of the applicable procedures and possible results. It may be expected that all parties will then have a better understanding of the rights to which each party is entitled and the duties and obligations of parents and custodians and that there will be an increased likelihood that any permissible waiver of rights by litigants will be both knowing and intelligent. The ultimate benefit should be earlier finality of whatever dispositional order is justified by the law and the evidence. Financial economy follows from the true achievement of judicial economy. Avoiding delays like those which the facts of this case demonstrate have already occurred and avoiding the type of further delays which will flow from the additional proceedings which must now be had in this case will reduce the attendant costs of public services that have been rendered and will or may be provided to or on account of the litigants. Real savings are likely to be realized because of the timely prosecution, defense and disposition of these cases, that is to say, lower public expense overall, more than enough to compensate for the relatively few cases in which counsel may be appointed for a short time for parents or custodians who may be found able to pay for counsel's services.

If the appointment of a guardian ad litem is required for a parent or custodian, the trial court may also provide in its order appointing counsel or in a later order, a direction that the appointment imposes on that counsel the additional status of guardian ad litem, with the attendant duties of protecting the interests of the persons for whom such counsel is appointed guardian ad litem and the attendant duty on the court to see to the protection of such person's interests until and unless it later appears that such person's circumstances do not require the continued protection of a guardian ad litem or that the two functions cannot be performed by the same attorney. Recently, in the case In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), this Court treated counsel appointed for a child who was the subject of an abuse and neglect case as the child's guardian ad litem and promulgated guidelines for the duties to be performed by a child's guardian ad litem. It is entirely appropriate in the case of a child to treat the two functions of counsel and guardian ad litem as being completely identical. The central purpose of an abuse and neglect proceeding is to ascertain and serve the best interests of the child. As we indicated in Jeffrey R.L., counsel for the child is expected to pursue that central purpose even when his or her client, the child, may have a different view of what is in the child's best interests. We said: "The GAL [guardian ad litem] does not necessarily represent a child's desires but should formulate an independent position regarding relevant issues." Id. at 175. We also noted there and restate here that: "Rule XIII of the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court." Id. at 177. Obviously, those recommendations may or may not be identical to those the child would make to the court, left entirely to his or her own choices. However, in the case of a child, justice is clearly best served by requiring that counsel and the court exercise their respective best judgment in all aspects of the case, and that the court have the benefit of counsel's candid and independent assistance in ascertaining the best interests of that child.

Perhaps in most cases in which a guardian ad litem must be appointed for an adult in an abuse and neglect case, the functions of guardian ad litem and of counsel for the adult will likewise be identical in all respects. However, we recognize that in most such cases, the adult parent or custodian is likely to have a strong and clearly adversarial interest in resisting the relief sought for the child, especially the termination of that adult's parental rights. The potential for real conflict between the duties of a guardian ad litem and counsel for that adult is obviously greater. See footnote 15 One authority has identified three particular areas of potential conflict in the roles of guardian ad litem and counsel, even in cases involving counsel and guardians ad litem for children: (1) when the best interests of the ward and the ward's wishes are not identical, (2) when a privileged communication is made, and the attorney's duty to protect that communication conflicts with his or her duty as guardian, and (3) when a court would require a guardian ad litem to actually testify in a case, a function that counsel ordinarily should not perform. See footnote 16 See Rebecca H. Heartz, Guardians Ad Litem in Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings: Clarifying the Roles to Improve Effectiveness, 27 Family Law Quarterly 327, 334-336 (1993). Accordingly, while we anticipate that such conflicts will rarely actually arise, we acknowledge that where such a dual status appointment of counsel and guardian ad litem for an adult has been made and actual conflict is deemed likely, the trial court may at any time, sua sponte or on the application of an interested party, terminate the dual status of counsel and guardian ad litem for such adult and appoint another attorney guardian ad litem so that counsel originally appointed may zealously represent the adult without concern for such conflict. Nonetheless, considering the relatively few cases in which a guardian ad litem may be required, the very considerable cost which the provision of publicly paid counsel for indigent parties imposes on this State, and the reported difficulty in obtaining counsel willing to accept court appointments, See footnote 17 we recommend the practice of dual appointment in any case in which, and to the extent which, the trial court finds that may be practical and fair.

In accord with the foregoing, we are compelled to reverse the judgment of the Circuit Court of Ohio County terminating the parental rights of appellant, Terri C., and remand this cause for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. Appellant is now entitled to the appointment of counsel below if she cannot pay for the services of counsel. She is entitled to traverse and otherwise defend against the allegations of the petition and to have full, meaningful hearings of the issues, with the assistance of counsel. The State is required to meet its burden of proof as required by law without regard to any prior determination by the court below adverse to appellant's interests and the parties are entitled to such other relief, including a proper dispositional order, as may be appropriate under the law and the evidence adduced.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

Footnote: 1 The petition reflects that it was verified Tuesday, April 26, 1994 and "filed" Friday, April 29, 1994. The petition, inter alia, seeks court ratification of the non-judicial removal of the child from her parents' custody pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-6-3(c), the Code section cited in the emergency temporary order. The pertinent portion of that Code section provides:

If a child or children shall, in the presence of a child protective service worker of the division of human services, be in an emergency situation which constitutes an imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child or children, as that phrase is defined in section three [§ 49-1-3], article one of this chapter, and if such worker has probable cause to believe that the child or children will suffer additional child abuse or neglect or will be removed from the county before a petition can be filed and temporary custody can be ordered, the worker may, prior to the filing of a petition, take the child or children into his or her custody without a court order: Provided, That after taking custody of such child or children prior to the filing of a petition, the worker shall forthwith appear before a circuit judge or a juvenile referee of the county wherein custody was taken, or if no such judge or referee be available, before a circuit judge or a juvenile referee of an adjoining county, and shall immediately apply for an order ratifying the emergency custody of the child pending the filing of a petition . . . . The parents, guardians or custodians of the child or children may be present at the time and place of application for an order ratifying custody, and if at the time the child or children are taken into custody by the worker, the worker knows which judge or referee is to receive the application, the worker shall so inform the parents, guardians or custodians . . . . Upon such sworn testimony or other evidence as the judge or referee deems sufficient, the judge or referee may order the emergency taking by the worker to be ratified . . . . If the emergency taking is ratified by the judge or referee, emergency custody of the child or children shall be vested in the state department until the expiration of the next two judicial days, at which time any such child taken into emergency custody shall be returned to the custody of his or her parent, guardian or custodian unless a petition has been filed and custody of the child has been transferred under the provisions of section three [§ 49-6-3] of this article.

Careful observance of the provisions of section 3(c) and, in other emergency situations, careful observance of the provisions of W. Va. Code § 49-6-9, authorizing emergency custody by law enforcement officers, is to be encouraged and expected. The apparent intent of these Code sections is to afford protection to the child, the parents, child protective service workers, law-enforcement officers and their respective employers from the potentially serious effects of restraining liberty without due process of law.

Footnote: 2 The date on the copy of the return included in the record is not legible.

Footnote: 3 We note also that the Rules of Practice and Procedure For Family Law, adopted by order of this Court July 21, 1993, and effective October 1, 1993, do not include within their scope actions brought under W.Va. Code § 49-1-1, et seq. The scope of those rules includes only proceedings brought under the authority of W.Va. Code § 48-1-1, et seq., § 48A-1-1, et seq., and habeas corpus proceedings involving child custody. Rule 1, Rules of Practice and Procedure For Family Law.

Footnote: 4 West Virginia Code § 49-6-1(b) provides, in pertinent part:

(b) The petition and notice of the hearing shall be served upon both parents and any other custodian, giving to such parents or custodian at least ten days' notice . . . In cases wherein personal service within West Virginia cannot be obtained after due diligence upon any parent or other custodian, a copy of the petition and notice of the hearing shall be mailed to such person by certified mail, addressee only, return receipt requested, to the last known address of such person. If said person signs the certificate, service shall be complete and said certificate shall be filed as proof of said service with the clerk of the circuit court. If service cannot be obtained by personal service or by certified mail, notice shall be by publication as a Class II legal advertisement in compliance with the provisions of article three [W.Va. Code § 59-3-1 et seq.], chapter fifty-nine of this code. A notice of hearing shall specify the time and place of the hearing, the right to counsel of the child and parents or other custodians at every stage of the proceedings and the fact that such proceedings can result in the permanent termination of the parental rights. Failure to object to defects in the petition and notice shall not be construed as a waiver.

Footnote: 5 We note also that no effort was ever made to effect service of the notice and petition on appellant by publication. Assuming that appellant retained her legal capacity to sue and be sued throughout this proceeding, service by publication in accord with the provisions of W.Va. Code § 49-6-1(b) may well have cured the difficulty presented by an attempted, but ineffective, service by mail.

Footnote: 6 We have noted and considered the somewhat asymmetrical design of W. Va. Code § 56-4-10. It is noted that the section recites that it applies to "[t]he proceedings in a suit wherein an infant or insane person is a party. . .", thus indicating that the section applies to any such proceedings. The section further requires that a guardian ad litem appointed pursuant to the section "shall faithfully represent the interest or estate of the infant or insane person for whom he is appointed . . . ." (Emphasis added.) We have noted that the sentence continues: ". . . and it shall be the duty of the court to see that the estate of the defendant is so represented and protected." (Emphasis added.) The ambiguity thus created must be resolved in favor a construction which avoids an absurd result. As Justice Miller recently commented in another context, common sense dictates that if the section applies to "any" proceedings and the guardian ad litem is to represent the interest or estate of the persons, then the court is also to protect the interest or estate at issue. See State ex rel. Morgan v. Trent, ___ W.Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___, ___ (No. 22886, Nov. 17, 1995).

Footnote: 7 We commend the child's guardian ad litem for making and bringing her motion on for hearing, requesting the appointment of a guardian ad litem for appellant. Her attention to this issue was well directed at fully protecting the infant and insuring the finality of any order dealing with the child's future. That desirable finality is now postponed as a result of the failure of the trial court to rule on that motion.

Footnote: 8 Minnesota Statutes Annotated § 253B.23, Subd. 2(a) (West 1994), sets forth the legal results of commitment status as follows:

Subd. 2. Legal results of commitment status. (a) Except as otherwise provided in this chapter and in sections 246.15 and 246.16, no person by reason of commitment or treatment pursuant to this chapter shall be deprived of any legal right, including but not limited to the right to dispose of property, sue and be sued, execute instruments, make purchases, enter into contractual relationships, vote, and hold a driver's license. Commitment or treatment of any patient pursuant to* this chapter is not a judicial determination of legal incompetency except to the extent provided in section 253B.03, subdivision 6.

Footnote: 9 West Virginia Code § 27-5-9(a) provides:

(a) No person shall be deprived of any civil right solely by reason of his receipt of services for mental illness, mental retardation or addiction, nor shall the receipt of such services modify or vary any civil right of such person, including, but not limited to, civil service status and appointment, the right to register for and to vote at elections, the right to acquire and to dispose of property, the right to execute instruments or rights relating to the granting, forfeiture or denial of a license, permit, privilege or benefit pursuant to any law, but a person who has been adjudged incompetent pursuant to article eleven [§ 27-11-1 et seq.] of this chapter and who has not been restored to legal competency may be deprived of such rights. Involuntary commitment pursuant to this article shall not of itself relieve the patient of legal capacity.

Footnote: 17 We are mindful of the plea, made on oral argument in this case by the counsel to the DHHR from the prosecutor's office in Ohio County, that difficulty had been and would be experienced in finding members of the bar who would take appointments in abuse and neglect cases. We assume that the difficulty will arise with respect to service as either counsel or guardian ad litem. We recognize the financial hardships that are sometimes created for members of the bar, particularly younger lawyers, when they are asked to accept appointments without the assurance of fair payment. We encourage members of the bar to accept these burdens willingly and commend those who accept such appointments. Pursuant to the provisions of W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(a), we suggest that circuit courts should allow fees as permitted by law whenever proper application is made by appointed counsel.

Workman, Justice, dissenting:

HOW MANY ANGELS CAN DANCE ON THE HEAD OF A PIN?

The majority has embarked on an extended and meandering expedition through the law of abuse and neglect. Prior to the enrollment of this opinion in the annals of the law, we had endeavored to develop some semblance of order and ease of application in the requirements of this area of the law. Experience has shown that neglect and abuse law should be kept as simple and humane as possible. The last thing we need in this area is a "how many angels can dance on the head of a pin" approach with lots of meaningless procedural hoops to jump through. It must be remembered: "Rules of practice and procedure are devised to promote the ends of justice, not to defeat them." Hormel v. Helvering, 312 U. S. 552, 557 (1941). With the majority's presentation of this obscure and easily misconstrued opinion, I have several significant areas of concern.

I.
NOTICE

First, the majority is troubled by the notice of termination proceedings received by the Appellant in this case. The petition requesting termination of parental rights was apparently filed on April 29, 1994. On May 9, 1994, a copy of the petition was sent by certified mail to the Appellant at her mother's home address. That attempt at service was returned to sender. By August 19, 1994, the court and DHHR were apparently aware of the Appellant's involuntary hospitalization and the address of the mental institution. On August 22, 1994, the petition was received on behalf of the Appellant at the mental institution by a person whose signature is not legible. The Appellant now claims that she did not receive such mailing. By January 1995, a West Virginia protective services worker had contacted the Appellant's caseworker regarding the termination proceedings, and in the March 1, 1995, order, the lower court found that the Appellant did receive actual notice of these proceedings.

In dealing with this notice issue, the majority quotes West Virginia Code § 49-6-1(b) regarding service of process and acknowledges that if neither personal service nor service by mail can be obtained, notice by publication is required. Noting that notice by publication was not attempted in this case, the majority states that notice by publication "may" have cured the deficiencies of notice in this case. The majority then references the Appellees' argument that since the lower court found that the Appellant did indeed receive actual notice of the termination proceedings, any defect in service of process is cured. Apparently not wishing to confront that assertion, the majority somewhat abruptly concludes that it will "not reach the question of whether such a defect would be cured" by the fact that the Appellant received actual notice. The majority then launches into an examination of the necessity of a guardian ad litem, returns to the notice issue several pages later, requotes section 49-6-1(b), and concludes that notice served upon a guardian ad litem rather than the involuntarily hospitalized parent is insufficient.

Where in that discussion is a precise, unequivocal statement of the law of notice to parents in termination proceedings? Where is a concrete message regarding resolution of the issue of a missing parent See footnote 1 and the inability to serve notice? According to the majority, strict adherence to the provisions of section 49-6-1(b) allowing service by publication "may" have cured the problem in this case. That further fouls the waters by suggesting that even faithfulness to the statutory scheme may not have been enough. This opinion leaves us in great confusion.

My predominant concern is that we do not allow the mechanics of the notice issue to overshadow the obligation to expeditiously resolve the underlying issue of the rights, safety, and custody of the children. In child abuse and neglect cases, the best interests of the child are the paramount concern. Although the majority apparently has difficulty perceiving specificity within section 49-6-1(b), it appears clear to me that those rules unambiguously define the requirements of notice. See footnote 2 Equally evident is the intent that individuals for whom a guardian ad litem is appointed under West Virginia Code § 56-4- 10See footnote 3 are not entitled to personal service of process. That section, relied upon by the majority as justification for requiring a guardian ad litem for the Appellant, specifically provides that "after such appointment no process need be served on such infant or insane person . . . ." The majority feels perfectly comfortable stretching the "infant or insane" language to include persons involuntarily hospitalized by reason of mental illness in the context of justifying the requirement of a guardian ad litem. Yet the majority draws the line on literal compliance with the same statute when it arrives at the issue of notice, apparently reasoning that such persons have not been formally deprived of their civil rights to service in the absence of a declaration of incompetency.

Why not adhere to the statutes as written? If section 56-4-10 justifies the appointment of a guardian ad litem, why not simply follow the mandate of that section and allow the guardian to accept service of process? Prior to the appointment of the guardian ad litem, section 49-6-1(b) should govern, permitting notice by publication to suffice if personal service or service by mail is not possible. If a parent is absent, our prior statement in syllabus point six of In re Christina, 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), should still govern: "When the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources seeks to terminate parental rights where an absent parent has abandoned the child, allegations of such abandonment should be included in the petition and every effort made to comply with the notice requirements of W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 (1992)."See footnote 4 Once a guardian ad litem is appointed, the guardian, cloaked with authority to act on behalf of the individual by the very nature of his/her appointment, should be permitted to accept service of process on behalf of the parent, as is the intent of section 56-4-10.

II.
JUMPING THROUGH HOOPS

The majority also fails to identify the time at which a court must appoint a guardian ad litem. Syllabus point three of the majority opinion states the rule that a guardian is required where the person is involuntarily hospitalized, and yet syllabus point four states that it is error to terminate parental rights without a guardian ad litem where there has been a "suggestion" of involuntary hospitalization for mental illness. That leaves the door cracked open on the issue of exactly when this duty to appoint a guardian ad litem is triggered. I disagree with the majority's apparent conclusion that the "suggestion" of the Appellant's mental condition was an adequate basis for the appointment of a guardian ad litem. Unless and until a court is informed of legal incapacity or involuntary commitment, that court should be under no duty to appoint a guardian ad litem. A "suggestion" of a mental condition is much too amorphous and indeterminate to be utilized as a standard for the appointment of a guardian ad litem.

The one saving grace the majority includes in its guardian ad litem requirement is that the trial court may, in its order appointing counsel, provide that the appointment imposes the additional status of guardian ad litem. Now that the majority has cast so much doubt as to exactly what (even a suggestion or suspicion of mental illness?) may create the obligation to appoint a guardian ad litem and so much confusion as to how a parent with some "suggestion" of mental illness may be notified, I recommend that the circuit courts routinely couch the orders appointing counsel in those terms. In fact, I will propose that the new Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings now out for public comment until August 15, 1996, include that requirement. Judicial training will have to be held at the next conference, and we'll get this esoteric hoop jumped. Whew! What a lot of trouble -- for what real gain?

III.
CHILDREN ARE PEOPLE, TOO

The majority, in the midst of its discussion of the potential conflict in the roles of a guardian ad litem and an attorney for the parent, states that "[i]t is entirely appropriate in the case of a child to treat the two functions of counsel and guardian ad litem as being completely identical." The majority imparts the impression, to which I object most strenuously, that the adult litigant should have rights which exceed those of the child, suggesting to me that the child is considered a person with a lesser entitlement to rights than the adult. The majority hypothesizes that conflicts could emerge between the roles of guardian ad litem and counsel for the adult, yet deftly dismisses even the possibility that such conflicts could also occur in the roles of guardian ad litem and counsel for the child. If the majority believes an adult may be entitled to both appointed counsel and a guardian ad litem, how can they blithely presume that an individual can always operate in both capacities simultaneously for a child?

We commented upon the general expectations of a guardian ad litem for a child in abuse and neglect proceedings in syllabus point five of In re Jeffrey R. L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993):

> Each child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel. To further that goal, W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992] mandates that a child has a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of abuse and neglect proceedings. Furthermore, Rule XIII of the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court. Rules 1.1 and 1.3 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, respectively, require an attorney to provide competent representation to a client, and to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client.

We also summarized the guardian ad litem's role in syllabus point three of In re Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991), as follows:

> In a proceeding to terminate parental rights pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, a guardian ad litem, appointed pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(a), as amended, must exercise reasonable diligence in carrying out the responsibility of protecting the rights of the children. This duty includes exercising the appellate rights of the children, if, in the reasonable judgment of the guardian ad litem, an appeal is necessary.

We further elaborated in syllabus point five of James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), that "[t]he guardian ad litem's role in abuse and neglect proceedings does not actually cease until such time as the child is placed in a permanent home." In syllabus point five of In re Christina, 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), we acknowledged that the wishes of the child regarding continued visitation or other contact with the parent should be considered, as follows:

> When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

Just as some circumstances may present conflict between the role of guardian ad litem and counsel for the parent, those roles may also conflict in the case of the child. Part I B-2 of the Standards of Practice for Lawyers Who Represent Children in Abuse and Neglect Cases, adopted by the American Bar Association in February 1996, provides guidance on this issue and provides as follows:

> Conflict Situations.
> (1) If a lawyer appointed as guardian ad litem determines that there is a conflict caused by performing both roles of guardian ad litem and child's attorney, the lawyer should continue to perform as child's attorney and withdraw as guardian ad litem. The lawyer should request appointment of a guardian ad litem without revealing the basis for the request.

(2) If a lawyer is appointed as a "child's attorney" for siblings, there may also be a conflict which could require that the lawyer decline representation or withdraw from representing all of the children.

Comment-

The primary conflict that arises between the two roles is when the child's expressed preferences differ from what the lawyer deems to be in the child's best interests. As a practical matter, when the lawyer has established a trusting relationship with the child, most conflicts can be avoided. While the lawyer should be careful not to apply undue pressure to a child, the lawyer's advice and guidance can often persuade the child to change an imprudent position or to identify alternative choices if the child's first choice is denied by the court.

The lawyer-client role involves a confidential relationship with privileged communications, while a guardian ad litem-client role may not be confidential. Compare Alaska Bar Assoc. Ethics Op. #854 (1985) (lawyer- client privilege does not apply when the lawyer is appointed to be child's guardian ad litem) with Bentley v. Bentley, 448 N.Y.S.2d 559 (App. Div. 1982) (communication between minor children and guardian ad litem in divorce custody case is entitled to lawyer-client privilege). Because the child has a right to confidentiality and advocacy of his or her position, the child's attorney can never abandon this role. Once a lawyer has a lawyer-client relationship with a minor, he or she cannot and should not assume any other role for the child, especially as guardian ad litem. When the roles cannot be reconciled, another person must assume the guardian ad litem role. See Arizona State Bar Committee on Rules of Professional Conduct, Opinion No. 86-13 (1986).

The Ohio Supreme Court, in In re Baby Girl Baxter, 17 Ohio St. 3d 229 (1985), resolved a situation of conflict in the two roles by holding:

[W]hen an attorney is appointed to represent a person and is also appointed guardian ad litem for that person, his first and highest duty is to zealously represent his client within the bounds of the law and to champion his client's cause. If the attorney feels there is a conflict between his role as attorney and his role as guardian, he should petition the court for an order allowing him to withdraw as guardian. The court should not hesitate to grant such request.

Id. at 232. As part of Ohio's reformation of temporary and permanent custody actions in 1988, R. C. 2151.281(H) was added to the Ohio Code. Closely tracking the language of Baby Girl Baxter, it provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> If a person is serving as guardian ad litem and counsel for a child and either that person or the court finds that a conflict may exist between the person's roles as guardian ad litem and as counsel, the court shall relieve the person of his duties as guardian ad litem and appoint someone else as guardian ad litem for the child.

See also In re Shaffer, 540 N.W.2d 706 (Mich. App. 1995) (holding that while one person can simultaneously act as guardian ad litem and attorney for the children in an appropriate case, conflicts in those roles may require appointment of a guardian ad litem separate from the attorney).

In Newman v. Newman, 663 A.2d 980 (Conn. 1995), the Supreme Court of Connecticut expressed concern regarding the creation of "conflict in the attorney's role by conflating the role of counsel for a child with the role of a guardian ad litem or next friend." 663 A.2d at 987.

Typically, the child's attorney is an advocate for the child, while the guardian ad litem is the representative of the child's best interests. As an advocate, the attorney should honor the strongly articulated preference regarding taking an appeal of a child who is old enough to express a reasonable preference; as a guardian, the attorney might decide that, despite such a child's present wishes, the contrary course of action would be in the child's long term best interests, psychologically or financially.

Id. at 987-88. The division of roles may be "necessary to make sure that the attorney for the children will not be faced with the dilemma of reconciling such diverging interests while conforming to her role as advocate." Id. at 990.

The reality is that abused and neglected children frequently want to be returned to their parents, for that is all they know, and despite the abuse, there usually still is an emotional bond. As we explained in Christina, as quoted above, the wishes of the child are not to be disregarded. Id. at ___, 460 S.E.2d at 694, syl. pt. 5. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6), regarding the disposition of neglected or abused children, also requires a child's wishes to be considered in some instances. That statute, in pertinent part, emphasis added, provides as follows:

> (6) Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, > terminate the parental or custodial rights and/or responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the state department or a licensed child welfare agency. If the court shall so find, then in fixing its dispositional order, the court shall consider the following factors: (1) The child's need for continuity of care and caretakers; (2) the amount of time required for the child to be integrated into a stable and permanent home environment; and (3) other factors as the court considers necessary and proper. Notwithstanding any other provision of this article, the permanent parental rights shall not be terminated if a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court, objects to such termination.

Dissimilarly, there is almost always a community of interest in the wishes of an allegedly abusive parent and the legal position adopted on his or her behalf by appointed counsel. Thus, there is far greater potential for a conflict in the representation of a child than in the representation of an adult in an abuse and neglect case.

It is not so much the result in the present case with which I so vehemently disagree; it is the potential ramification of future interpretation and attempted application of this very rambling opinion, full of confusing ideas and standards, which disturbs me profoundly. Lastly, I must observe that the entire tenor of the majority opinion sounds in the rights of the Appellant. We recently observed in syllabus point seven of In re Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995) that "[c]ases involving children must be decided not just in the context of competing sets of adults' rights, but also with a regard for the rights of the child(ren)." It is not simply the rights of the parents with which we must be concerned in an abuse and neglect setting; rather, the rights of the children must be the foremost, preeminent responsibility. The rights of the children cannot be obfuscated under the guise of protection of the procedural rights of the parents.

For the reasons set forth above, I respectfully dissent.

Footnote: 1 In many of these cases, there is a missing or abandoned parent and not a clue as to their whereabouts. The majority now muddies up the waters as to what constitutes proper notice in the event it is ascertained much later that they were institutionalized.

Footnote: 2 The only Rules of Civil Procedure regarding the notice requirement and applicable to child abuse and neglect cases are Rules 5(b) and 5(e), as follows:

(b) Same: How Made. Whenever under these rules service is required or permitted to be made upon a party represented by an attorney of record the service shall be made upon the attorney unless service upon the party himself is ordered by the court. Service upon the attorney or upon a party shall be made by delivering a copy to him or by mailing it to him at his last-known address or, if no address is known, by leaving it with the clerk of the court. Delivery of a copy within this rule means: Handing it to the person to be served; or leaving it at his office with his clerk or other person in charge thereof; or, if the office is closed or the person to be served has no office, leaving it at his usual place of abode with some member of his family above the age of 16 years. Service by mail is complete upon mailing.

(e) Filing With the Court Defined. The filing of pleadings and other papers with the court as required by these rules shall be made by filing them with the clerk of the court, who shall note thereon the filing date, except that the judge may permit the papers to be filed with him, in which event he shall note thereon the filing date and forthwith transmit them to the office of the clerk; the notation by the clerk or the judge of the filing date on any such paper constitutes the filing of such paper, and such paper then becomes a part of the record in the action without any order of the court.

Footnote: 3 West Virginia Code § 56-4-10 provides as follows, emphasis provided:

The proceedings in a suit wherein an infant or insane person is a party shall not be stayed because of such infancy or insanity, but the court in which the suit is pending, or the judge thereof in vacation, or the clerk thereof at rules, shall appoint some discreet and competent attorney at law as guardian ad litem to such infant or insane defendant, whether such defendant shall have been served with process or not, and after such appointment no process need be served on such infant or insane person. If no such attorney be found willing to act, the court, or the judge thereof in vacation, may compel him to act, or appoint some other discreet and proper person in his stead; but the attorney or other person so appointed shall not be liable for costs. Every guardian ad litem shall faithfully represent the interest or estate of the infant or insane person for whom he is appointed, and it shall be the duty of the court to see that the estate of such defendant is so represented and protected. And the court, or the judge thereof in vacation, whenever of opinion that the interest of an infant or insane person requires it, shall remove any guardian ad litem and appoint another in his stead. When, in any case, the court or judge is satisfied that the guardian ad litem has rendered substantial service to the estate of an infant or insane defendant, it may allow him reasonable compensation therefor, and his actual expenses, if any, to be paid out of the estate of such defendant.

Footnote: 4 We recognized in In re Christina that abandonment of a child by a parent "constitutes grounds for termination of parental rights." Id. at ___, 460 S.E.2d at 702.

Rehearing and Rehearing En Banc Denied July 3, 2003.[FN*]

FN* Judge Morris S. Arnold would grant the petition for rehearing en banc. Judge Theodore McMillian did not participate in the consideration or decision of this matter.

Heaney, Circuit Judge, dissented and filed a separate opinion.

Rockne O. Cole, argued, Iowa City, IA, for appellant. Robert P. Ewald, argued, Asst. Atty. Gen., Des Moines, IA, for appellee.

Before WOLLMAN, HEANEY, and MELLOY, Circuit Judges.

MELLOY, Circuit Judge.

I.

An Iowa jury convicted Lomholt on two counts of second degree sexual abuse under Iowa Code §§ 709.1 and 709.3. Lomholt's victims were B.G., his four-year-old niece, and N.P., her five-year-old, female friend. Evidence against Lomholt included his signed confession as well as testimony from B.G. and N.P. The confession was corroborated by testimony from N.P.'s mother regarding a change in N.P.'s personality following the period of abuse. The confession was also corroborated by evidence that during identified periods of time Lomholt, as a babysitter, was alone with the children and had the opportunity to commit abuse.

The victims were allowed to testify at trial via closed-circuit television pursuant to Iowa Code § 910A.14 (now codified as § 915.38(1)) which permits a court to "protect a minor ... from trauma caused by testifying in the physical presence of the defendant where it would impair the minor's ability to communicate ..." and where there has been "a specific finding by the court that such measures are necessary to protect the minor from trauma." Id. Before admitting the closed-circuit testimony from the victims, the Iowa trial court held an evidentiary hearing and set forth factual findings as required by Iowa Code § 910A.14 and Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836, 856, 110 S.Ct. 3157, 111 L.Ed.2d 666 (1990) (holding face-to-face confrontation to be an important but dispensable element of Sixth Amendment confrontation rights and setting forth the requirement that trial courts must make case-specific findings regarding trauma to child victims before the use of testimony via closed circuit television may be admitted).

At the evidentiary hearing, Lomholt presented no evidence nor witnesses to rebut the testimony of the prosecution's only witness, the victims' sex abuse counselor, Ms. Patricia A. Tomson. The Iowa trial court specifically noted that it found Ms. Tomson to be credible. Based on Ms. Tomson's unrebutted testimony, which we discuss in some detail below, the Iowa trial court concluded:

> the State produced credible testimony that testifying in the physical presence of the defendant would be traumatic to each of the alleged victims. In addition, the evidence was convincing that the trauma experienced in testifying would impair the ability of the witnesses to communicate. The court finds that testimony by closed circuit equipment is necessary to protect the alleged victims from trauma.

Iowa v. Lomholt, No. 4311 at 3 (Iowa Dist. Ct. for Mitchell County July 8, 1996) (Ruling on Motion to Permit Testimony by Closed Circuit Television).

Following conviction and denial of a request for post-trial relief, Lomholt advanced his Sixth Amendment argument before the Iowa Court of Appeals. The Iowa Court of Appeals affirmed the trial court's rulings and held the factual findings sufficient to satisfy the requirements of Craig, 497 U.S. at 855-56, 110 S.Ct. 3157. The Iowa Court of Appeals held in the alternative that, had the admission of the children's testimony been a Sixth Amendment violation, it would have been harmless error in light of Lomholt's corroborated confession. The Iowa Supreme Court declined further review, and federal habeas proceedings followed.

The district court expressly noted that it believed the factual findings of the Iowa courts to be incorrect. Lomholt v. Burt, 219 F.Supp.2d 977, 992 (2002) ("In short, this court agrees with [the federal magistrate's report and recommendation] that the trial court's findings were 'wrong,' or at least, were based on evidence that this court would not find satisfactory if this court were the finder of fact."). Nevertheless, the district court carefully reviewed the evidence of record, found support for the factual findings, and held the findings to be reasonable under 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(2). Accepting the Iowa courts' factual findings as reasonable, the district court proceeded to find the Iowa courts' application of Craig to those facts reasonable under the standard set forth in Williams v. Taylor, 529 U.S. 362, 409-13, 120 S.Ct. 1495, 146 L.Ed.2d 389 (2000).

II.

[1] In the habeas setting, a federal court is bound by the AEDPA to exercise only limited and deferential review of underlying state court decisions. 28 U.S.C. § 2254. Under this deferential standard, the federal court may not grant habeas relief to a state prisoner merely because the federal court might have reached a conclusion different than that reflected in the state courts' factual determinations. 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(2) and (e)(1). Similarly, the federal court may not grant habeas relief to a state prisoner merely "because that court concludes in its independent judgment that the relevant state-court decision applied clearly established federal law erroneously or incorrectly." Williams, 529 U.S. at 411, 120 S.Ct. 1495. Rather, in the interest of furthering the goal of finality and respecting the principles of federalism,

> [t]he Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act (AEDPA) mandates that habeas relief "shall not be granted with respect to any claim that was adjudicated on the merits in State court proceedings unless" the state court's decision was "contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States," or "was based on an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in the State court proceeding." 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)

Robinson v. Crist, 278 F.3d 862, 865 (8th Cir.2002).

[2][3][4] A state court decision is contrary to clearly established Supreme Court precedent if "the state court arrives at a conclusion opposite to that reached by [the] Court on a question of law or ... decides a case differently than [the] Court has on a set of materially indistinguishable facts." Williams, 529 U.S. at 413, 120 S.Ct. 1495. A state court decision involves an unreasonable application of clearly established Supreme Court precedent "if the state court identifies the correct governing legal principle from [the] Court's decisions but unreasonably applies that principle to the facts of the prisoner's case." Id. Finally, a state court decision involves "an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented in state court proceedings,"28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(2), only if it is shown by clear and convincing evidence that the state court's presumptively correct factual findings do not enjoy support in the record. 28 U.S.C. § 2254(e)(1); Boyd v. Minnesota, 274 F.3d 497, 501 n.4 (8th Cir.2001) ("There is sufficient record evidence to support such a finding and, thus, it would not constitute an unreasonable determination of the facts in light of the evidence presented at trial.").

III.

[5] The Iowa courts correctly identified Craig as the controlling and clearly established Supreme Court precedent. Under Craig, before a defendant may be deprived the opportunity to confront a child witness face-to-face, there must be a case-specific finding that the "use of the one-way, closed circuit television procedure is necessary to protect the welfare of the particular child witness who seeks to testify,""that the child witness would be traumatized, not by the courtroom generally, but by the presence of the defendant," and "that the emotional distress suffered by the child witness in the presence of the defendant is more than de minimis, i.e., more than 'mere nervousness or excitement or some reluctance to testify.' " Craig, 497 U.S. at 855-56, 110 S.Ct. 3157 (citations omitted). The Court did not attempt to define the minimum level of trauma required but noted that the level of trauma would be sufficient if it "would impair the child's ability to communicate." Id. at 857, 110 S.Ct. 3157.

Lomholt attacks the reasonableness of the Iowa courts' factual findings and application of Craig. There is no allegation that the Iowa courts' legal conclusion was contrary to Craig or any other clearly established Supreme Court precedent. Accordingly, our review is limited to two questions: (1) did the Iowa courts make an unreasonable factual determination in light of the evidence presented, or (2) did the Iowa courts unreasonably apply Craig to these facts.

We will first examine the Iowa court's factual findings. Lomholt argues that the findings were unreasonable because there was no showing that the children would be more traumatized specifically by his presence than generally by the courtroom experience and because Ms. Tomson's projections of likely harm to the children described only de minimis anxiety rather than trauma as required under Craig. While Lomholt attacks the factual bases of Ms. Tomson's testimony and alleges that she was biased, he does not attack her qualifications.

A careful review of the trial court's findings and Ms. Tomson's unrebutted hearing testimony is necessary to address Lomholt's arguments. The Iowa Court of Appeals described her testimony from the evidentiary hearing:

> Tomson testified B.G. became anxious when describing the abuse and wet her pants on one occasion. She stated B.G. indicated she felt "sad and tired" when she thought of Lomholt. Her drawing of herself did not include arms which Tomson stated was an indication of powerlessness. ... Tomson maintained N.P. was afraid of Lomholt and played like a baby when the subject was broached. Tomson testified N.P. said she was frightened of Lomholt and that "she doesn't want to see him. Her words are, I want him to stand in the corner for a long, long time." Tomson further testified it would be "very traumatic" for either child to testify in Lomholt's presence. She stated, "I'm not sure either child would talk." Tomson also thought testifying before Lomholt would impair both girls' ability to testify and make it less likely they would tell the truth.

Iowa v. Lomholt, No. 7-588/96-1965 at 4 (Iowa Ct.App.1998). In addition, Tomson testified that B.G. was reluctant to talk about Lomholt and that when Tomson tried to discuss Lomholt with her, B.G. would resort to talking like a baby, become hard to understand, and engage in distracting behavior. Evid. Hearing Trans. at 16. Finally, Tomson testified that B.G. was "pretty disintegrated emotionally, particularly when thinking about the subject we were talking about which was court ...." Evid. Hearing Trans. at 10.

Whereas Tomson expressly noted that N.P. was afraid of Lomholt, she did not unequivocally state that B.G. was afraid or unafraid of Lomholt.[FN2]

> FN2. Lomholt argues that Tomson specifically testified B.G. was not afraid of Lomholt. The relevant testimony does not support Lomholt's position. The relevant questions from defense counsel and responses from Tomson were as follows:
> Q. I want to discuss [B.G.] right now. Is [B.G.] scared of the defendant?
>
> A. When I asked her that question directly, she didn't answer me. She had a relationship with [Lomholt]. He was her care giver. So I'm not certain that she's frightened of him.
>
> Q. How about [N.P.]?
>
> A. Yes, [N.P.] is frightened of [Lomholt].
>
> Q. How do you know this?
>
> A. She has said that she is. She doesn't want to see him. Her words are, I want him to stand in a corner for a long, long time.
>
> Q. How about [B.G.]? Is she apprehensive or scared about testifying in court with [Lomholt] present?
>
> A. [B.G.]'s anxious about talking about the abuse at all. I was present when she talked with you about that. And she sat in my lap and did as many distracting things as she could rather than talk about what had happened to her. The fact that she resorts to baby talk and is very difficult to understand when she starts talking about the abuse. And the fact that she wets her pants or has-now she asks to go to the bathroom, but at first, she didn't. She just wet her pants.

Q. You testified that [B.G.] has never told you that she is afraid of [Lomholt]?

A. That's right.

Q. Based on her drawings and based upon your other communications with her, has she indirectly indicated that she's afraid of [Lomholt]?

A. Based on her drawings, there is more indication that of shame about talking about the abuse than of [Lomholt] himself.

Q. Based upon your education, based upon your experience, would testifying in the physical presence of Mark Lomholt impair [B.G. and N.P.]'s ability to communicate?

A. Yes, it would.

Tomson testified in response to questions from the prosecutor that she believed it would be "very traumatic" for the children to testify in court in front of the defendant. The defense attorney challenged this testimony, and Tomson clarified that while the children may have trouble talking in a different room where only the attorneys and the judge would be present, testifying in front of the defendant would be different.[FN3] Finally, Tomson testified about studies involving children other than B.G. and N.P. and stated that, in her expert opinion, it would be traumatic for any children who had been sexually abused to testify in front of their abusers. Evid. Hearing Trans. at 19-20. Lomholt points to these comments in particular to support his argument that the evidence was not sufficiently case-specific.

FN3. Q. And you said that [B.G. and N.P.] would have trouble talking. They may have trouble talking in a different room with just myself, [the prosecutor] and the judge present; is that correct?

A. Yes, they may.

Q. So there actually may be no difference between that and a courtroom setting?

A. I believe there would be a difference.

[6] In summary, Ms. Tomson provided a detailed account of her counseling sessions with both girls, specifically testified that she believed it would be "very traumatic" for them to testify in front of Lomholt, and specifically noted that testifying in front of Lomholt would be different than testifying outside of his presence. We note that the Court in Craig stated that expert testimony could provide a sufficient basis for the factual findings necessary to admit closed-circuit testimony. Craig, 497 U.S. at 860, 110 S.Ct. 3157 ("The trial court in this case, for example, could well have found, on the basis of the expert testimony before it, that testimony by the child witnesses in the courtroom in the defendant's presence 'will result in [each] child suffering serious emotional distress such that the child cannot reasonably communicate.' ") (citations omitted). Here, Lomholt failed to rebut such testimony and the Iowa courts deemed it credible. Further, Ms. Tomson's qualifications were unchallenged. Accordingly, the fact that the Iowa courts' findings were based solely on the testimony of one expert does not provide a basis for finding the Iowa courts' findings unreasonable.

[7] In light of Ms. Tomson's conclusions and her discussion of the children's behavior during counseling sessions, it was not unreasonable for the Iowa courts to conclude that the emotional impact described by Ms. Tomson was "more than de minimis, i.e. more than 'mere nervousness or excitement or some reluctance to testify.' " Craig, 497 U.S. at 856, 110 S.Ct. 3157 (citations omitted). Ms. Tomson specifically noted that testifying before Lomholt would be "very traumatic" and that this trauma would be sufficient to impair the girls' ability to communicate. It is not fatal to Ms. Tomson's testimony that she did not unequivocally state that B.G. was afraid of Lomholt. As noted in footnote 2, supra, Ms. Tomson did not testify that B.G. was unafraid of Lomholt. To attribute such a statement to Ms. Tomson would be to ignore the deference owed to the findings of the Iowa courts.

Further, even if she had provided such testimony, the Supreme Court requires a showing of trauma, not necessarily a showing of fear. See Craig, 497 U.S. at 856, 857 and 860, 110 S.Ct. 3157 (describing the requisite impact on a child-witness as "emotional trauma," "serious emotional distress," and "serious emotional distress such that the child cannot reasonably communicate.”). Fear, shame, guilt, and countless other emotions may overwhelm a child victim's ability to communicate. The Court in Craig appropriately omitted any narrow descriptions that would have limited the type of trauma necessary to overcome a defendant's confrontation rights. The Iowa courts' refusal to read such a limitation into the definition of trauma does not make their factual findings unreasonable.

[8] Similarly, it was not unreasonable for the Iowa courts to conclude that Ms. Tomson's testimony adequately differentiated between trauma attendant to the general experience of testifying in court and trauma attendant to testifying before Lomholt. She stated that the latter would be “very traumatic” and that this experience would be different than testifying only before the judge and the attorneys. While more testimony in this regard would have strengthened the Iowa courts' conclusions, we cannot find the evidence so lacking that we may declare those conclusions unreasonable.

[9] Turning to the reasonableness of the Iowa courts' application of Craig, Lomholt argues that the Iowa courts failed to enforce the case-specific requirement of Craig. Specifically, Lomholt argues that Ms. Tomson's blanket statement that all child-victims of sexual abuse would be traumatized if forced to testify in front of their abuser demonstrates that her opinions were not case-specific. If her general statements had comprised the entirety of her testimony, Lomholt's attack might warrant a grant of relief. However, Tomson's general statement concerning all child victims was an isolated statement at the end of her testimony following a detailed discussion concerning her counseling sessions with both victims. As noted by the district court, “the fact that case-specific observations and conclusions are consistent with an expert's general opinions or other studies concerning the reaction of young children to testifying about wrongdoing in the presence of the perpetrator doesn't mean that the expert's opinion concerning the specific children in question wasn't ‘case-specific.’ ” Lomholt v. Burt, 219 F.Supp.2d at 998. Given the detailed accounts of sessions with each child and the separate discussions of each child's reactions, it was not unreasonable for the Iowa courts to conclude that Ms. Tomson's testimony satisfied the case-specific requirement of Craig.

The district court is affirmed.

HEANEY, Circuit Judge, dissenting.

By finding B.G. would be traumatized by Lomholt's presence at trial, the state trial court unreasonably determined the facts in light of the evidence presented. Similarly, allowing closed circuit television testimony without evidence that it was necessary to protect B.G. from trauma associated with Lomholt's presence is an unreasonable application of Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836, 110 S.Ct. 3157, 111 L.Ed.2d 666 (1990), the governing Supreme Court precedent on this matter. As habeas relief is appropriate both where there has been an unreasonable determination of the facts and where there has been an unreasonable application of the law, *see*28 U.S.C. § 2254(d), I would grant the petition in part in this matter. I therefore dissent from that portion of the majority's opinion that affirms the district court's denial of habeas relief with regard to Lomholt's conviction involving B.G.

Subject to a limited number of exceptions, a criminal defendant enjoys the well-established constitutional right to face his accusers. One of those exceptions exists for child witnesses who would be severely traumatized by testifying in front of their victimizers. Craig makes clear that to satisfy the Confrontation Clause when a witness testifies via closed circuit television, the government must establish that testifying in this manner is necessary to protect the welfare of the child. 497 U.S. at 855, 110 S.Ct. 3157 (1990). This inquiry is case-specific; the government cannot rely on general evidence that children as a group are traumatized by testifying. Id. Moreover, it does not suffice to show that the child may be traumatized by the court process. The touchstone is whether the defendant's physical presence causes the child harm. Id. at 856, 110 S.Ct. 3157 ("[I]f the state interest were merely the interest in protecting the child witnesses from courtroom trauma generally, denial of face-to-face confrontation would be unnecessary because the child could be permitted to testify in less intimidating surroundings, albeit with the defendant present.") In other words, to deny a defendant face-to-face confrontation of his accuser, the evidence must establish that "the child witness would be traumatized, not by the courtroom generally, but by the presence of the defendant." Id.

Consistent with the above standard, in order to allow B.G. to testify by closed circuit television, the state was required to show that B.G. would have be traumatized by Lomholt's presence at trial. The trial court concluded that "the State produced credible testimony that testifying in the physical presence of the defendant would be traumatic to each of the alleged victims." The record simply does not support such a finding as to B.G.

The state produced a single witness, Patricia Tomson, at the hearing on this matter. Tomson testified that, in her expert opinion, it would be traumatic for all four- or five-year-old children to testify in front of their abuser. She also testified that, based on part of a study she had read, she thought it was less likely that children would tell the truth in front of their accusers. She also concluded that based on the children's "anxiousness," testifying in front of the defendant would be "very traumatic and I'm not sure either child would talk." (Evidentiary Hr'g Tr. at 16.)

With regard to N.P., Tomson's specificity supports her conclusion that it would be traumatic for N.P. to talk in front of Lomholt. N.P. had been treated by Tomson for some time, and she specifically told Tomson that she "is frightened of Mark [Lomholt] .... She has said that she is. She doesn't want to see him. Her words are, I want him to stand in a corner for a long, long time." (Id. at 15.) Tomson also observed that N.P. would divert attention from talking about the abuse, and would draw pictures that Tomson interpreted to show a feeling of powerlessness and lack of family support.

The evidence did not support such a conclusion for B.G. Tomson testified that she only saw B.G. for a total of three or four weeks, and had not seen B.G. for nearly six weeks before the hearing. She stated that when she first saw B.G., B.G. would become anxious when talking about the abuse and would wet her pants. Tomson went on to testify that Lomholt was B.G.'s uncle, and that B.G. may not be truthful in front of him for fear of getting him in trouble. B.G. had told Tomson that thinking about Lomholt made her feel "sad and tired." (Id. at 7.) Notably, when asked specifically if B.G. was frightened of Lomholt, Tomson stated B.G. "had a relationship with [Lomholt]. He was her care giver. So I'm not certain she's frightened of him." (Id. at 15.) She reiterated on cross-examination that she did not believe B.G. was scared of Lomholt, but that "[i]t's very hard for people to testify in front of anyone they have a relationship with." (Id. at 23.) On re-direct, when asked if B.G. had indicated indirectly that she was afraid of Lomholt, Tomson stated that she interpreted B.G.'s drawings to be "more indication ... of shame about talking about the abuse than of [Lomholt] himself." (Id. at 24.) Because B.G. had discontinued treatment with Tomson six weeks prior to the hearing, Tomson conceded that she did not know

B.G.'s current mental state.

Tomson's testimony that any four- or five-year-old would be traumatized by testifying in front of their abuser does not satisfy the Supreme Court's requirements for permitting child witnesses to testify via closed circuit television. Craig mandates that the inquiry must be case-specific: The government must show that this particular child, B.G., would be traumatized because of the defendant's presence. Craig, 497 U.S. at 855, 858, 110 S.Ct. 3157.

As to the rest of the government's evidence, Tomson testified that B.G. was ashamed of her abuse, and was anxious when talking about it. This is different from being harmed by the defendant's presence in court. Despite several attempts to elicit such testimony, the government could not adduce evidence that B.G. was scared of Lomholt. Other than Tomson's general statements regarding all children, the government also failed to elicit specific evidence that B.G. would be traumatized by Lomholt's presence at trial. Under the governing law of Craig, I believe that allowing B.G. to testify by closed circuit television violated Lomholt's Confrontation Clause rights.[FN4]

> FN4. Although the majority notes that Lomholt failed to rebut Tomson's testimony, he is not required to do so. As the Craig court made clear, the state bears the burden of proof in these matters. Craig, 497 U.S. at 855, 110 S.Ct. 3157. Generalized and conclusory statements from a person who had known the victim for only three or four weeks and had not spoken to the victim for six weeks prior to the hearing is not sufficient to carry the day. Therefore, Lomholt was under no obligation to produce contrary evidence, as the majority suggests.

After finding a violation of Lomholt's constitutional right to confront his accuser, the next question is if any relief is warranted. See Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673, 681-82, 106 S.Ct. 1431, 89 L.Ed.2d 674 (1986) (holding Confrontation Clause violations are subject to a harmless error inquiry). The proper analysis on remand would be to completely exclude the child witness's testimony, and consider the strength of the remaining evidence against the defendant. Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012, 1021-22, 108 S.Ct. 2798, 101 L.Ed.2d 857 (1988).

Without B.G.'s testimony, I do not believe there is sufficient evidence to sustain a conviction with regard to her. Lomholt confessed, but he then recanted. Under Iowa law, "[t]he confession of the defendant, unless made in open court, will not warrant a conviction, unless accompanied with other proof that the defendant committed the offense." Iowa Code § 813.2, Rule 20(4). The majority of the remaining evidence appears to be the testimony B.G., or hearsay testimony of the children's mothers, recounting what the children had told them. Excluding all of this testimony, as we are required to do, it does not appear there is enough remaining evidence to convict Lomholt with respect to B.G. Accordingly, I would grant Lomholt's petition as to that conviction.

Attorney for Petitioner

The Opinion of the Court was delivered PER CURIAM.
JUSTICE STARCHER concurs and reserves the right to file a concurring opinion.

1. "Prohibition lies only to restrain inferior courts from proceeding in causes over which they have no jurisdiction, or, in which, having jurisdiction, they are exceeding their legitimate powers and may not be used as a substitute for [a petition for appeal] or certiorari." Syllabus Point 1, Crawford v. Taylor, 138 W.Va. 207, 75 S.E.2d 370 (1953).

2. "In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight." Syllabus Point 4, State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W.Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996).

3. "A writ of mandamus will not issue unless three elements coexist--(1) a clear legal right in the petitioner to the relief sought; (2) a legal duty on the part of respondent to do the thing which the petitioner seeks to compel; and (3) the absence of another adequate remedy." Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. Kucera v. City of Wheeling, 153 W.Va. 538, 170 S.E.2d 367 (1969).

4. "A civil child abuse and neglect petition instituted by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources pursuant to Code, 49-6-1 et seq., is not subject to dismissal pursuant to the terms of a plea bargain between a county prosecutor and a criminal defendant in a related child abuse prosecution." Syllabus Point 2, In the Matter of Taylor B., 201 W.Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997).

Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon a petition for a writ of prohibition and/or writ of mandamus filed by the petitioner, Nathaniel Lowe, against the respondents, the Honorable David W. Knight, Judge of the Circuit Court of Mercer County, West Virginia, and William Sadler, the Prosecuting Attorney for Mercer County. The petitioner seeks to prohibit the respondents from prosecuting him on a fifteen-count indictment charging him with sexual abuse and assault of his stepchildren. The petitioner contends that he cannot be prosecuted because of a plea agreement he entered into with the State in a prior abuse and neglect proceeding. We issued a rule to show cause, and now, for the reasons set forth below, deny the writ.[1]

I.

[1]We are troubled by the State's failure to file a response to the rule to show cause and failure to appear at the oral argument of this matter on October 3, 2000. Pursuant to Rule 10 of the Rules of Appellate Procedure, "[t]he failure to file a brief in accordance with this rule may result in the Supreme Court imposing the following sanctions: refusal to hear the case, denying oral argument to the derelict party, dismissal of the case from the docket, or such other sanctions as the Court may deem appropriate." Moreover, "[w]ithout the appearance and statement of the law required of the State, justice cannot be done in our adversary system." State v. Moore, 166 W.Va. 97, 112, 273 S.E.2d 821, 831 (1980).

On May 8, 1997, an abuse and neglect proceeding was instituted by the State, naming the petitioner as one of the respondent parents alleged to have abused and/or neglected the petitioner's son and stepchildren. After investigating the allegations, the State reached an agreement with the petitioner whereby the petitioner consented to the termination of his parental rights to his child, and in exchange, the State agreed to limit future criminal prosecution of the petitioner to one count of child abuse resulting in injury as set forth in W.Va. Code § 61-8D-3(a) (1996). The agreement was presented to the circuit court on August 7, 1997, and was incorporated by reference within the parental rights termination order entered on August 27, 1997, in the abuse and neglect proceeding. Thereafter, the petitioner pled guilty to one count of child abuse resulting in injury and was sentenced to an indeterminate term of not less than one nor more than five years imprisonment.

Subsequently, a Mercer County grand jury returned a fifteen-count indictment against the petitioner charging him with sexual abuse in the first degree, sexual abuse by a custodian, child abuse by a custodian, child abuse by a custodian resulting in injury, sexual assault in the first degree, and malicious assault. The indictment which was returned on February 15, 2000, named the petitioner's stepchildren as the victims. On March 15, 2000, the petitioner, by counsel, filed a motion to dismiss the indictment based on the plea agreement limiting potential criminal prosecution entered in the abuse and neglect proceeding. In response, the State asserted that the indictment was proper because at the time the agreement was made, the State was unaware of the facts which constituted the basis for the indictment. Thereafter, the circuit court denied the motion to dismiss.

The petitioner renewed his motion to dismiss on June 2, 2000, and submitted to the circuit court more than 1,600 pages of discovery he received from the State during the abuse and neglect proceeding. The petitioner argued that these documents showed that the State was aware of the facts which constituted the basis for the fifteen-count indictment at the time it entered into the agreement. Again, the circuit court denied the motion to dismiss, and set the matter for trial. The petitioner then filed this petition for a writ of prohibition and/or a writ of mandamus with this Court.

II.

We begin by noting that "[p]rohibition lies only to restrain inferior courts from proceeding in causes over which they have no jurisdiction, or, in which, having jurisdiction, they are exceeding their legitimate powers and may not be used as a substitute for [a petition for appeal] or certiorari." Syllabus Point 1, Crawford v. Taylor, 138 W.Va. 207, 75 S.E.2d 370 (1953).

> In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight.

Syllabus Point 4, State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W.Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996). By contrast, "[a] writ of mandamus will not issue unless three elements coexist--(1) a clear legal right in the petitioner to the relief sought; (2) a legal duty on the part of respondent to do the thing which the petitioner seeks to compel; and (3) the absence of another adequate remedy." Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. Kucera v. City of Wheeling, 153 W.Va. 538, 170 S.E.2d 367 (1969).

In this case, the petitioner contends that the plea agreement he made with the prosecutor during the abuse and neglect proceeding prevents his prosecution on the charges set forth in the indictment. We disagree because we find that the plea agreement between the petitioner and the State is void as a matter of public policy. The agreement limiting potential prosecution of the petitioner provided, in pertinent part,

> This Agreement is strictly understood to include any and all parental rights to my said child, and to include my acceptance of the State of West Virginia's offer to limit any potential prosecution arising from any allegations or potential allegations related to the instant abuse and neglect proceeding or any other conduct or activity involving my relationship to Nathaniel G. Lowe [sic - petitioner's son of same name] or any of the other children [petitioner's stepchildren] named in the instant abuse and neglect proceeding.
> In exchange for the voluntary relinquishment and consensual termination of my parental rights it is understood and agreed that the State of West Virginia will limit its potential criminal prosecution against me to one count of child abuse resulting in injury under W.Va. Code §61-8D-3(a).

In In the Matter of Taylor B., 201 W.Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997), this Court determined that such plea agreements are invalid. In Taylor B., the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") appealed a decision of the Circuit Court of Tucker County concluding that termination of parental rights was not warranted in an abuse and neglect proceeding involving a child that suffered injuries consistent with shaken baby syndrome. In response to the petition for appeal, James B., the appellee, asserted that the abuse and neglect petition filed against him and the child's mother should have been dismissed as part of his nolo contendre plea to the misdemeanor offense of presenting false information to attending medical personnel. According to James B., he entered into a plea agreement with the prosecutor whereby he agreed to enter a no contest plea to this misdemeanor charge, and the State promised to terminate the abuse and neglect proceeding. The circuit court refused to accept the plea agreement, but ultimately concluded that the evidence did not support a termination of James B.'s parental rights.

In considering James B.'s contention that the abuse and neglect proceeding should have been terminated as part of his plea agreement, this Court again recognized the dual role of prosecutors in civil/criminal abuse and neglect cases and explained that,

> "In civil abuse and neglect cases, the legislature has made DHHR the State's representative. In litigations that are conducted under State civil abuse and neglect statutes, DHHR is the client of county prosecutors. The legislature has specifically indicated through Code, 49-6-10 that prosecutors must cooperate with DHHR's efforts to pursue civil abuse and neglect actions. The relationship between DHHR and county prosecutors under the statute is a pure attorney-client relationship. The legislature has not given authority to county prosecutors to litigate civil abuse and neglect actions independent of DHHR. Such authority is granted to prosecutors > only under State criminal abuse and neglect statutes. Therefore, all of the legal and ethical principles that govern the attorney-client relationship in general, are applicable to the relationship that exists between DHHR and county prosecutors in civil abuse and neglect proceedings." Syl. pt. 4, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997).

Syllabus Point 1, Taylor B. In this context, this Court concluded that the circuit court's refusal to dismiss the abuse and neglect petition against James B. and the child's mother pursuant to the plea agreement was proper. In reaching this conclusion, this Court held in Syllabus Point 2 of Taylor B.:

> A civil child abuse and neglect petition instituted by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources pursuant to Code, 49-6-1 et seq., is not subject to dismissal pursuant to the terms of a plea bargain between a county prosecutor and a criminal defendant in a related child abuse prosecution.

Although the plea agreement in this case resulted in the relinquishment of the petitioner's parental rights as opposed to dismissal of the abuse and neglect petition, the agreement is nevertheless void. As we stated in Taylor B., "civil abuse and neglect proceedings focus directly upon the safety and well-being of the child and are not simply 'companion cases' to criminal prosecutions." 201 W.Va. at 66, 491 S.E.2d at 613. While the actions of the prosecutor in this case may not have been adverse to the interests of the DHHR, it is simply against public policy for the prosecutor to threaten criminal prosecution in a civil abuse and neglect case.

Moreover, an agreement terminating parental rights is only valid if it is entered into in circumstances free of duress. W.Va. Code § 49-6-7 (1977) provides that, "[a]n agreement of a natural parent in termination of parental rights shall be valid if made by a duly acknowledged writing, and entered into under circumstances free from duress and fraud." When an agreement to terminate parental rights is made within the context of criminal proceedings and specifically conditions the dismissal of certain criminal charges on the relinquishment of parental rights, it can never be "free of duress" as required by this statute.

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, we find that the plea agreement in the underlying case is void as a matter of public policy. Therefore, the petitioner's request for a writ of prohibition and/or a writ of mandamus is denied.

Writ denied.

Starcher, J., concurring:

I concur with the result of the majority opinion -- because, as the majority holds, prosecutors should not threaten criminal prosecution to get people to give up custody of their children.

However, I am concerned that this particular defendant may have suffered prejudice in his criminal case, as a result of his good-faith reliance upon the custody agreement. Upon remand, the circuit judge should be certain that nothing that the state obtained, by virtue of the invalidated custody agreement, is used against the defendant in any criminal case.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "In reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review applies. The final order and ultimate disposition are reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard, and the circuit court's underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard. Benjamin, Justice:

The instant action is before the Court upon the appeal of Petitioners Leslie S. and Samuel S. from a disposition order entered October 27, 2014, denying the Petitioners' motions for improvement periods and terminating their parental and custodial rights.[1] The circuit court found that the Petitioners could not correct the conditions of abuse and neglect in the near future and termination was necessary for the children's welfare. Upon review of the parties' arguments, the record before us on appeal, and applicable legal precedent, we affirm the circuit court's order.

I. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

The Department of Health and Human Resources ("the DHHR") filed an abuse and neglect petition alleging that the Petitioners were arrested on February 1, 2014, for committing domestic battery and domestic assault against their son, C.S., at a youth basketball league game in the presence of numerous witnesses.[2] According to the petition, the Petitioners cursed at C.S., calling him a "son of a bitch" and "mother fucker" and physically abused him by pulling him, slinging him into a wall, grabbing his face, and knocking his head into a door multiple times. During the incident, C.S. was crying profusely and trying to escape from the Petitioners. Witnesses called law enforcement, and the Petitioners were arrested for domestic battery and assault.

[1] Because this case involves minors, initials are used to identify individuals in accordance with Rule of Appellate Procedure 40(e).

[2] Petitioner Leslie S. is the biological mother of all four children involved in this case. Samuel S. is the biological father of C.S., age 11, and the step-father of the other children, all teenage boys. The children have lived in the family home located in Spencer, West Virginia, since moving from the state of Florida approximately six years ago. The two older boys, M.M., age 18, and B.M., age 17, have had no contact with their biological father, M.M., Sr., for many years. C.Z., age 15, has had only limited personal contact with his biological father, Max Z., since the family moved from Florida.

The DHHR was notified of the incident and it began an investigation. A protection plan was put into place during the investigation, which allowed all four of the children to stay with a family who had been present during the incident and were affiliated with the church and the basketball league. The children were removed from the Petitioners' home by emergency ratification and a petition alleging abuse and neglect was filed on February 13, 2014.[3] However, the petition failed to allege facts constituting imminent danger. A Multidisciplinary Treatment Team ("MDT") immediately convened and the parents originally agreed to allow the children to remain with the placement family until after the initial court appearance. The Petitioners subsequently changed their minds and all of the children, except C.S., were required to return home. C.S. stayed with the placement family because a condition of the Petitioners' bonds did not allow contact with him. The Petitioners were subsequently convicted of misdemeanor criminal charges relating to the case.

[3] The petition also contained allegations against the biological fathers of M.M., B.M. and C.Z. as well; however, as their rights are not at issue in this appeal, the facts herein pertain only to the Petitioners. The circuit court's October 27, 2014, order terminated the parental rights of M.M. and B.M.'s biological father for abandonment. C.Z.'s biological father remains involved in the abuse and neglect case.

The circuit court held an adjudicatory hearing on the DHHR's petition on March 10, 2014. Both M.M. and B.M. testified in camera regarding the abuse and neglect they suffered at the hands of the Petitioners and the circuit court concluded that the children were in imminent danger of further emotional abuse and ordered that the remaining three children be removed from the home.[4] The circuit court granted the DHHR custody of the children and they were placed in foster care. The Petitioners waived their right to a preliminary hearing on the removal and the circuit court granted the Petitioners supervised visitation with C.S. and C.Z.

At a subsequent hearing on April 22, 2014, Petitioner Samuel S. admitted to the allegations of abuse and neglect contained in the DHHR's petition. Specifically, he admitted that he verbally abused C.S. at the basketball game, that he has disciplined the [4] Both M.M. and B.M. originally testified at an in camera hearing that neither wanted to return home because of the abuse they endured. They testified that if they were required to return home, both would leave the home as soon as they turned eighteen. B.M. has been steadfast in his desire to have nothing to do with the Petitioners, refusing visitation opportunities with them during the pendency of this case. He has expressed multiple times that he would be fine with termination of parental rights. In her testimony, Leslie S. admitted that she would be willing to give up her custodial rights to B.M., and that he should not be forced to return home. She expressed that she hoped he would one day change his mind, and did not want to "close the door" on that possibility.

children by requiring them to stand in the corner for hours at a time, that he curses at the children, and that he and Petitioner Leslie S. yell and curse at each other in the children's presence.

Following that hearing, the children have been moved to multiple foster homes located in different counties.[5] The guardian ad litem reports that M.M., who has turned eighteen and is no longer subject to the jurisdiction of the circuit court, has recently moved back in with the Petitioners.[6] The three younger boys remain in foster care in two different counties. B.M. and C.Z., who have been in a total of four foster homes since the case commenced in March 2014, were placed in a foster home together in January 2015 and they have been adjusting well. B.M. is a straight A student and athlete, and C.Z., who previously struggled in school, is now an A/B student in high school.

C.S., the youngest child, is currently in a new foster home in a different county, his eighth placement in the last nineteen months. C.S. has had a number of inpatient hospitalizations for emotional issues. According to the guardian ad litem, C.S.'s

[5] The DHHR represents that it was difficult to find foster home placements for the children within their home county. The DHHR also states that it was unable to find a suitable foster placement that could accommodate all four children together.

[6] The guardian ad litem represented that M.M. has recently moved back into the family home with his pregnant girlfriend. She reports that although M.M. is a bright young man, he has chosen not to further his education or seek employment at this time.

new specialized foster home appears to be a good fit for him, as his foster parents seem to have a good understanding of C.S.'s emotional problems. The boys' foster families have agreed to facilitate monthly visitation between them.

Pursuant to the request of the guardian ad litem, the Petitioners underwent psychological evaluations at Saar Psychological Services in August 2014 in order to determine parental fitness and what terms and conditions would be required to remedy any concerns raised in the evaluation if an improvement period were to be granted. The evaluations took an inordinate amount of time to complete, taking several hours over the course of two days. In the evaluations, Leslie S.'s prognosis was "guarded" and Sam S.'s prognosis was "very guarded."

On September 5, 2014, the circuit court conducted the first of two evidentiary hearings regarding the Petitioners' motions for improvement periods. The guardian ad item filed her report in which she indicated that she had "very mixed feelings about whether an improvement period should be granted to [the Petitioners]. However, [she was] leaning against it." The DHHR filed its case plan recommending that the circuit court grant the Petitioners an improvement period. At the beginning of the hearing, the circuit court clarified whether there was an objection to the Petitioners receiving an improvement period, to which the guardian ad litem responded "yes." Counsel for the Petitioner Leslie S. indicated that she was aware that the guardian ad litem might oppose an improvement period and that they were prepared to proceed with an evidentiary hearing. The circuit court then heard testimony regarding whether the Petitioners should be granted an improvement period or if their parental rights should be terminated.

According to the evidence presented during the evidentiary hearing, Leslie S. admitted that she mentally and emotionally abused her children and that she had begun services with therapist Susan Greathouse and parent educator Lora Davis to correct the abuse. She testified that she would be willing to give up her custodial rights to B.M. and that she would do anything asked of her to rectify the conditions of abuse and neglect. She testified that she would like C.S. to come home, but that he still needs a lot of help and that he is not ready to come home.

The circuit court heard testimony that Leslie S. was involved in a previous incident at the Spencer City Pool in 2012, where she was accused of physically assaulting M.M. Instead of filing a petition, the DHHR arranged for in-home services through Children's First, which occurred once weekly from August 2012 through February 2013. These services were designed to remedy that situation, which is substantially similar to the circumstances of the instant case. The records admitted into evidence show that significant effort on the part of the service provider was undertaken to deal with many major family problems, but that, by the end of the services, little if any progress had been made by the Petitioners. The record reflects that the services ended, not because the problems were solved, but because the provider had used up all of the allotted time. When asked what she learned from her months of services in 2012, Leslie S. responded, "I didn't really learn nothing."

The circuit court also heard testimony that the children were previously removed from Leslie S.'s custody while living in Florida after she was found to have failed to protect them from her ex-husband, Max Z.'s abuse. The children resided with Leslie S.'s mother for a period of approximately five years. Leslie S. received parenting classes during that court process as well. After her mother died, Leslie S. returned to court in Florida and was awarded custody of her children. Evidence was also presented that Leslie S. receives disability benefits and does not work outside the home. She is prescribed multiple medications and spends a significant amount of time in bed, virtually unable to function.

There was also evidence presented that Samuel S., also a recipient of disability benefits, is likewise prescribed multiple medications. His treating family physician, Dr. Carroll Christiansen, testified that Samuel S. has a psychiatric diagnosis of Bipolar I and an adjustment disorder with depressed mood, in addition to several other medical issues related to back pain, hypertension, diabetes, and heart disease. He has a prior felony record involving witness tampering.

Testimony continued at a second hearing conducted on September 17, 2014. During this hearing, Petitioner Samuel S. testified that he was working on anger control problems with therapist Susan Greathouse. Although Samuel S. testified that he has learned to use "I-messages" to improve his communication thanks to his therapist, Susan Greathouse was not called to testify at the hearing. He also testified that Lora Davis, parent educator, provided services to help him communicate better. He testified that he needed to correct his attitude, anger management, and that he needed to communicate better.

Lora Davis, who worked with this family on a weekly basis for five months, testified that in her eight years of working with Family Advantage, this family is one of the most challenging. She reports that after months of working with them, the Petitioners have made only minimal progress. She explained that her efforts to explain the basic course material have been continuously met with resistance from the Petitioners, particularly Samuel S. She opined that Samuel S. needs anger management, and that both parties need a psychiatric consultation to determine whether their medications are effectively treating their mental conditions. She stated that if the children were to return home at this point, the situation would be "absolutely the same."

Jennifer Bogar, the therapist for M.M., B.M., and C.Z. also testified. She testified that M.M. wanted to return to the Petitioners' home and to his school of origin, but she opined that this desire was probably influenced more by wanting to return to his school. She testified that she had reservations about M.M. returning to the Petitioners' home and that he may become emotionally unstable if he returned. In regards to B.M., Ms. Bogar testified that he does not want to return to the Petitioners' home, that he declined every opportunity for visitation with the Petitioners, and that he believes the cycle of behavior will continue if he returns to the Petitioners' home. With respect to C.Z., Ms. Bogar testified that he wants to return to the Petitioners' home but has concerns that the situation may not be as good as the Petitioners promised him it would be. Ms. Bogar testified that she was concerned that the Petitioners' home would continue to be detrimental for C.Z. without additional services, despite Samuel S.'s testimony that he has changed.

Finally, Child Protective Services worker Jerry Burge testified regarding the DHHR's recommendations for the Petitioners. Mr. Burge testified that the DHHR recommended an improvement period for the Petitioners and had developed a case plan with terms and conditions that had been reviewed by all the parties. However, Mr. Burge also testified that the Petitioners did not benefit from the six months of services they received in 2012 to address the same issues as presented in this case. He further testified that he has worked with the family off and on for the past two years and that he has not seen many changes in the Petitioners' behaviors.

Following these two evidentiary hearings, the circuit court entered a dispositional order on October 27, 2014. The circuit court found that from August 2012 through February 2013, the Petitioners received services designed to remedy the same abusive and neglectful behaviors that they exhibited in this case. The circuit court found that by the end of those services, "little, if any, progress had been made by [the Petitioners]." The circuit court explained that the goal of the previously offered services was to prevent further abuse and neglect, but the mechanisms taught, "simply did not work and another one of the children was injured." The circuit court also stated that the Petitioners had been provided services in this case for approximately the length of an improvement period with little progress.

In determining to deny the Petitioners an improvement period and to terminate the parental and custodial rights, the circuit court explained, > [t]he fact is that [the Petitioners] have been involved with the service providers for two stints, without progress, and despite education in appropriate parenting skills, [C.S.], their youngest son, was physically assaulted in front of a myriad of witnesses. Simply put, these adult respondents have not responded to or followed through with rehabilitative efforts of social and other rehabilitative agencies designed to reduce or prevent the abuse or neglect of the children, as evidenced by the continuation of conditions which threatened the health, welfare or life of their children.

The circuit court found that the degree of family stress and the potential for further abuse and neglect are so great as to preclude the use of resources to mitigate or resolve family problems or assist the abusing parent or parents in fulfilling their responsibilities to the children. The circuit court concluded that continuation in the Petitioners' home was not in the best interests of the children. In addressing Petitioner Leslie S.'s rights to M.M., B.M., and C.Z., who are all children fourteen years or older, the circuit court considered their wishes and ruled accordingly. Petitioner Leslie S.'s custodial rights were terminated only to M.M. and C.Z., because they did not desire that her full parental rights be permanently terminated. Upon B.M.'s request, Petitioner Leslie S.'s full parental rights to him were terminated. C.S., ten years old at the time, was too young to have his wishes considered, but the court ordered termination of all parental rights as to C.S. as well. It is from this order that the Petitioners now appeal.

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court has held that

> [i]n reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review applies. The final order and ultimate disposition are reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard, and the circuit court's underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to a de novo review.

Syl. Pt. 2, Walker v. W.Va. Ethics Comm'n, 201 W. Va. 108, 492 S.E.2d 167 (1997).

As it pertains specifically to abuse and neglect cases, this Court has held,

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). With these standards in mind, we now turn to the issues before us.

III. ANALYSIS

The first issue before us is whether the circuit court erred in its consideration of the Petitioners' performance in pre-disposition services when it denied the requested improvement periods. We also consider a second issue of whether the circuit court erred in denying the Petitioners' post-adjudication improvement periods where, to the contrary, the DHHR's initial case plan recommended that improvement periods be granted.

With respect to the first issue before us, the Petitioners argue because of their positive performance in pre-disposition services, the circuit court erred by denying them improvement periods. The Petitioners contend that they admitted their problems, which they claim are "easily correctable," and that they testified to their willingness to work towards that improvement of those problems. Therefore, the Petitioners claim that they met their burden to prove by clear and convincing evidence that they are "likely to fully participate in the improvement period[s]," as required by this Court's extensive case law and the improvement-period statute, West Virginia Code § 49-6-12 (1996). They claim that their therapist, Susan Greathouse, believes there has been a recent breakthrough and that she recommended that the improvement period go forward.[7] The Petitioners claim that although there was a petition detailing their problems, they had no means of relating the services to the correction of the problems because they had no case plan or "road map" to guide them.

The DHHR responds that although it originally recommended that the Petitioners be granted an improvement period at the dispositional hearing, it cannot now say that the circuit court abused its discretion because the Petitioners have not demonstrated any change in their abusive behaviors after participating in services. The DHHR argues that despite the Petitioners' argument that they are willing to participate in services, the Petitioners' attitudes toward parenting have not changed during their participation in services to this point. The DHHR asserts that although the Petitioners did not get a formal improvement period, they did receive services for a substantial period of time prior to the plan being filed, and they did have a service provider who testified to their "minimal progress." The DHHR also notes that the Petitioners previously had services in 2012 due to a similar incident of domestic violence toward the oldest son, M.M. The DHHR maintains that the circuit court did not err in denying the motions for improvement periods, as they are not automatically entitled to such, given the facts of this case.

The guardian ad litem likewise argues that no error occurred. The guardian ad litem contends that the Petitioners are not entitled to improvement periods, and their history of services without change demonstrates that the circuit court was correct to conclude that the Petitioners were not likely to participate in services now that would amount to parental improvement. In addition to their current "minimal progress" and 2012 domestic violence incident toward the oldest son, M.M., the circuit court also heard evidence that Petitioner Leslie S. lost custody of her children in Florida for five years due to a domestic incident there in the early 2000s. The guardian ad litem also asserts that Lora Davis, parent educator, provided testimony about her interactions with the Petitioners, including incidents where she believed that Leslie S. was either intoxicated or over-medicated and incidents demonstrative of Samuel S.'s anger issues. Her conclusion was that despite many months of service, minimal progress, if any, was made in addressing the problems as she had to "explain things over and over again." She also indicated that there did not appear to be a genuine willingness to charge on the part of Samuel S.

West Virginia law allows the circuit court discretion in deciding whether to grant a parent an improvement period. This Court has emphatically stated that "[b]oth statutory and case law emphasize that a parent charged with abuse and/or neglect is not unconditionally entitled to an improvement period. Where an improvement period would jeopardize the best interests of the child, for instance, an improvement period will not be granted." In re Charity H., 215 W. Va. 208, 216, 599 S.E.2d 631, 639 (2004). The parents bear the burden at the disposition stage to show that they should be granted the opportunity to remedy the circumstances that led to the filing of the abuse and neglect petition. West Virginia Code § 49-6-12(b) states, in pertinent part, that the circuit court may grant a respondent parent an improvement period if "[t]he respondent demonstrates, by clear and convincing evidence, that the respondent is likely to fully participate in the improvement period[.]" This Court has also held that in order to receive an improvement period, the parent must acknowledge that the children have been abused and neglected. In re Kaitlyn P., 225 W. Va. 123, 126, 690 S.E.2d 131, 134 (2010).

As this Court has explained, it is possible for an individual to show "compliance with specific aspects of the case plan" while failing "to improve . . . [t]he overall attitude and approach to parenting." W. Va. Dept. of Human Serv. v. Peggy F., 184 W. Va. 60, 64, 399 S.E.2d 460, 464 (1990). Fully participating in an improvement period necessarily requires implementing the parenting skills that are being taught through services. There is "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of abuse and neglect can be corrected" if > the abusing parent or parents have not responded to or followed through with a reasonable family case plan or other rehabilitative efforts of social, medical, mental health or other rehabilitative agencies designed to reduce or prevent the abuse or neglect of the child, as evidenced by the continuation of insubstantial diminution of conditions which threatened the health, welfare or life of the child.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(b)(3) (2002) (Emphasis added).

We conclude that the circuit court did not err in denying the Petitioners' motions for improvement periods. The circuit court's order lists its consideration of several very relevant factors for its conclusion that the abusive situation was not easily correctable: 1) the history of past abuse of the children; 2) the testimony of both older boys detailing the major dysfunctional relationships and chaotic life at home; 3) the parent educator's testimony; 4) the psychological evaluations of the parents showed that the mother had a "guarded" prognosis and the step-father had a "very guarded" prognosis; and 5) the testimony of both the Petitioners, which allowed the Court to evaluate their credibility. The records from the 2012 services that the Petitioners received were admitted as evidence. They show that the services were provided to help the Petitioners develop "appropriate parenting and disciplinary techniques due to inappropriate disciplinary techniques and possible mental health issues in the home." A review of the records in their totality demonstrates that the services were addressing the Petitioners' verbal and emotional abuse of the children, verbal altercations between the Petitioners, the Petitioners' favoritism of C.S., and Leslie S.'s inability to properly parent her children or function. These are the same issues of abuse and neglect to which the Petitioners admitted in this case.

In its dispositional order, the circuit court noted that the Petitioners > received in-home services, including parenting and adult life skills, for several months from Children's First, beginning in August, 2012. These services were arranged by DHHR, as a reasonable effort to prevent removal, after a prior incident involving [Leslie S.'s] physical abuse of [M.M.] Notwithstanding that the services had a goal of preventing this kind of abuse, not quite a year after the services ended did the same sort of physically abusive conduct happen with [C.S.] Moreover, a review of the Children's First records show that many of the problems identified by Lora Davis and those also reported in the psychological evaluations were present at the time Children's First worked with [the Petitioners], and the services were designed to address these problems and offer solutions. The whole goal of the Children's First services was to reduce and prevent further abuse of the children in the future by [the Petitioners], and prevent removal of the children from the home. Unfortunately, those mechanisms which should have been in place to prevent further abuse simply did not work and > another one of the children was injured, and these petitions were filed.

Taking all of this evidence into consideration, we conclude that the circuit court made a proper determination that the abusive situation was not easily correctable and was unlikely to improve. Accordingly, we affirm the circuit court's ruling on this basis.

Next, the Petitioners argue that the circuit court erred in failing to follow Rule 34 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and this Court's opinions in In re Ashton M., 228 W.Va. 584, 723 S.E.2d 409 (2012) and In re Edward B., 210 W.Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001) by terminating their parental rights when the DHHR's case plan recommended improvement periods.[8] The Petitioners argue that under Rule 34, the circuit court should have 1) objected to the case plan, 2) ordered the DHHR and MDT to change the case plan, and 3) ordered another dispositional hearing to allow the parties an opportunity to refuse the lower court's findings. The Petitioners argue that this case is very similar to Ashton M., in which a circuit court failed to follow the DHHR's recommendation in the case plan, and this Court held that the circuit court implicitly rejected that case plan under Rule 34 thereby requiring the scheduling of another dispositional hearing. 228 W.Va. 584, 723 S.E.2d 409. The Petitioners argue that failure to follow Rule 34's requirement to schedule another dispositional hearing for the DHHR to revise its case plan was reversible error.

[8] Rule 34 of the W. Va. Rules of Procedure for Abuse and Neglect Proceedings addresses the circuit court's options in ruling on objections to a child's case plan that are raised at the dispositional hearing. If an objection is raised at the disposition hearing, the rule directs the circuit court to > [e]nter an order (a) Approving the plan; (b) Ordering compliance with all or part of the plan; (c) Modifying the plan in accordance with the evidence presented at the hearing; or (d) Rejecting the plan and ordering the Department to submit a revised plan within thirty (30) days. If the court rejects the child's case plan, the court shall schedule another disposition hearing within forty-five (45) days.

Conversely, the DHHR argues that Ashton M. and Edward B. are entirely distinguishable from the instant case because, in those cases, the parents did not know that the case plan would be challenged prior to the dispositional hearing. In Ashton M., the DHHR filed a case plan recommending termination of only the mother's custodial rights and all parties were in agreement with that. 228 W.Va. 584, 723 S.E.2d 409. The mother and her counsel did not know the agreed case plan would be challenged until the circuit court, sua sponte during the dispositional hearing, suggested that termination of all parental rights, rather than just custodial rights, would serve the child's best interests. Id at 587, 723 S.E.2d at 412. The mother's counsel objected saying the mother was not prepared to present witnesses to address the termination of all parental rights because she had relied on the agreement reached between the parties. Id. at 588, 723 S.E.2d at 413.

Thus, this Court determined that the circuit court committed reversible error in failing to follow Rule 34(d) and set a new dispositional hearing. Id. at 591, 723 S.E.2d at 416. The DHHR argues that similarly, in Edward B., this Court held that the circuit court erred in failing to set a new dispositional hearing to allow the parties to present evidence of termination when it rejected the agreed case plan recommending an improvement period because there was no indication before the dispositional hearing that the case plan would be contested. 210 W. Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620. To the contrary, the DHHR contends that the Petitioners here knew that the guardian ad litem might object to improvement periods, and the guardian ad litem did in fact object.

We agree with the DHHR and find that the above noted cases are distinguishable from the instant case. In the case sub judice, unlike Ashley M. and Edward B., Petitioners knew before the dispositional hearings began that the guardian ad litem herein might not agree with their motions for improvement periods. At the first dispositional hearing on September 5, 2014, Petitioner Leslie S.'s counsel discussed the purpose of the hearing with the circuit court and noted that "I know the Department's recommendation was, before at the MDT, that [it was] going to recommend an improvement period. I think the only one still up in the air is the guardian. And I am willing to put my client on to testify as to the services she's already started." The circuit court then inquired as to whether there was an objection to the Petitioners' motions for an improvement period, to which the guardian ad litem responded, "yes." Thus, in this case, the Petitioners were aware prior to the hearing that the guardian ad litem might not be in agreement with their request for an improvement period, and the record is clear that because of that knowledge, the Petitioners were prepared to present their evidence regarding their motions.

Further, the circuit court permitted the Petitioners a full opportunity to present evidence at not one, but two, different evidentiary hearings where the parties had full notice of the issues to be considered by the circuit court and a full opportunity to present witnesses and to be heard regarding whether improvement periods should be granted or whether another disposition would be required. Furthermore, the record is also devoid of any objection by the Petitioners to either proceeding with the hearings or to the circuit court's request for proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law. Finally, the Petitioners do not now contend that they had additional witnesses or evidence to present or that they were prohibited from doing so.

In syllabus point five of In re Edward B., this Court held that,

> [w]here it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order.

210 W.Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (Emphasis added). Based upon the set of facts before us, we conclude that in this particular case, the circuit court order did not substantially disregard or frustrate the disposition process recommendation as required by our holding in In re Edward B.

Our holding today comports with our long-standing jurisprudence that, while "[a]s a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 (1977) will be employed; . . . courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened[.]" Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980). Indeed,

> '"[t]ermination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code, 49–6–5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code, 49–6–5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).' Syllabus point 4, In re Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989).

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

The evidence presented at the evidentiary hearings clearly supports the circuit court's determination that there was no reasonable likelihood that the Petitioners could correct the conditions of abuse and neglect because they did not respond to rehabilitative efforts to correct the conditions of abuse and neglect and because the emotional abuse perpetrated on their children created a degree of family stress and potential for further abuse which precluded the use of further resources to resolve the family's problems. Based upon the evidence presented, we conclude that the circuit court did not err in terminating the Petitioners' parental and custodial rights.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we affirm the October 27, 2014, order of the Circuit Court of Roane County. It is further ordered that the mandate of this Court be issued forthwith.

Affirmed.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Per Curiam:

The respondent below and appellant herein, Martha T. (hereinafter "Martha" or "mother"),[1] appeals from an order entered April 16, 2008, by the Circuit Court of Mercer County. By that order, the circuit court denied the mother's motion for a dispositional improvement period, terminated her parental rights to her daughter, Maranda T. (hereinafter "Maranda" or "child"), and granted the mother post termination visitation. On appeal to this Court, Martha argues that the circuit court erred in denying her dispositional improvement period and in terminating her parental rights. Based on the parties' arguments, the record designated for our consideration, and the pertinent authorities, we affirm the rulings made by the circuit court.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The facts of this case are undisputed. Maranda was born November 2, 1999, to Martha and Leonard T., Jr. (hereinafter "Leonard" or "father"). When Maranda was seven years of age, Maranda's teacher made a referral concerning Maranda to the Mercer County Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR"). On January 26, 2007, a worker with Child Protective Services (hereinafter "CPS"), Ms. Akers, traveled to the school and spoke with Maranda. During that interview, Maranda indicated to Ms. Akers that she needed to tell her something. Maranda then turned around, pulled down her pants, bent over, and spread her buttocks apart. Maranda further stated that she was tired of her parents, Martha and Leonard, sleeping with her in her bed and having sex in her presence.

[1]"We follow our past practice in juvenile and domestic relations cases which involve sensitive facts and do not utilize the last names of the parties." State ex rel. West Virginia Dep't of Human Servs. v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 689 n.1, 356 S.E.2d 181, 182 n.1 (1987) (citations omitted).

A home visit was conducted January 26, 2007. During that visit, Maranda showed the DHHR employee a box of syringes and made a statement that the pills are also kept in that box. She indicated that the box belonged to her father. A forensic interview of Maranda occurred on January 31, 2007, during which Maranda indicated that her father touched her "thingy" while pointing to her vagina. Maranda also suggested during this conversation that her father used alcohol and drugs. A safety plan was entered into on January 31, 2007, wherein the mother agreed that "at no time will [Leonard] be allowed in the home with Maranda . . . [that] Maranda [T.] will not be left alone with [Leonard] at anytime . . . ." Further, Martha agreed that failure to comply with this safety plan could result in court action and possible removal of Maranda from her care.

Martha then moved with Maranda out of the home she shared with Leonard and into the home of her parents. A CPS worker with DHHR, Ms. Murphy, visited Martha's parents' home and found it small and extremely cluttered, with dirt and dust over everything. At the time of the visit, the CPS worker noted two men were lying on a bed with Maranda's maternal grandmother, watching television. The CPS worker determined that the home was not an appropriate place for Maranda to live. Martha and Maranda relocated to a shelter in a neighboring county. However, during the second week of their stay at the shelter, Maranda became sick, prompting Martha to move Maranda back into Martha's parents' residence.

On March 7, 2007, the DHHR was granted temporary custody of Maranda as a result of the filing of a child abuse and neglect petition. An adjudicatory hearing was held April 6, 2007. Ms. Murphy and Ms. Akers, both with the DHHR, testified regarding the events leading to the hearing, especially the alleged sexual conduct. Both women also testified that the familial home contained only one bed and that the father always appeared intoxicated. Further, Ms. Murphy testified that Martha and Leonard had relinquished rights to their other children.[2] A truancy officer with the Mercer County Board of Education also testified that Maranda had been absent from school fifty-five days: thirty-five unexcused and twenty excused. Further testimony was provided by Ms. Woodard, who had conducted the forensic interview, regarding Maranda's disclosure of sexually inappropriate conduct by her father.

[2]While there is little evidence in the record submitted from the circuit court regarding the other children of Martha and Leonard, it appears that Martha and Leonard have a total of seven children. The record details that Martha and Leonard relinquished their rights to their four older children after the State took custody of them. The DHHR appellate brief explains two other children are deceased: one perished in a house fire and one died after falling from the back of a moving truck when the driver was fleeing from the police. Maranda was the only child remaining in the custody of Martha and Leonard at the time of these proceedings.

During the adjudicatory hearing, Martha testified that she had an eighth-grade education and was currently on probation for welfare fraud. She also testified that there are two beds at her place of residence with Leonard, and that he did not drink in front of the children. Martha further stated that she never made love in front of Maranda. Leonard also testified[3] that there are two beds at the home. On the date of the adjudicatory hearing, Maranda was placed in a foster home, and specialized care was imposed because she was found to be developmentally delayed. She was unable to read or write simple words and, during foster care, it was determined that she needed eyeglasses. Maranda also exhibited behaviors such as pulling her arms to her body and walking on her tiptoes, and was either unwilling or unable to dress herself. She also had a tendency to eat until she became sick.[4]

On April 18, 2007, the circuit court entered an order finding Maranda to be a neglected and abused child and that both Martha and Leonard are responsible for such neglect and abuse. The lower court ordered supervised visitation for the mother, but denied visitation for the father because he refused to submit to drug and alcohol tests. On May 11, 2007, and reflected in an order entered May 31, 2007, the mother, Martha, was granted a six-month post adjudicatory improvement period.

[3]The circuit court noted that Leonard appeared to be testifying while intoxicated.

[4]During oral argument before this Court, it was reported that most of these behaviors improved during foster care, but that Maranda is still developmentally delayed.

On July 6, 2007, a dispositional hearing was held for the father and a review hearing was held on the mother's post adjudicatory improvement period. The father's parental rights were terminated and the lower court set a hearing date of October 5, 2007, to review the mother's post adjudicatory improvement period. During this time, Maranda had supervised visitation with her mother two times per week. It was reported that, during the visits, Martha continued to bring large quantities of junk food, despite being instructed to the contrary, and allowed Maranda to eat whatever amounts she wanted, which caused Maranda to become ill. Martha also failed to take full advantage of the scheduled visitation and left early or cancelled on several occasions.

At the review hearing on October 5, 2007, the guardian ad litem questioned whether reunification with the mother would ever be appropriate. During this review hearing, it was revealed that Maranda had disclosed additional previous sexual misconduct by her father and by other relatives. It was reported that this conduct had occurred when Maranda's mother was present or in an adjacent room watching television. However, it was also stated that Martha continued to cooperate with services and would make some progress, only to revert back to her original skills. Maranda was also scheduled to be tested for an autism spectrum disorder.[5] The lower court extended the mother's post adjudicatory improvement period and set a review hearing for December 21, 2007.

On January 24, 2008, a multidisciplinary team convened. During this meeting, it was revealed that the psychologist who performed the mother's psychological testing and the worker who had been providing parenting and adult life skills classes to Martha now questioned whether she would ever be able to raise a special needs child. They also were concerned with whether Martha would ever be able to generalize the parenting skills that she had been taught.

Subsequently, on February 1, 2008, the lower court held a hearing to review the mother's post adjudicatory improvement period. At this hearing, the lower court recognized that the DHHR was seeking disposition, and ordered services to continue until that time. A hearing was held April 4, 2008, and the DHHR argued that the mother's parental rights should be terminated. At the hearing, the circuit court heard testimony from Cherie Taylor, the testing psychologist, who reported that Martha has a second-grade reading level, which required testing using taped versions, and took several months longer than normal. Ms. Taylor reported that Martha's total intelligence IQ was fifty, and that Martha had limited insight regarding appropriate behaviors and boundaries for children. Further encephalopathy, developmental coordination disorder, low IQ, adjustment disorder, and attachment disorder.

testimony was elicited from Melanie Thompson, who taught parenting and life skills to Martha. Ms. Thompson reported that she had been working with Martha since February 2007, and that the mother's life skills had improved. However, it was testified to that the mother was not able to assimilate her parenting skills. While Martha was able to mimic specific behaviors, she was not able to adapt those behaviors to other situations. Moreover, Ms. Thompson reported that Martha's parenting skills would be consistent for a couple of weeks, then would revert back to her old skill set. The circuit court also heard testimony that the mother had difficulty controlling Maranda during the supervised visits.

During this hearing, CPS testified that Martha submitted a doctor's note suggesting that someone needed to stay with Martha in case of a medical emergency. Martha asked CPS if Maranda's father, Leonard, could be the one to stay with her. The CPS worker opined that this question illustrated the mother's limited insight into the seriousness of the father's sexual abuse of Maranda, and endangered Maranda. The CPS worker ultimately stated that Martha was unable to make consistent improvement to properly care for Maranda. Gail Murano, the caseworker who supervised the visits between Maranda and her mother, also provided testimony. Ms. Murano testified that Martha was unable to be assertive or discipline Maranda during the visits, despite Ms. Murano's attempts to work with Martha on these skills. Ms. Murano further testified that Maranda plays more of a mother role than Martha does, and that Martha was unable to generalize or apply skills from one situation to another. Ms. Murano also stated that the type of long-term services needed to permit safe reunification would be services provided to Martha in the home on a constant basis, twenty-four hours a day, seven days per week. Ms. Murano testified that such services were not available. Martha also testified at this hearing. She stated that Maranda has no conditions or limitations that need to be addressed by a doctor. She also stated that Maranda should not be around her father because he was still drinking, and she did not address or recognize the sexual abuse allegations. DHHR argued that Martha clearly is unable to appreciate or recognize the special needs of Maranda, and would be unable to protect Maranda from sexual abuse because she refused to acknowledge it.

As a result of this testimony and by order entered April 16, 2008, the circuit court found by > clear and convincing evidence that the respondent mother has attempted to follow the Family Case Plan, but she has limitations, and such limitations will not improve to a point where she could care for the infant child, and the Court concludes that basically the respondent mother would need somebody present in the home to actually fulfill the role of the parent for this child.

Accordingly, the circuit court found that "a dispositional improvement period will not provide any added benefit that has not been realized over the past fourteen (14) months." The order by the circuit court went on to find "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect can be substantially corrected in the near future, and it is necessary for the welfare of the infant child to terminate the parental, custodial, and guardianship rights of the respondent mother." Thus, the circuit court terminated the mother's parental rights to Maranda and denied a dispositional improvement period, but directed that post termination visitation should continue.[6] From these rulings, the mother, Martha, appeals to this Court regarding the termination of her parental rights and the denial of a dispositional improvement period.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

We previously have explained that, in the realm of an abuse and neglect case,

> circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. pt. 1, In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). Mindful of these standards, we proceed to consider the parties' arguments.

III.

DISCUSSION

Maranda's mother, Martha, advances two arguments on appeal. She argues that the circuit court erred in denying her motion for a dispositional improvement period and, further, that the circuit court erred in terminating her parental rights. The DHHR responds that the decisions by the circuit court were correct, and asserts that a thorough effort to provide services to this mother was maintained for fourteen months, without benefit. The DHHR continues its argument by alleging that the mother cannot adequately care for her child, even with intensive long-term assistance. The guardian ad litem (hereinafter "guardian") agrees with the circuit court's determinations based on the mother's psychological and emotional limitations. The guardian contends that the evidence shows the mother would need someone in the home to fulfill the parental role and that a dispositional improvement period would not provide any benefit not already realized during the fourteen months of services previously offered.

This Court has previously explained that "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996). Further guidance is provided as follows:

> "'Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.' Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980). Syllabus point 4, In re Jonathan P.,182 W. Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989)." Syllabus Point 1, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

Syl. pt. 7, In re Katie S., id. Further, "'courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened . . . .' Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syl. pt. 7, in part, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). While recognizing the substantial rights of Martha, as the natural mother of Maranda, to the custody of her child, this Court must elevate the health and welfare of Maranda above the parental rights of Martha.

In the present case before this Court, the lower court found "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect can be substantially corrected in the near future, and it is necessary for the welfare of the infant child to terminate the parental, custodial, and guardianship rights of the respondent mother." The circuit court's determination was based on the mother's "limitations, and such limitations will not improve to a point where she could care for the infant child[.]" A similar issue regarding parental intellectual capacity was addressed by this Court in the case of In re Billy Joe M., 206 W. Va. 1, 521 S.E.2d 173 (1999), which states as follows:

> Where allegations of neglect are made against parents based on intellectual incapacity of such parent(s) and their consequent inability to adequately care for their children, termination of rights should occur only after the social services system makes a thorough effort to determine whether the parent(s) can adequately care for the children with intensive long-term assistance. In such case, however, the determination of whether the parents can function with such assistance should be made as soon as possible in order to maximize the child(ren)'s chances for a permanent placement.

Syl. pt. 4, id.

The parties in the current appeal before this Court agree that Billy Joe M. is the controlling case; however, the parties differ as to their interpretations of what constitutes the type of services that would comply with the directives set forth in Billy Joe M. Martha argues that, pursuant to Billy Joe M., intensive, in-home services are to be provided before her parental rights can be terminated based on her low intellectual ability. Martha avers that the DHHR personnel only provided the services that they normally provide. She contends that she is entitled to long-term in-house services of a more permanent nature.[7] Thus, Martha urges this Court to adopt a standard of providing long-term in-home services for her so that she can be reunified with Maranda. As alleged by the guardian and the DHHR, any further "services" for this mother that might result in a safe reunification with her child would require a surrogate parent to be in the home twenty-four hours per day. The DHHR and the guardian both propound that such services are impossible to provide and, further, that Billy Joe M. does not require such intensive services. We agree with the position set forth by the guardian and the DHHR.

Billy Joe M. does not require in-home services such as the type argued by Martha. When a parent's intellectual incapacity is a factor in the possible termination of parental rights, Billy Joe M. requires that "termination of rights should occur only after the social services system makes a thorough effort to determine whether the parent(s) can adequately care for the children with intensive long-term assistance." Syl. pt. 4, in part, Billy Joe M., 206 W. Va. 1, 521 S.E.2d 173. Significantly, the case of Billy Joe M. involved only allegations of child neglect. The case currently before this Court for consideration involves both neglect and sexual abuse. Billy Joe M. anticipated such a case and cautioned that "[w]here the charge is abuse as opposed to neglect, the obligation to provide remedial services is far less substantial." Id., 206 W. Va. at 6 n.12, 521 S.E.2d at 178 n.12. The evidence presented to the circuit court alleged that Maranda was sexually abused by her father, and possibly by other male family members. The testimony also indicated that the mother was either present, or in the next room watching television, during these acts. Importantly, the mother's own testimony showed her inability to realize the impact of these allegations, and her request to allow the father back into the home for her own support in case of a medical emergency illustrated her inability to appreciate the gravity of the situation and to protect Maranda from a risk of continued sexual abuse.

[7]During oral argument before this Court , counsel for the mother argued that long-term services might make a difference in her case and provide for a safe reunification with her child. However, while counsel asserted that the mother was entitled to long-term in-home services, he was unable to explain the type of additional services that he sought for his client.

The circuit court also heard testimony from the testing psychologist, the guardian, and social service providers to the effect that Martha did not have the ability to retain the skills that were taught to her and, further, did not have the ability to generalize any learned skills and apply them to similar situations. She was only able to mimic skills and apply them in the very narrow context of how she learned them. Such services were offered for fourteen months, without benefit. Thus, the service providers opined that the only way to safely reunite Martha and Maranda would be to place a service provider in the home on a permanent, round the clock, basis. Such services are neither required by Billy Joe M. nor would further services benefit a permanent placement finding for Maranda. As acknowledged by Billy Joe M., "the determination of whether the parents can function with such assistance should be made as soon as possible in order to maximize the child(ren)'s chances for a permanent placement." Syl. pt. 4, in part, Billy Joe M., 206 W. Va. 1, 521 S.E.2d 173. This Court agrees that the services contemplated under Billy Joe M. were provided. Unfortunately, despite her sincere attempts, the mother was not able to realize the benefit of these services. Martha had been granted several post adjudicatory improvement periods and received social services for a period of fourteen months. Requiring more services and granting a dispositional improvement period would not only create possible danger to the child, Maranda, but would also serve to thwart a permanent placement for Maranda. Therefore, we affirm the circuit court's termination of Martha's parental rights and further find that the denial of her request for a dispositional improvement period was appropriate.

Finally, we are reminded that "[c]hild abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security." Syl. pt. 1, in part, In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). Further evidencing the priority placed on cases involving abused and neglected children, this Court has also stated that "matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible." Syl. pt. 5, in part, id. Prompt resolution in such cases attempts to protect children from the turmoil associated with the lack of stability in their surroundings and in their caretakers. See Syl. pt. 3, in part, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991) ("It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians.").

The record reveals that Maranda's permanency plan was adoption. Maranda was placed in a specialized adoptive home while her mother received social services. The original plan was for Maranda to be adopted by this family in the event reunification with her mother was found to be impossible. However, during oral argument before this Court, the guardian revealed that Maranda had been removed from the adoptive placement and is currently in specialized foster care, with the plan of addressing adoption after the end of the school year. While it appears that concurrent planning did occur, wherein a permanent placement for Maranda was simultaneously explored in the event reunification proved unsuccessful, the original plan was not able to be brought to fruition. Thus, we urge the fulfillment of the permanency plan to be implemented in accordance with this Court's directives set forth in our prior case law.

As a final note, in the case before the lower court, the circuit court terminated the mother's parental rights, but directed that the mother's visitation with Maranda should continue. See Syl. pt. 5, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995) ("When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest."). At this point in time, the parties agree that post termination visitation between Maranda and Martha is in the child's best interests. This Court agrees that visitation between the biological mother and child should continue; however, we are mindful that such visitation should not interfere with the need for stability and a permanent placement for the child in this case, should such become an issue.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we affirm the rulings made by the circuit court in its April 16, 2008, order, terminating the mother's parental rights and denying her motion for a dispositional improvement period.

Affirmed.

This appeal arises from a final order issued under the civil abuse and neglect statutes by the Circuit Court of Berkeley County, which order gave custody of the appellant, Mark M., III, (hereinafter Mark M.) to his father the appellee, Mark M., II (hereinafter Mark Sr.). The guardian ad litem for Mark M. argues on appeal that it was error for the circuit court to grant custody of the child to Mark Sr., without a permanency plan being submitted to and approved by the court. Additionally, the guardian ad litem asserts error due to the circuit court's failure to grant the guardian ad litem's motion for a continuance based upon information obtained only a few days before the scheduled dispositional hearing. We agree.

I.

This case was initiated by a civil neglect and abuse petition filed on January 30, 1996, against the child's mother, appellee Elizabeth M. See footnote 2The petition alleged that the child was abused, as a result of being born with traces of cocaine in his blood. At an adjudication hearing held on August 14, 1996, it was determined that the child had been abused due to his mother's use of cocaine while she was pregnant. A dispositional hearing was held on September 20, 1996. At the dispositional hearing the circuit court terminated the parental rights of the mother to the child. Additionally, the circuit court ordered the child be returned to his father, Mark Sr. The guardian ad litem objected to the child being released without a permanency plan being formulated and approved by the court. The circuit court ruled that there was no need for a permanency plan. The guardian ad litem contends the latter ruling was error.

Additionally, the guardian ad litem argues that three days before the dispositional hearing, the Department of Health and Human Resources (DHHR) abruptly changed its position regarding placement of Mark M. without consultation with or notice to the guardian ad litem. Given the seriousness of the newly-acquired information regarding the father, the father's unwillingness to cooperate and the lack of communication between the DHHR and the guardian ad litem, the guardian ad litem filed motions: (a) requesting the court continue the dispositional phase until an investigation was made; (b) requesting the court's assistance in obtaining information from the father; and (c) requesting the court to order the DHHR to conduct an investigation into the newly acquired information. The circuit court denied the guardian ad litem's motions. The guardian ad litem asserts error. We agree.

II.

The standard of review appropriate here is the clearly erroneous standard. Syl. Pt. 1, In the Interest of Diva P., ___ W.Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 23928, July 11, 1997). It is mandatory under W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a) (1996) that a child's case plan, which must include a permanency plan, be submitted to and approved by a circuit court whenever a child is adjudged abused or neglected. See Syl. Pt. 4, In the Interest of S.C., 191 W.Va. 184, 444 S.E.2d 62 (1994). Therefore, in the instant proceeding it was reversible error for the circuit court to release the child without a child's case plan being submitted to and approved by the court. On remand the circuit court shall obtain a child's case plan in accordance with W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a) and In the Interest of S.C.

As to the denial of the motion to continue, this Court has long held that "[a] motion for continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and its ruling will not be disturbed on appeal unless there is a showing that there has been an abuse of discretion." Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Bush, 163 W.Va. 168, 255 S.E.2d 539 (1979). In syllabus point 4 of Bush we held that "[w]hether there has been an abuse of discretion in denying a continuance must be decided on a case-by-case basis in light of the factual circumstances presented, particularly the reasons for the continuance that were presented to the trial court at the time the request was denied. Our holdings in Bush must be reconciled with our decision in syllabus point 3 of State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman,196 W.Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996) wherein we held:

> There is a clear legislative directive that guardians ad litem and counsel for both sides be given an opportunity to advocate for their > clients in child abuse or neglect proceedings. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a) (1995) states that the circuit court shall give both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard when proceeding to the disposition of the case. This right must be understood to mean that the circuit court may not impose unreasonable limitations upon the function of guardians ad litem in representing their clients in accord with the traditions of the adversarial fact-finding process. (Emphasis added.)

The circuit court's refusal to continue the matter precluded the guardian ad litem from fulfilling his obligations to properly represent the best interests of his client, Mark M. Allowing the motions would have had no impact on the rights of the father. Moreover, granting the motions would have insured that, in fact, the guardian ad litem's report and recommendation on disposition contained all pertinent information. We find that the circuit court abused its discretion in denying the guardian ad litem's motion for continuance.

We therefore reverse and remand this case with directions that the circuit court obtain a child's case plan in accordance with W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a) and In the Interest of S.C. and schedule a hearing during which the guardian ad litem can present his position regarding disposition of the case.

Reversed and Remanded.

2. "In an abuse and neglect case, the offer of a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights does not obviate the statutory requirements regarding the necessity for proceeding with the adjudicatory and dispositional phases of the abuse and neglect case. Prior to accepting an offer of voluntary termination of parental rights, a reviewing court must conduct the hearings required by West Virginia Code §§ 49–6–2 and 49–6–5." In re T.W., 230 W.Va. 172, 737 S.E.2d 69 (2012).

3. "Because the purpose of an abuse and neglect proceeding is remedial, where the parent or guardian fails to respond to probative evidence offered against him/her during the course of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a lower court may properly consider that individual's silence as affirmative evidence of that individual's culpability." Syl. pt. 2, West Virginia Dept. of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 197 W.Va. 489, 485 S.E.2d 865 (1996).

4. Where during the pendency of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a parent offers to voluntarily relinquish his or her parental rights and such relinquishment is accepted by the circuit court, such relinquishment may, without further evidence, be used as the basis of an order of adjudication of abuse and neglect by that parent of his or her children.

5. A parent whose rights have been terminated pursuant to an abuse and neglect petition may request post-termination visitation. Such request should be brought by written motion, properly noticed for hearing, whereupon the court should hear evidence and arguments of counsel in order to consider the factors established in Syllabus Point 5, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), except in the event that the court concludes the nature of the underlying circumstances renders further evidence on the issue manifestly unnecessary.

BENJAMIN, Chief Justice:

Morgan Y.[1], appeals the July 10, 2012, order of the Circuit Court of Morgan County terminating her parental rights to her daughter, Marley M., born May 5, 2010. Morgan Y. was alleged to have intentionally abused two unrelated, non-household member children, who were alleged to have been left in her care, which allegations formed the basis of the Department of Health and Human Resources' [hereinafter "DHHR"] petition. At the outset of the adjudication hearing, Morgan Y. voluntarily relinquished her parental rights to Marley in lieu of proceeding with the adjudication hearing, which relinquishment was accepted by the circuit court. Morgan Y. then moved for post-termination visitation, which request was immediately denied by the circuit court without receiving evidence pertaining to such request.

Upon careful review of the briefs, the appendix record, the arguments of the parties, and the applicable legal authority, we find that the circuit court erred in failing to enter an order of adjudication and in failing to conduct a hearing and receive evidence on the issue of post-termination visitation. Therefore, we reverse the circuit court and remand this case for further proceedings, as appropriate, consistent with this opinion.

[1] We identify the last names of the parties and family members in this case by their initials only, following our practice of protecting the identity of juveniles in sensitive cases. See State ex rel. West Virginia Dept. of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 689, n. 1, 356 S.E.2d 181, 182 n. 1 (1987).

I. FACTS AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

This case arises from an abuse and neglect case filed in January 2012, alleging that Marley M. was an abused and neglected child. The abuse and neglect petition did not allege wrongdoing on the part of Marley M.'s father, Derek M., but did allege that harm befell two other children who each had been left temporarily and on separate occasions in the care of Morgan Y., Marley M.'s mother. The affected children were not Morgan Y.'s children, but were her friends' children.[2]

The petition alleged that the first incident of abuse involved six-week-old Kylie R. who was left in the care of Morgan Y. on October 14, 2011. Morgan Y. told Kylie R.'s mother that the baby had stopped breathing while in her care, and that Morgan Y. had cleared an obstruction from the child's throat. During the course of subsequent hospital treatment, it was determined that Kylie R. had suffered three non-accidental broken bones in her left leg.

The petition further alleged that a second incident of abuse occurred on December 29, 2011, involving another child, Blake P., who was left in Morgan Y.'s care while Blake P.'s mother went outside to talk on the telephone. While in the care of Morgan Y., Blake P. suffered a spiral fracture to the femur.

[2] Additional parties to this proceeding are Tim Y. and Mary Y., Marley M.'s maternal grandparents, who intervened in this proceeding.

Morgan Y. offered explanations for each child's injury and denied any wrongdoing. She was arrested on January 20, 2012, for child abuse causing injury to Blake P.[3]

The abuse and neglect petition filed against Morgan Y. did not contain any allegations of direct harm caused to Marley M. by her mother; instead, the petition and amended petition alleged that the other children left in the care of the petitioner, Kylie R. and Blake P., were harmed by Morgan Y. while in her care. The amended petition further alleged that Marley M. was at risk for abuse and neglect because her mother was a drug abuser and prescription drug addict. Morgan Y. denied the allegations and moved to dismiss the amended abuse and neglect petition.

At the adjudicatory hearing in June of 2012, Morgan Y. argued that the allegations in the petition were insufficient. Morgan Y. posited that there were no allegations of harm or threatened harm specifically regarding Marley M., and as such, the petition should be dismissed. The basis of Morgan Y.'s argument was the fact that the injured children were not related to Marley M. and were never members of Marley M.'s household. She argued that Marley M. was in good health and appeared to have been well cared for prior to the filing of the petition. Furthermore, she argued that even if the allegations of harm to the other children were true, Marley M. was not at risk because the children were not her siblings or household members, both statutory requirements for any harm to these children to be considered a risk of harm to Marley M.[4]

[3] The petitioner was later indicted by the Jefferson County grand jury. That indictment was dismissed during the pendency of this appeal. At oral argument the parties advised the Court that the petitioner had again been indicted on these charges and that she awaits trial.

The circuit court denied Morgan Y.'s motion to dismiss. After announcing this ruling, the circuit court proceeded forward with the hearing and directed the Department of Health and Human Resources ("Department") to call its first witness. Thereupon, Morgan Y., through her counsel, announced that she wished to voluntarily relinquish her parental rights to Marley M. Specifically, counsel stated as follows:

> THE COURT: Very good. All right. We're back on the record in the Morgan County Circuit Court in M[.], it's 12-JA-1. I understand you've got the issues resolved.
> MR. PREZIOSO: Yes, Judge, I have spoken to my client. Of course, we really appreciate the Court's letting us argue these motions. They are interesting issues as Mr. Colvin pointed out and what we've done is I've been talking to my client since day one since she came in here and I've reviewed all the petitions with her and we would like to tender to the Court a relinquishment of all parental rights to the child to the Court and I don't think we're going to have objection from the guardian ad litem. I don't think so or we're going to have objection from respondent, Derek M[.], or from the intervening grandparents. I'm not sure we're going to have a strong objection from the department but for the Court's consideration we would tender that to the Court.
> THE COURT: I'll hear the objections.

[4] Derek M., Marley M.'s father, and Tim Y. and Mary Y., Marley M.'s maternal grandparents, joined in this motion to dismiss.

MR. COLVIN: I would have no objection to that, your honor. I think that's in the best interest of my client, Marley. I don't think there's any question about that. I think she's going to be fully protected. I think she's safe and to provide for her safety in the future so I agree with the relinquishment.

MR. PREZIOSO: And I can review the terms with my client.

MS. MCLAUGHLIN: The department does object to the relinquishment without an adjudication. I think the department's position is that it's just best to have an adjudication where there is grounds for the adjudication therefore they would object to the relinquishment short of the adjudication.

THE COURT: The Court finds that the surrender of parental rights is in the best interest of the infant child and Morgan Y[.] therefore the Court will permit the voluntary relinquishment. Exceptions are saved. You may go through the colloquy.

MR. PREZIOSO: I would like to, Judge, just to make sure.

THE COURT: Instead of me.

MR. PREZIOSO: Whatever you prefer, Judge.

THE COURT: No, you go ahead you're right there.

BY MR. PREZIOSO:

Q. All right, Ms. Y[.] would you state your name for the record.

A. Morgan Y[.]

Q. Ms. Y[.], we had a conference in our office yesterday where we drafted up a relinquishment of parental rights and you've had time to review this, correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Any questions you'd have about it about what we drafted up here?

A. No.

Q. You do understand that I think that it does say that the child's going to remain in the custody of the department but actually the child's going to remain in the custody of respondent Derek M[.], correct?

A. Yes.

Q. You understand that we're waiving a disposition and adjudicatory hearing in this matter and you're going to voluntarily relinquish your parental rights to Marley M[.], you understand that?

A. Yes.

Q. And paragraph two which is probably the most important that you understand this is going to result in the termination of your parental rights to Marley M[.] Do you understand that, Morgan?

A. Yes.

Q. You understand that as a consequence of your termination you have no right to custody or visitation. You have no right to participate and determine the care, custody, control, education, training, raising or rearing of the infant child named herein, do you understand that?

A. Yes.

Q. And you are fully understanding you're relinquishing all parental rights and you're waiving your right to a dispositional hearing and that such hearing would not be conducted, you understand that?

A. Yes.

Q. You understand that there are other less drastic alternatives to termination. For instance, we're here today to have an adjudicatory hearing. I filed a motion for a preadjudicatory improvement period but you understand if you went through that adjudicatory hearing that there are possibilities that even if you were found to have abused and neglected you could have an improvement period. You understand that?

A. Yes.

Q. You also understand that if we go forward and there's a disposition hearing you could also be granted an improvement [period]. Do you understand that?

A. Yes.

Q. But by entering this relinquishment you're giving up all rights to your adjudicatory hearing, your disposition hearing, and your right to have the Court put you in an improvement period, you understand that?

A. Yes.

Q. You have to assume that this relinquishment of parental rights is final. This is the final disposition of the custody of the infant in this case as it relates to you and - - well I think I have some superfluous language here about consent to adoption which I don't think is going to be an issue obviously because she's with Derek - - but on down the road if for instance an abuse and neglect proceeding were filed against Derek and he lost custody that if the DHHR were to come back they could adopt this child to someone else. Do you understand that?

A. Yes.

Q. And you understand that you have an attorney and I'm here with you today. Is there anything you feel like we haven't gone over?

A. No.

Q. Do you want to take any time whatsoever to think about this or are you comfortable offering this relinquishment today in court?

A. I'm fine with it.

Q. You're not fine with it but you understand, yes?

A. Um-hum. (Indicating yes.)

Q. You understand that - -

MR. PREZIOSO: And judge, this is an issue maybe that I need to reconsider this. It kind of didn't pan out what I thought was going to happen but would I be entitled to appeal your decision if I relinquish I mean I can always ask but the motion to dismiss because I did put something in there that said we wouldn't be able to appeal the ruling based upon the relinquishment but I mean I may want to consider that if someone else appeals that ruling. I don't know, Judge, could I be given leave to address the issue on appeal or does this relinquishment encompass that?

THE COURT: Well the petitioner's objecting to the termination.

MR. PREZIOSO: Oh, okay.

THE COURT: So I don't think that you're going to be given the right to appeal when I've overruled their objection.

MR. PREZIOSO: I meant the issue on the motion to dismiss, Judge.

THE COURT: I understand that.

MR. PREZIOSO: I understand it too.

MS. MCLAUGHLIN: Yeah, I think once you relinquish I don't think she has standing anymore to file.

THE COURT: Once she relinquishes it's over. Right. As far as I'm concerned she has no standing whatsoever nor does she have any right to consideration for adoption.

MR. PREZIOSO: I understood that, Judge. I put that in there. It was kind of an interesting situation I got to argue the motion to dismiss before we did the relinquishment. I'm going over that with her though.

BY MR. PREZIOSO:

Q. And you understand you've read this relinquishment of parental rights and you full understand the document,. Is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And no one's coerced you or threatened you into signing this document and no promises or rewards have been offered in consideration of your signing, is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Now by executing this instant voluntary relinquishment you do not make any admissions to any of the allegations raised in the previously filed petition for abuse and neglected, do you understand that?

A. Yes.

Q. Accordingly, you are freely, knowingly and voluntarily relinquishing your parental rights to Marley M[.], you understand that?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, that's your signature on there I'm going to tender this to the Court, okay, and just for the record you understand that you can't be living in the home with the child. You understand that?

A. Yes.

Q. And you understand that means - - you know I'm not sure what the status of your relationship is with the respondent but you can't be living in that home. Do you understand that if the custodial parent gives you any time whatsoever it has to be supervised. You cannot be left alone with that child you understand that?

A. Yes.

Q. And you can I guess theoretically be subject to contempt proceedings for your violation or Mr. M[.] could have problems with keeping this child in his custody do you understand that?

A. Yes.

MR. PREZIOSO: I don't have anything further, Judge.

THE COURT: Anybody else have any questions? The Court has none.

MR. COLVIN: The only question I have I don't know is the respondent mother making any motions for future post-termination visitation? At this point there wouldn't be any visitation with the child absent a Court ruling or petitioning the same.

MR. PREZIOSO: We would make a motion for post-termination visitation. I was going to address that next. I'm not sure if there's going to be objection to that or not considering we have two supervisors in the form of Mr. and Mrs. Y[.] and we have Mr. M[.] who's certainly capable of making sure this child is not injured. I would make a motion for it to leave it at the caregiver's discretion.

THE COURT: I will leave it at the discretion of the DHHR.

MS. MCLAUGHLIN: I don't know that we can do that, Judge.

THE COURT: Don't you have custody?

MS. MCLAUGHLIN: No, the father has custody.

THE COURT: I thought the father had physical but legal was in DHHR.

MS. MCLAUGHLIN: No, unfortunately. The father has both physical and legal custody at this point in time. I think from the standpoint of the best interest of the child, you know, unfortunately there's no way to monitor whether or not the mom is back in the home or not. If you allow supervised visitation with the father essentially you're permitting her to do exactly what we've sought not to happen which is for her to be around this child.

THE COURT: No. I'm not going to allow that period. The order will so reflect.

MR. PREZIOSO: So they'll be no contact between - - -

THE COURT: None. None.

MR. COLVIN: We would seek that, your Honor, in a protective order to be reflected in the order.

MS. WEESE: And note the objection of the grandparents who have an approved home study and I believe would be appropriate supervisors. Currently the child does not live in the home but spends a substantial amount of her time there.

THE COURT: Objection's noted. Anything else?

MR. REDDING: Your Honor, if you would kindly note my objection as well on behalf of Mr. M[.]

THE COURT: Yes sir. Anything else? All through, all done? You're excused. Mr. Colvin, you will do the order please.

MR. COLVIN: Yes, sir.

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court has held, with regard to our review of abuse and neglect findings:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). With these principles in mind, we turn to Morgan Y.s' assignments of error.

III. DISCUSSION

Morgan Y. asserts two assignments of error. First, she asserts that the circuit erred in denying her motion to dismiss the subject petition inasmuch as the allegations of abuse pertained to "stranger infants," i.e. infants to whom Marley M. is not related, nor with whom she resides in the same household. Morgan Y. further asserts that she had no caretaking responsibilities as pertains to the allegedly abused infants. Second, Morgan Y. asserts that the circuit court erred in failing to take evidence regarding post-termination visitation. We decline to address Morgan Y.'s first assignment of error, for reasons stated herein. We do find that the absence of an order of adjudication—whether obtained by full evidentiary hearing or on the basis of the relinquishment—was error. We find further that the circuit court erred in failing to conduct an evidentiary hearing on the issue of post-termination visitation. We will discuss each issue in turn.

A. Termination of Parental Rights

Morgan Y. argued below, and argues upon appeal, that Morgan Y.'s parental rights to Marley M. cannot be terminated on the basis of acts of abuse or neglect inflicted upon another child who does not reside in the same household with Marley M. We decline to resolve this issue, because the record below was limited by Morgan Y.'s voluntary relinquishment, which will be discussed more fully infra. The relinquishment happened at the start of the Department's presentation of evidence on the issue of adjudication. Therefore, there was no evidence adduced at this proceeding on the allegations in the complaint. We cannot discern if the Department would have proceeded to the adjudication on the allegations of harm to other children who may have been in the custody of Morgan Y., or proceeded on the basis of Morgan Y.'s purported drug abuse that may have posed harm to Marley M. Therefore, this Court cannot make a determination of this appeal on this ground.

B. Voluntary Relinquishment

Morgan Y.'s voluntary relinquishment of her parental rights to Marley M. was accomplished prior to the issuance of our recent opinion in In re T.W., 230 W.Va. 172, 737 S.E.2d 69 (2012). In T.W., this Court clarified the statutory requirement that irrespective of a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights, the adjudication and disposition phases of an abuse and neglect proceeding must be conducted:

> In an abuse and neglect case, the offer of a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights does not obviate the statutory requirements regarding the necessity for proceeding with the adjudicatory and dispositional phases of the abuse and neglect case. Prior to accepting an offer of voluntary termination of parental rights, a reviewing court must conduct the hearings required by West Virginia Code §§ 49–6–2 and 49–6–5.

Syl. pt. 9, In re T.W., 230 W. Va. 172, 737 S.E.2d 69 (2012).

On appeal, Morgan Y. posits that regardless of her relinquishment of her parental rights, the court must take additional action, including completing the adjudicatory and dispositional phases of this proceeding. We agree that the courts cannot avoid the adjudicatory and dispositional phases of an abuse and neglect proceeding simply because a parent has voluntarily relinquished his or her rights. We reverse and remand this case because the circuit court did not conduct these hearings and make these determinations.

Nevertheless, we find it necessary to now address the practical and legal effect of a parent's voluntary relinquishment during a pending abuse and neglect proceeding in light of the T.W. holding. Seventeen years ago this Court undertook a careful analysis of the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination and the competing interests of the protection of children against abusive and neglectful parents. In West Virginia Dept. of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 197 W.Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996), we addressed a situation where the accused parents of abused and neglected children refused not only to testify on their own behalf, but further failed to present any evidence in their own defense. We found that "[t]here is no basis in law for requiring that a court be disallowed from consideration of a parent's or guardian's choice to remain silent as evidence of civil culpability." Id. at 497. 485 S.E.2d at 873. As a result, we held that > of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a lower court may properly consider that individual's silence as affirmative evidence of that individual's culpability.

Syl. Pt. 2, Doris S., supra. We found support for this holding in the United States Supreme Court case of Baxter v. Palmigiano, 425 U.S. 308 (1976), which recognized,

> "the prevailing rule that the Fifth Amendment does not forbid adverse inferences against parties to civil actions when they refuse to testify in response to probative evidence offered against them: the Amendment 'does not preclude the inference where the privilege is claimed by a party to a civil cause.'" Baxter at 318, 96 S.Ct. at 1558 (quoting 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence 439 (McNaughton rev. 1961)); s*ee* 1 Franklin D. Cleckley, Handbook on Evidence for West Virginia Lawyers § 5–2(B)(1) (3rd ed.1994).

Id. at 498, 475 S.E.2d at 874. We further agreed with the Baxter Court's conclusion that "'in proper circumstances silence in the face of accusation is a relevant fact not barred by the Due Process Clause.'" Doris S., 197 W. Va. at 498, 475 S.E.2d at 874 (emphasis added).[5] Moreover, as the Supreme Court further recognized in Hale, supra, "[f]ailure to contest an assertion . . . is considered evidence of acquiescence . . . if it would have been natural under the circumstances to object to the assertion in question." U. S. v. Hale, 422 U.S. 171, 176, 95 S Ct. 2133 at 2136.[6]

We revisited the issue in the context of purported Fifth Amendment violations relative to a parent's assertion of a vigorous defense in an abuse and neglect proceeding in In re Daniel D., 211 W. Va. 79, 562 S.E.2d 147 (2002). In Daniel D., the Court addressed the argument that a parent is confronted with a "Hobson's choice" when compelled to participate in civil abuse and neglect proceedings when criminal charges are pending. The Court re-examined the analysis in Doris S. and, finding support in other jurisdictions, concluded that our holding in Doris S. was "soundly supported by the authorities and is consistent with the policy of this State which encourages prompt hearing of abuse and neglect cases and a paramount concern for the best interests of the children involved in such proceedings." Daniel D., 211 W. Va. at 87, 562 S.E.2d at 155.

As such, we now hold that where during the pendency of an abuse and neglect proceeding, a parent offers to voluntarily relinquish his or her parental rights and such relinquishment is accepted by the circuit court, such relinquishment may, without

[6] See 3A J. Wigmore, Evidence s 1042 (Chadbourn rev. 1970):

> Silence, omissions, or negative statements, as inconsistent: (1) Silence, etc., as constituting the impeaching statement. A failure to assert a fact, when it would have been natural to assert it, amounts in effect to an assertion of the non-existence of the fact. This is conceded as a general principle of evidence.

further evidence, be used as the basis of an order of adjudication of abuse and neglect by that parent of his or her children.

> As well-stated by the New Jersey Superior Court,
> There is no mandatory requirement that [a parent] take the stand and testify. That would be unconstitutional. The constraint upon respondent to give testimony arises here simply from the force of circumstances and not from any form of compulsion forbidden by the Constitution[.]

New Jersey Division of Youth and Family Services v. S.S., 645 A.2d 1213 (1994). The S.S. court astutely observed that "[i]t may be a difficult decision for the respondents and their attorneys. [But] it is a question of procedure and legal options for the defense, not one of the constitutionality of incrimination[.]" Id. at 1217. Likewise, we do not find ourselves overly concerned that our rule will result in accused parents' refusal to voluntarily relinquish, where they otherwise may spare the State the time and resources necessary to adjudicate. The perceived risks attendant to proceeding to adjudication, which may otherwise compel a parent to voluntarily relinquish, remain. The benefits of avoiding the taking of evidence and asserting a defense by voluntarily relinquishing likewise remain. What is missing is simply the mechanism by which an accused parent may elude adjudication and avoid future Department petitions as to any other, or after-born, children. Moreover, the requirement of adjudication was previously established by this Court in T.W.; our decision today simply extends our rationale in Doris S. to preserve the utility of voluntary relinquishments during an abuse and neglect proceeding for both an accused parent and the State. All options are still on the table for an accused parent; he or she now simply faces the import of his choices.

We find this rule simply a natural extension of and a marrying of the concepts and analysis contained in Doris S., Daniel D., and T.W. As this Court stated in Daniel D., our new rule "simply confronts the accused parent with a choice": one may voluntarily relinquish their parental rights during the pendency of an abuse and neglect proceeding, resulting in an adjudication on the merits which may be used as the basis for a future petition by the Department or one may "offer such evidence as the accused may alone possess to refute the charge of abuse and neglect." Id. at 87, 562 S.E.2d at 155. Our new rule in no way creates an impediment to a parent's right to voluntarily relinquish, nor does it denigrate their Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. Rather, this rule simply reflects the "force of circumstances" that will necessarily result from the adjudication which now results from a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights while that parent is involved in an abuse and neglect proceeding.

Turning now to the facts of the instant case, we find that inasmuch as our new syllabus point 4 established herein establishes greater consequences arising from a voluntary relinquishment, Morgan Y. is entitled upon remand to revisit her decision to voluntarily relinquish her parental rights. In the event Morgan Y. chooses not to voluntarily relinquish, the court should proceed with a full evidentiary hearing.[7] In the event Morgan Y. continues to desire to voluntarily relinquish her rights to Marley, the court must enter an order adjudicating her abusive and neglectful pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49-6-2.

C. Post-Termination Visitation

Petitioner next assigns as error the circuit court's refusal to grant her post-termination visitation. It is well-established that

Syl. pt. 5, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995). Although this Court has not expressly so held, dicta in certain cases involving remands on the issue of post-termination visitation have customarily instructed the lower court to hold a hearing, receive evidence, and consider arguments of counsel. See In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, [7] We observe that the Department's amended petition alleged not only that Marley M. was a victim of abuse and neglect because of the alleged abuse of Kyle R. and Blake P., but also because the petitioner was allegedly also a drug abuser and prescription drug addict.

479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) ("On remand, the circuit court should take evidence and hear arguments from all sides on the post-termination visitation[.]"); State v. Michael M., 202 W. Va. 350, 504 S.E.2d 177 (1998) ("[T]he circuit court should have taken evidence, heard arguments, and made specific findings of fact on these issues.").

However, we note that in some cases, the facts and circumstances underlying the subject abuse and neglect adjudication may be of such an egregious or aggravated nature that further proceedings on the issue of continued contact with a parent whose rights have been terminated would be an unjustifiable waste of judicial resources. Inasmuch as post-termination visitation has been correctly identified as a right of the child, and not a right of the parent,[8] we find that the circuit court in the exercise of its parens patriae power is imbued with the discretion to determine if the totality of the circumstances of the underlying petition and/or evidence renders a hearing and the taking of further evidence unnecessary.

Accordingly, we now hold that a parent whose rights have been terminated pursuant to an abuse and neglect petition may request post-termination visitation. Such request should be brought by written motion, properly noticed for hearing, whereupon the court should hear evidence and arguments of counsel in order to consider the factors established in Syllabus Point 5, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), except in the event that the court concludes the nature of the underlying circumstances renders further evidence on the issue manifestly unnecessary. Here, this was not done. There was no properly noticed motion. Consequently, we also reverse the circuit court's order denying post-termination visitation. Should parental rights be terminated, Morgan Y. may seek post-termination by way of advancing evidence and arguments during a hearing properly noticed upon written motion. Finally, we reiterate our admonishment that post-termination visitation should not be entertained if it would "unreasonably interfere with [a child's] permanent placement." State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W.Va. 251, 260, 470 S.E.2d 205, 214 (1996).

V. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the July 10, 2012, order of the Circuit Court of Morgan County is reversed, and we remand to the circuit court for further proceedings as consistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

No. 22959

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "In reviewing challenges to findings made by a family law master that also were adopted by a circuit court, a three-prong standard of review is applied. Under these circumstances, a final equitable distribution order is reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard; the underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard; and questions of law and statutory interpretations are subject to a de novo review." Syl. pt. 1, Burnside v. Burnside, 194 W. Va. 263, 460 S.E.2d 264 (1995).

2. "Children are often physically assaulted or witness violence against one of their parents and may suffer deep and lasting emotional harm from victimization and from exposure to family violence; consequently, a family law master should take domestic violence into account[.]" Syl. pt. 1, in part, Henry v. Johnson, 192 W. Va. 82, 450 S.E.2d 779 (1994).

3. "Where supervised visitation is ordered pursuant to W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991], the best interests of a child include determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience. The person(s) appointed to supervise the visitation should have had some prior contact with the child so that the child is sufficiently familiar with and trusting of that person in order for the child to have secure feelings and so that the visitation is not harmful to his or her emotional well being. Such a determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family law master or circuit court." Syl. pt. 3, Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992).

Per Curiam:
Mary Ann P., See footnote 1 the plaintiff below and appellant herein, appeals an order of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County which granted William R.P., Jr., the defendant below and appellee herein, supervised visitation with the couple's two sons. The plaintiff argues the circuit court erred when it failed to find credible evidence of sexual abuse and failed to appropriately consider the evidence that the defendant physically and mentally abused her. After reviewing the record, we find that even if no sexual abuse occurred in this case, the circuit court erred when it failed to take into consideration the defendant's abusive behavior toward the plaintiff and the emotional impact that abuse had on their children. The weight of the evidence supports our conclusion to remand this case to the circuit court with directions to suspend supervised visitation until the defendant undergoes psychological treatment for his behavior. The circuit court also should consider whether the children and the defendant should undergo therapy together to work through their problems before resumption of visitation occurs.

I.
FACTS

The parties were married in March of 1985 and two sons were born of the marriage. William Raphael P. III (Billy) was born in May of 1985 and Mark Patrick P. was born in July of 1986. The record reflects that from the beginning the couple had a troubled marriage. The defendant was physically and mentally abusive to the plaintiff throughout their marriage. In an attempt to improve their relationship, the parties underwent marriage counseling with Chuck Rhodes, a family counselor and therapist. The parties were unable to work through their problems and they separated. The plaintiff filed for divorce in 1988.

The plaintiff received custody of the children as she was determined to be the primary caretaker. The numerous proceedings held before the family law master focused primarily on the defendant's visitation rights which are at issue in this appeal.

At the March 3, 1992, hearing before the family law master, the plaintiff detailed the physical and mental abuse that occurred during the marriage. She testified the defendant did not want her to have either of the boys and he urged her to have abortions both times she became pregnant. He showed little interest in the children when they were infants and openly expressed his disappointment that he had boys instead of girls. The defendant was not at home very much during the early part of the marriage because of his business trips. The plaintiff testified that when she was pregnant with Mark she learned the defendant was having an affair.

The plaintiff also testified the defendant had a violent temper and would yell and curse at her in front of the children. The defendant cursed at her so frequently that even when the boys were just learning to talk they said explicit curse words. During arguments, the defendant punched and kicked the plaintiff. He threatened her with a knife. He choked her around the neck so hard she had to wear a scarf to hide the bruises. He drug her across the floor by her hair in front of the children. The plaintiff testified that when the children would witness this abuse they would scream and cry and try to hide. The defendant would hit and kick the children's toys and broke toys in front of the children in fits of rage. The plaintiff testified that "[t]he trauma and crying that these children have seen in their life is unreal."

During one argument, the defendant locked the plaintiff out of the house and kept the children inside. She testified she was afraid for the children's safety and put her fist through a window to enter the house. She severed three nerves in her arm and underwent surgery to correct the damage.

Billy and Mark have severe allergy problems and needed frequent medical treatments for ear infections, allergies, and colds when they were infants. The plaintiff testified the defendant was not sympathetic to the children's medical needs and, on certain occasions, blocked her attempts to get medical attention for the boys because he believed the plaintiff was overreacting to the children's symptoms. The defendant continued to smoke in front of the boys even though it caused them respiratory problems.

Despite the foregoing, the plaintiff maintains she encouraged the children's visitation with their father following the separation. However, she stated he exercised his visitation rights sporadically. In July of 1991, following an overnight visitation with his father, Billy informed his mother that the defendant touched him in an inappropriate manner. Billy told his mother that his father touched his penis, his father wanted Billy to touch his father's penis, and his father kissed his penis. The plaintiff believed her son and arranged for him to be counseled by Mr. Rhodes. Mr. Rhodes suggested the plaintiff take Billy to Pam Rockwell, a counselor with the sexual assault program at Family Services of Kanawha Valley.

After interviewing Billy, it was Ms. Rockwell's conclusion that Billy had been sexually abused by his father. Billy was uncomfortable talking about the incident. However, he did whisper in his mother's ear and asked her to tell Ms. Rockwell that when going to the bathroom his dad touched his penis and kissed his penis. Based upon this information, Ms. Rockwell recommended no contact whatsoever with the defendant.

Dr. John MacCallum, a psychiatrist, was first contacted by the defendant because the defendant was seeking evidence that he had done nothing inappropriate with his children. Dr. MacCallum explained he would not advocate the defendant's position, but he would interview him and render an opinion in the case. After interviewing the defendant, it was Dr. MacCallum's opinion that no sexual abuse or inappropriate sexual contact occurred. He stated the contact Billy spoke of was innocent toilet training touching that was misinterpreted by Billy.

Dr. MacCallum was later asked by the family law master to interview the children and the plaintiff. Following those interviews, Dr. MacCallum affirmed his conclusion that no sexual abuse occurred. Billy told him that his father touched his penis once when they were going to the bathroom. Dr. MacCallum was highly critical of the interview techniques utilized by Ms. Rockwell as shown on a videotape she prepared of her interview. He claimed her questions were unduly suggestive. Based on these findings, Dr. MacCallum recommended the defendant should have no restrictions placed on his visitation rights.

During Dr. MacCallum's interview with the plaintiff, she spoke of several incidences of physical abuse she endured during the marriage. Furthermore, the plaintiff documented some rather deviant sexual behavior and/or interests of the defendant. Dr. MacCallum stated he had no reason to question the veracity of the plaintiff's statements. He also testified the boys clearly dislike their father. However, during Dr. MacCallum's deposition, he stated that for purposes of his evaluation he separated the issue of sexual abuse from questions of the general safety and well-being of the children under the circumstances of visitation.

The plaintiff testified Billy and Mark no longer want to have any contact with their father. It upsets them greatly when they have to visit with him. When the defendant comes to the house to visit, the boys frequently run and hide and have to be coaxed to come out to speak with their father. The plaintiff testified the visitations have had a profound effect on Billy. He has nightmares and acts out aggressively toward other children. Billy builds traps and barricades and frequently checks to see the doors and windows are locked because he is afraid the defendant will enter the house.

Several witnesses who accompanied the defendant on supervised visits testified regarding the boys' and the defendant's behavior. While the evidence is somewhat conflicting, it appears the boys do not want to visit their father and behave poorly in his presence. On more than one occasion, Billy demonstrated his anger at his father by hitting him.

The defendant testified and denied all sexual abuse charges. He also denied the sexual deviation allegations of the plaintiff. He denied some of the physical abuse charges and downplayed certain other charges of physical abuse and their significance in the marriage. He stated his visitations with the children are not as bad as the plaintiff contends. He testified that the plaintiff interferes with his relationship with his children. For instance, he claims the plaintiff suggests they go to places that have video games so the boys will not have to interact with him. At one point during the hearings, he alleged the plaintiff was an unfit parent because she planted the idea of sexual abuse in Billy's mind and worked to destroy whatever relationship he had remaining with his sons. The defendant agreed to undergo therapy to work on his parenting skills, but he adamantly refused to undergo therapy in regard to sexual abuse because he denies the charges and feels the evidence vindicates him. See footnote 2

Christina Marie Arco, Ph.D., a psychologist at the Process Strategies Institute in Charleston, testified at a hearing held in October of 1994 that she provided therapy for the children. At a hearing held in January of 1995, Dr. Arco testified she was still seeing Billy for therapy. She stated that Billy's anger and aggressiveness are at very high levels. He has fears and anxieties about his father. Billy told Dr. Arco he wished his father were dead so he would not have to worry about him anymore. Dr. Arco testified that any forced visitation with his father would cause serious regression in Billy. She also stated that the negativity the children have about their father is much more motivated by fear, anxiety, and anger than by any negative comments that may have been made by the plaintiff.

Susan Barrows McQuade, the Director of Social Services at Family Services of Kanawha Valley and Chair of the Children's Justice Task Force in the State of West Virginia, stated she reviewed the evidence in this case. Ms. McQuade testified she believed visitation with their father would be detrimental to Billy and Mark and visitation should not be forced.

Jerry Sandoval, a child service worker with the Department of Health and Human Resources, investigated this matter and testified the plaintiff is a good parent and the children are well behaved in the presence of their mother. Based on her interviews with the plaintiff, Billy, and Mark and a review of the evidence, it was Ms. Sandoval's opinion that it is in the children's best interest not to see their father until they are old enough to decide for themselves when and where to see him.

After hearing the foregoing evidence, the family law master rendered his recommended order. He found:

> "It is clear that no sexual abuse occurred in this case, that plaintiff does not like the defendant, and justifiably so because of the history of physical violence in their marriage, but that there can be no further justification whatsoever of any restriction of defendant's right of visitation with his children."

The family law master was highly critical of Family Services of Kanawha Valley in general and Ms. Rockwell's interview techniques in particular. See footnote 3 The family law master stated that, due to the history of domestic violence in the case, for six months the defendant's visitation with the boys would be restricted to the presence of a third person. The family law master made no findings or conclusions as to the nature of the supervision.

The plaintiff filed exceptions to the family law master's recommended decision. The circuit court denied her exceptions but opened the case for further testimony regarding the nature of the defendant's visitation with the children following the plaintiff's motion to stay visitation. After hearing additional evidence on the issue of whether resumption of visitation would be harmful to the children, the circuit court ordered supervised visitation with the defendant until the boys attain an age where enforced visitation would be "meaningless." The circuit court found that "[r]egardless of whether an act of child abuse, such as alleged herein, actually occurred or not, these two children have been so indoctrinated to believe that it did occur that their attitude of distrust towards . . . [their father] renders exercise of visitation virtually impossible." The circuit court also found the record "only partially supports a conclusion that resumed visitation will result in serious psychiatric regression" and that no "high risk of suicide or withdrawal" should occur if visitation resumes.

II.
ABUSE ALLEGATIONS
A. Sexual Abuse

In finding that no sexual abuse occurred in this case, the family law master and the circuit court credited the report of Dr. MacCallum and discredited the reports of the other counselors, particularly Ms. Rockwell and Ms. MacQuade, as well as Billy's version of the events. This Court reviews that factual finding under the clearly erroneous standard and, if it is supported by substantial evidence, we will not overturn that finding even though we would be inclined to make a different finding or draw a contrary inference on the same set of facts. Stephen L.H. v. Sherry L.H., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 22084 3/6/95). See also Anderson v. City of Bessemer City, N.C., 470 U.S. 564, 577, 105 S. Ct. 1504, 1513, 84 L.Ed.2d 518, 530 (1985). In Stephen L.H., we explained some of the reasons behind the policy that a reviewing court should accord deference to the findings of fact made by a lower tribunal:

> "There are many critical aspects of an evidentiary hearing which cannot be reduced to writing and placed in a record, e.g., the demeanor of witnesses. These factors may affect the mind of a trier of fact in forming an opinion as to the weight of the evidence and the character and credibility of the witnesses. Thus, the importance of > these factors should not be ignored by a reviewing court. Given a family law master's intimate familiarity with the proceedings, the family law master is in the best position to weigh evidence and assess credibility in making the ultimate ruling on disputed issues.

> "As we said in Board of Education v. Wirt, [192 W. Va. 568, 579, 453 S.E.2d 402, 413 (1994)]: 'Indeed, if the lower tribunal's conclusion is plausible when reviewing the evidence in its entirety, the appellate court may not reverse even if it would have weighed the evidence differently if it had been the trier of fact.' (Citation omitted). This deference given to the lower tribunal in Wirt also is appropriate in the present case because the family law master 'is in a position to see and hear the witnesses and is able to view the case from a perspective that an appellate court can never match.' Weil v. Seltzer, 873 F.2d 1453, 1457 (D.C. Cir. 1989). (Citation omitted)." ___ W. Va. at ___, ___ S.E.2d at ___. (Slip op. at 26-27). (Footnote omitted).

In this case, the family law master's factual determination that no sexual abuse occurred in this case was adopted by the circuit court. Therefore, we are guided by the standard of review articulated in Syllabus Point 1 of Burnside v. Burnside, 194 W. Va. 263, 460 S.E.2d 264 (1995):

> "In reviewing challenges to findings made by a family law master that also were adopted by a circuit court, a three-prong standard of review is applied. Under these circumstances, a final equitable distribution order is reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard; the underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard; and questions of law and statutory interpretations are subject to a de novo review."

Applying this standard, we cannot find the factual determination that no sexual abuse occurred in this case is clearly erroneous. The family law master and the circuit court's findings are plausible when reviewing the evidence in its entirety. The defendant adamantly denied any sexual abuse occurred. Furthermore, the testimony of Dr. MacCallum supports this conclusion and he had the opportunity to interview all the parties involved, unlike Ms. Rockwell and Dr. Arco who only spoke with the plaintiff and the children.

Our decision to affirm this portion of the circuit court's order, however, is not determinative of the final disposition of this case. We agree with the plaintiff that the final order left unresolved significant issues that must be addressed before the ultimate determination regarding the defendant's visitation rights is made. We will address these issues below.

B. Physical and Emotional Abuse See footnote 4

The family law master found the plaintiff suffered from physical and emotional abuse during the marriage, See footnote 5 but failed to address the negative consequences such abuse now has on the children's relationship to and visitation with their father. To be clear, we are not speaking of a child's general reluctance to visit with his or her noncustodial parent. What we are dealing with in this case is Mark's and Billy's documented intense fears and anxieties in visiting with their father. All the expert witnesses in this case, excluding Dr. MacCallum whose findings we will address below, recommended that no forced visitation should occur because it would have a disastrous effect on the boys. Dr. Arco testified that forced visitation, even if supervised, would cause serious regression in Billy's development.

A fair reading of the record reveals that the boys' feelings of animosity toward their father are in large part due to their father's treatment of their mother. During counseling sessions, the boys stated their father was "mean" because he did "awful things" to their mother. The plaintiff testified that during the marriage the boys would scream and cry when she and the defendant would fight. The defendant's physical abuse of the plaintiff was witnessed by the boys, and they were terrified of their father because of this abuse.

The evidence of the negative impact the physical abuse that occurred during the marriage had in regard to the children's well-being was not rebutted. Dr. MacCallum failed to render an opinion in regard to the physical and mental cruelty endured by the plaintiff and observed by the children. He clearly stated that he came to his ultimate conclusion to allow the defendant unsupervised visitation based solely on his finding that no sexual abuse occurred.

This Court joins with the majority of jurisdictions in finding that domestic violence evidence should be considered when determining parental fitness and child custody. See footnote 6 In Syllabus Point 1, in part, of Henry v. Johnson, 192 W. Va. 82, 450 S.E.2d 779 (1994), we stated:

> "Children are often physically assaulted or witness violence against one of their parents and may suffer deep and lasting emotional harm from victimization and from exposure to family violence; consequently, a family law master should take domestic violence into account[.]"

See W. Va. Code, 48-2A-1(a)(2) (1992) (domestic violence statute states that children "may suffer deep and lasting emotional harm from victimization and from exposure to family violence"). Similarly, in the dissenting opinion in Patricia Ann S. v. James Daniel S., 190 W. Va. 6, 18, 435 S.E.2d 6, 18 (1993), Justice Workman recognized that "spousal abuse has a tremendous impact on children" regardless of whether the children were directly abused. See footnote 7

While custody was not at issue in this case, evidence of domestic violence is still relevant in deciding the visitation issue because it appears to be the root cause for why visitation has not been successful. As the expert witnesses testified, continued therapy with the children is necessary. Furthermore, it was recommended the defendant undergo therapy. Therefore, we find it necessary to remand this case to the circuit court to address the issue of physical and mental abuse that occurred during the marriage and the effect such abuse had on the children.

When family problems involving children are of sufficient depth and duration that professional counseling is needed to heal the relationships of the child or children with the parent or parents, or to assist the child or children in dealing with such emotional estrangement, a circuit court may direct participation in such counseling and may in its discretion determine how the cost of such counseling shall be paid. See Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992).

III.
VISITATION

Based on the foregoing, we agree with the plaintiff that supervised visitation should not immediately resume. "In Ledsome v. Ledsome, 171 W. Va. 602, 301 S.E.2d 475 (1983), this Court held that the right to visitation is determined by considering the child's welfare." Lufft v. Lufft, 188 W. Va. 339, 343, 424 S.E.2d 266, 270 (1992). The record is clear that forced visitation at this time would be detrimental to the children and futile on the defendant's behalf without professional intervention. In Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. at 348, 438 S.E.2d at 528, this Court held that a "family law master or circuit court may condition . . . supervised visitation upon the offending parent seeking treatment." On remand, the circuit court should address this issue. The circuit court should also consider whether it would be beneficial for the defendant and the children to attend counseling sessions together to help build a more positive relationship. "Clearly, counseling for the parties would materially promote the welfare of the children." Patricia Ann S., 190 W. Va. at 14, 435 S.E.2d at 14. The circuit court should also determine when supervised visitation should resume and set forth a specific visitation schedule that takes into account the best interest of the children and the defendant's interest in attaining a close relationship with his sons. See Weber v. Weber, 193 W. Va. 551, 457 S.E.2d 488 (1995); W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1993). On remand, the circuit court should determine if the parties can agree on a counseling or therapy setting for these children and their father. If they cannot agree, then the circuit court should take any additional evidence needed and direct the participation in such counseling as a condition of the continuation of the plan for restoring visitation.

In Mary D., Chief Justice McHugh set forth guidelines to help provide children with a safe and secure atmosphere when supervised visitation is exercised. Although Mary D. dealt specifically with supervised visitation following a finding that sexual abuse occurred, we find it just as applicable in this case where the children harbor such strong feelings against their father, whatever the source of such emotional estrangement. It is in everyone's interest to see that supervised visitation goes as smoothly as possible. In Syllabus Point 3 of Mary D., we held:

> "Where supervised visitation is ordered pursuant to W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991], the best interests of a child include determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience. The person(s) appointed to supervise the visitation should have had some prior contact with the child so that the child is sufficiently familiar with and trusting of that person in order for the child to have secure feelings and so that the visitation is not harmful to his or her emotional well being. Such a determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family law master or circuit court."

Due to the passage of time that has already occurred in this case, the circuit court, on remand, should ensure this matter receives an expedited hearing to resolve the issues raised in this opinion.

IV.
CONCLUSION

Based on the foregoing, the order of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County is affirmed, in part, reversed, in part, and this case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Affirmed, in part, reversed, in part, and remanded.

Footnote: 1 We follow our traditional practice in cases which involve sensitive facts and do not use the last names of the parties so as not to stigmatize them or their children. See, e.g., Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W. Va. 710, 356 S.E.2d 464 (1987); West Virginia Dept. of Human Services v. La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W. Va. 330, 332 S.E.2d 632 (1985).

Footnote: 2 In addition to Dr. MacCallum's report finding no evidence of sexual abuse, the defendant points to the fact the State dismissed the charges of criminal sexual abuse against him.

Footnote: 3 The family law master stated:

"Further, the Family Law Master would remind Family Services that far from being one of the best interviewers around, Pam Rockwell has been thoroughly discredited as an interviewer and investigator in sexual abuse cases and has shown to be a perpetrator of abusive situations where children were forced to make statements later proven untrue. FSKV would do well to make sure that all its employees not only know that but avoid any such situation in the future."

Footnote: 4 The defendant declined to adequately address this issue in his brief before this Court. On the issue of domestic violence, he stated: "[I]n the case before this Court, the only people discussing Domestic Violence . . . [are the plaintiff and her mother] and the indoctrinated children, notwithstanding the fact that the record does not reflect any criminal action." However, we find the evidence of domestic violence certainly relevant as it goes to the children's fear and animosity toward the defendant. Indeed, we have even previously stated that domestic violence in the presence of children may constitute child abuse and that evidence of domestic violence is relevant to the issue of parental fitness. See generally Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W. Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992). Furthermore, the fact the plaintiff failed to file criminal charges for abuse against the defendant is of no consequence to the finding that such physical abuse occurred and had a dramatic impact on the children.

Footnote: 5 The family law master stated the "plaintiff does not like the defendant, and justifiably so because of the history of physical violence in their marriage."

Footnote: 6 In note 2 of Henry v. Johnson, 192 W. Va. 82, 86, 450 S.E.2d 779, 783 (1994), we found:

"By 1992, thirty-three states and the District of Columbia required Courts to consider domestic violence in determining custody and visitation. Developments in the Law: Legal Responses to Domestic Violence, 106 HARV.L.REV. 1597, 1603 (1993) (citing Barbara J. Hart, State Codes on Domestic Violence: Analysis, Commentary and Recommendations, 43 JUV. & FAM.CT.J., No. 4, 1992, at I, 29.)."

Footnote: 7 In Patricia Ann S., 190 W. Va. at 18, 435 S.E.2d at 18, Justice Workman quoted the following excerpt from L. Crites & D. Coker, What

Therapists See That Judges May Miss, The Judges' Journal 9, 11-12 (Spring 1988):

"'Children learn several lessons in witnessing the abuse of one of their parents. First, they learn that such behavior appears to be approved by their most important role models and that the violence toward a loved one is acceptable. Children also fail to grasp the full range of negative consequences for the violent behavior and observe, instead, the short term reinforcements, namely compliance by the victim. Thus, they learn the use of coercive power and violence as a way to influence loved ones without being exposed to other more constructive alternatives.

"'In addition to the effect of the destructive modeling, children who grow up in violent homes experience damaging psychological effects. There is substantial documentation that the spouse abuser's violence causes a variety of psychological problems for children. Children raised in a home in which spouse abuse occurs experience the same fear as do battered children. . . .

"'Spouse abuse results not only in direct physical and psychological injuries to the children, but, of greatest long-term importance, it breeds a culture of violence in future generations.'" (Footnotes omitted).

Workman, Justice, concurring:

I concur with the ultimate conclusion of the majority. Furthermore, I endorse and commend Justice Cleckley for incorporating into the law an immensely important concept:

> When family problems involving children are of sufficient depth and duration that professional counseling is needed to heal the relationships of the child or children with the parent or parents, or to assist the child or children in dealing with such emotional estrangement, a circuit court may direct participation in such counseling and may in its discretion determine how the cost of such counseling shall be paid.

The majority makes clear that such counselling can be ordered as a condition of visitation. In fact, this concept is so important that it should have been a syllabus point. Circuit courts should be aware that they have this discretion, and should exercise it liberally in appropriate situations.

In addition to emphasizing this point, I write separately to disagree in one area and to amplify in another.

SEXUAL ABUSE

First, in reviewing the family law master's finding, which was adopted by the circuit court and upheld by this Court, that there was no sexual abuse in this case, I would look to Justice Cleckley's explanation of our standard of review in In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., ___ W.Va. ___, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996):

> A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support it, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed.

Id., Syl. Pt. 1, in part. Using that standard, I for one am left with the "definite and firm conviction" that sexual abuse did occur, and I believe the case should have been reversed as to that finding. The six-year-old confided to his mother that his father touched and kissed his penis, and asked the child to touch his. Dr. McCallum's explanation that this was innocent touching associated with toilet training is not credible. A report compiled by Duke University after examining the boys over the course of a few days notes that pediatric textbooks generally state that children typically need no assistance in urinating by age four. Further, I cannot imagine what part kissing the penis of a six-year-old boy would play in his toilet training.

In addition to this incident, both children made statements to therapists and counselors See footnote 1 that indicated a knowledge of sexual specifics beyond their tender years. Susan Barrows McQuade, a psychologist who had counseled the boys for over two years, noted in her report that statements such as "He did something with his tongue that felt both good and bad," "He said 'I love you' when he touched my pee-pee," and "It makes me feel scared," made it difficult to think that anything but child sexual abuse had occurred. Billy told at least two interviewers that his father touched his private area or "did awful things" and told him not to tell because they would get into trouble. Dr. Christina Arco, a therapist treating the children, testified that Billy presented particularly violent behavior directed toward his father, including building traps and barricades, and even planning to kill his father. Numerous witnesses testified to how frightened the boys were of their father and how they would hide or lock themselves in the car when he came to pick them up for visitation. One woman who supervised visitation testified that the boys displayed a tremendous amount of hostility to their father, several times attempting to punch him in the penis, and emphasized that this was serious hostility, not mere horseplay. This information about specific incidents of sexually inappropriate activity, together with the behavioral indicators of sexual abuse noted by various counsellors and therapists, lead me to the conclusion that the circuit court's finding of no sexual abuse was clearly wrong.

The reason that such a finding is important in the long run is that it impacts quiet significantly on the next issue - - - supervised visitation.

SUPERVISED VISITATION

The opinion sets forth the important concept which we established in Mary D. that supervised visitation must be fashioned in a manner designed not only to actually protect the child, but also to make the child feel he is protected.

Where supervised visitation is ordered pursuant to W.Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1)[1991], the best interests of a child include determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience. The person(s) appointed to supervise the visitation should have had some prior contact with the child so that the child is sufficiently familiar with and trusting of that person in order for the child to have secure feelings and so that the visitation is not harmful to his or her emotional well being. Such a determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family law master or circuit court.

Syl. Pt. 3, Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W.Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992) (quoted in syllabus point 3 of the majority opinion). Furthermore, should the issue of supervision arise again in the future, the lower court should look to the standard established in Carter v. Carter:

> Because of the extraordinary nature of supervised visitation, such visitation should be ordered when necessary to protect the best interests of the children. In determining the best interests of the children when there are allegations of sexual or child abuse, the circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of supervised visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the abuse if the allegations are false against the risk of harm of unsupervised visitation to the child if the allegations are true.

___W.Va. ___, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996). When, as in the case before us, there is credible evidence of sexual abuse, the risk of harm to the child weighs heavily in this balance, and courts should err on the side of caution if necessary to protect children at risk of possible abuse.

Footnote: 1 I cannot leave this concurring opinion without commenting on the fact that the family law master below cast aspersions on the qualifications of counsellor Pamela Rockwell. Similarly, Justice Neely in several concurring and dissenting opinions, cast aspersions on Ms. Rockwell's abilities, indeed characterizing sexual abuse of children as a crime of fashion subject to mass hysteria. See Wilt v. Buracker, 191 W.Va. 39, 55, 443 S.E.2d 196, 212 (1993) (Neely, J., concurring); State v. Delaney, 187 W.Va. 212, 218, 417 S.E.2d 909 (1992) (Neely, J., dissenting); State ex rel. Spaulding v. Watt, 188 W.Va. 124, 128, 423 S.E.2d 217, 221 (1992) (Neely, J., dissenting); State v. Walter, 188 W.Va. 129, 132, 423 S.E.2d 222, 225 (1992) (Neely, J., concurring). The family law master has a duty and a right to determine who he finds credible, and Justice Neely had that right as well. However, after having had the opportunity as a circuit court judge for seven years to hear Ms. Rockwell testify on numerous occasions, I want the law books to reflect that this opinion as to her qualifications in judicial quarters is not unanimous. I have found Ms. Rockwell to have demonstrated extensive knowledge and training in the area of child sexual abuse. Frequently, counsellors and therapists, though not possessing a degree in psychology or psychiatry may have specialized training or experience in child sexual abuse which may render them even more knowledgeable and competent in that area that psychiatrists.

MARY D., Petitioner

v.

HONORABLE CLARENCE WATT, JUDGE OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF PUTNAM COUNTY, AND GEORGE D., Respondents

No. 20453

Submitted: January 14, 1992

Filed: May 29, 1992

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. Because an allegation of sexual abuse of a child involved in a divorce proceeding is extraordinary, such allegation would constitute "good cause" or grounds for a more expeditious resolution by the circuit court as contemplated by W. Va. Code, 48A-4-1(i) [1991], and accordingly, custody and visitation matters relating thereto may be retained by the circuit court, or, if already referred to a family law master, such referral may be revoked.

2. Prior to ordering supervised visitation pursuant to W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991], if there is an allegation involving whether one of the parents sexually abused the child involved, a family law master or circuit court must make a finding with respect to whether that parent sexually abused the child. A finding that sexual abuse has occurred must be supported by credible evidence. The family law master or circuit court may condition such supervised visitation upon the offending parent seeking treatment. Prior to ordering supervised visitation, the family law master or circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of such visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the sexual abuse against the risk of harm of such visitation to the child. Furthermore, the family law master or circuit court should ascertain that the allegation of sexual abuse under these circumstances is meritorious and if made in the context of the family law proceeding, that such allegation is reported to the appropriate law enforcement agency or prosecutor for the county in which the alleged sexual abuse took place. Finally, if the sexual abuse allegations were previously tried in a criminal case, then the transcript of the criminal case may be utilized to determine whether credible evidence exists to support the allegations. If the transcript is utilized to determine that credible evidence does or does not exist, the transcript must be made a part of the record in the civil proceeding so that this Court, where appropriate, may adequately review the civil record to conclude whether the lower court abused its discretion.

3. Where supervised visitation is ordered pursuant to W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991], the best interests of a child include determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience.

The person(s) appointed to supervise the visitation should have had some prior contact with the child so that the child is sufficiently familiar with and trusting of that person in order for the child to have secure feelings and so that the visitation is not harmful to his or her emotional well being. Such a determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family law master or circuit court.

J. Stephen Max
Charleston, West Virginia
Attorney for the Respondent, George D.

McHugh, Chief Justice:
This original proceeding is before the Court upon a petition for a writ of prohibition by Mary D. See footnote 1 The respondents are Clarence Watt, Judge of the Circuit Court of Putnam County, and George D. The petitioner seeks to prohibit enforcement of the September 11, 1991 order of the circuit court, which, in effect, granted the respondent, George D., visitation with his and Mary D.'s children.

I

In October, 1989, the petitioner filed a complaint seeking a divorce from George D., based upon cruel and inhuman treatment and irreconcilable differences. See footnote 2 Three children were born to the parties: Sara, who, at the time of the filing of the petition in this Court, was age 12; Susan, age 9; and Jesse, age 6.

The children's pediatrician, Dr. Joan Phillips, discovered that the girls, Sara and Susan, had been sexually abused. Susan named George D. as the perpetrator of such abuse.

In July, 1990, George D. was indicted in the Circuit Court of Putnam County on eight counts, consisting of sexual abuse, sexual assault, and incest. Prior to the indictment, George D. was permitted visitation with the children.

Following trial on the criminal charges in April, 1991, the respondent was acquitted of all eight charges. See footnote 3 Accordingly, subsequent to his acquittal, George D. filed a petition with the family law master requesting visitation with the three children. The family law master granted George D.'s request in an ex parte order, but two days later, that order was reversed by the family law master. See footnote 4

The family law master then ordered that an evidentiary hearing be conducted regarding visitation.

In June, 1991, the petitioner filed a motion requesting that the circuit court appoint a guardian ad litem and transfer the hearing on the custody and visitation issues from the family law master to the circuit court. The circuit court appointed a guardian ad litem, but denied the petitioner's request to hear the custody and visitation issues. The appointed guardian ad litem is Rosalee Juba-Plumbley.

A notice was sent to the petitioner setting the date of the hearing for August 14, 1991. At that hearing, the petitioner requested a continuance, but her request was denied. The family law master heard the testimony of David Wilburn, a psychologist. Both Wilburn and the guardian ad litem, Rosalee Juba-Plumbley, recommended that the respondent, George D., be permitted supervised visitation.

On August 16, 1991, the family law master entered an order recommending supervised visitation and that the petitioner, the respondent, and the children should all undergo an independent psychiatric evaluation. See footnote 5

The petitioner filed a motion to stay the order in the circuit court. The circuit court heard the parties' arguments on the motion and recommended that further argument on the motion be scheduled for a later date, specifically, October 3, 1991. See footnote 6 The circuit court, by ore tenus order, refused to stay the family law master's order permitting visitation by George D.

Before the scheduled October 3, 1991 hearing in circuit court, specifically, on September 19, 1991, the petitioner filed this writ of prohibition in this Court, seeking to prohibit visitation by the respondent, George D. At the initial oral argument, which was held on October 2, 1991, petitioner's counsel represented that the children were to be admitted to the Pines Treatment Center in Portsmouth, Virginia, beginning October 10, 1991. Counsel for the petitioner then moved that this Court continue the matter until the treatment program could be completed.

This Court, in an order prepared on October 4, 1991, issued a stay for 75 days and reset submission of this case for January 14, 1992. See footnote 7

As of the submission of this case on January 14, 1992, this Court was made aware that the children were still at the Pines Treatment Center. See footnote 8

II

The petitioner primarily contends that under W. Va. Code, 48A-4-1(i) [1991], the circuit court was confronted with "good cause" for revoking referral of the custody/visitation matter to the family law master.

W. Va. Code, 48A-4-1(i) [1991] provides that a circuit court may retain jurisdiction over certain matters, including child custody and visitation for "good cause," or "if the matter will be more expeditiously and inexpensively heard by the circuit judge without substantially affecting the rights of the parties[.]"

In support of her contention, the petitioner cites the fact that the respondent, Judge Watt, who presided over the criminal trial of George D., had already heard extensive testimony from the children and experts that the children were sexually abused, and accordingly, could make a finding of abuse in the civil divorce case.

The respondent merely contends that there was no abuse on the part of the circuit court because the very purpose of the family law master system is to allow such proceedings to take place before it, and not the circuit court.

Before we address the petitioner's contention that the circuit court abused its discretion by not revoking referral of certain matters to the family law master, we must first dispose of a matter which is constantly raised by the petitioner.

Throughout her pleadings filed in this Court, the petitioner contends that the circuit court has ignored the needs of the children by refusing to follow the procedures outlined in W. Va. Code, 49-6-1, et seq. Those procedures pertain to the processing of civil cases involving child neglect and child abuse. See footnote 9

However, this is not a proceeding brought under chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code. W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 [1977] makes it very clear as to the procedures that are required for presenting a petition where it is alleged that a child is being abused or neglected. W. Va. Code, 49-6-1(a) [1977] provides, in part: "If the state department [of human services] or a reputable person believes that a child is neglected or abused, the department or the person may present a petition setting forth the facts to the circuit court in the county in which the child resides[.]" (emphasis supplied) Accordingly, the petition before this Court is not sufficient to proceed under chapter 49, and there is no authority for this Court, by its original jurisdiction power, to make a "finding" of sexual abuse by the children's father upon which the termination of his parental rights may be based. See footnote 10

With respect to the question of whether or not there was an abuse of discretion on the part of the circuit court in not deciding the custody/visitation matter and allowing the family law master to decide such, this Court does not have before it the record of the criminal trial so as to determine if there was enough evidence to believe that "good cause" existed for the circuit court to revoke referral of that matter to the family law master. Therefore, the specific relief sought by the petitioner, that the circuit court abused its discretion in deciding the revocation issue, cannot be granted by this Court. However, the facts in this case raise troubling prospects which, if not properly addressed under the guidance of clearly set forth principles, may lead to serious problems for the welfare of children in this state.

As quoted previously, W. Va. Code, 48A-4-1 [1991] provides that a circuit court may retain jurisdiction over certain matters if there exists "good cause," or "if the matter will be more expeditiously and inexpensively heard by the circuit judge." This Court has recognized that "[i]t is clear that the powers possessed by a family law master are restricted to those conferred by statute." Segal v. Beard, 181 W. Va. 92, ___, 380 S.E.2d 444, 447 (1989). We believe that because an allegation of sexual abuse of a child involved in a divorce proceeding is extraordinary, such allegation would constitute "good cause" or grounds for a more expeditious resolution by the circuit court as contemplated by W. Va. Code, 48A-4-1(i) [1991], and accordingly, custody and visitation matters relating thereto may be retained by the circuit court, or, if already referred to a family law master, such referral may be revoked. See footnote 11

Permitting retention by the circuit court in such circumstances is especially appropriate due to the harm to a child caused by the delay of an appeal to the circuit court as well as by having to repeat the same testimony in more than one proceeding. The unfortunate realities of cases where a child is abused and the harm incurred by delays relating to the court system have recently been recognized by this Court. "Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security." Syl. pt. 1, in part, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

It has been established that "[s]exual abuse of a child by a parent or by others while the child is under the parent's care or control may result in termination or restriction of visitation rights." Child Custody & Visitation Law and Practice § 16.10[1] (J. McCahey gen. ed. 1991). On the other hand, some "courts have allowed visitation between a non-custodial parent and a child to continue even where there is evidence that the child has been sexually abused. Under such circumstances, courts often will continue to allow visitation, but will impose strict supervision." Id. (footnote omitted) "Generally, the decision as to whether visitation should be denied or restricted [under these circumstances] is exclusively that of the court." Id.

In Beckham v. O'Brien, 336 S.E.2d 375 (Ga. Ct. App. 1985), the Court of Appeals of Georgia reversed a lower court's ruling which found a mother in willful contempt for violating an order allowing visitation by the father. There, the father had been indicted for sexually molesting the parties' daughter. In reversing the lower court's order, the appeals court weighed the emotional and psychological aspects of the child's well being against the principle that the father had not been proven guilty in a criminal sense.

While we recognize that the father has not been convicted of molesting this child, we do not see this case as simply an angry mother pointing accusingly at her ex-husband in order to avoid his visitation rights. The father has been indicted by a grand jury. . . . For an indictment to be issued under this jurisdiction, the grand jury must be persuaded that there is probable cause to believe the party is guilty. . . .

> Upon reviewing the record and the transcript of the contempt hearing, we conclude that the trial court abused its discretion in ordering that the father be allowed to exercise visitation rights, albeit 'supervised visitation' rights, while the criminal charge is pending.
> 336 S.E.2d at 377 (emphasis in original).

We recognize that in this case, unlike Beckham, the father has already been tried on the charges of sexual abuse and acquitted. However, being found "not guilty" under the criminal standard of "beyond reasonable doubt" will not necessarily ease the emotional and psychological trauma, if any, suffered by the children if visitation, even if supervised, were to continue. Obviously, in a civil case, the standard would not be as stringent. Accordingly, this matter must be explored further by the circuit court.

This is not to imply that supervised visitation is not a reasonable course of action. Often, it is the most attractive option available. See Arnold v. Naughton, 486 A.2d 1204 (Ct. Spec. App.), cert. denied, 493 A.2d 349 (Md. 1985); Corwin v. Corwin, 366 N.W.2d 321 (Minn. Ct. App. 1985). On the other hand, it has been recognized that "[t]he only purpose served by supervision of visits is to allay anxiety. Such anxiety could be reduced with counseling of all parties so that visits could become unsupervised, flexible, and productive of the natural relationship that can exist between children and a noncustodial parent." In re Luke G., 498 A.2d 1054, 1059 (Conn. Super. Ct. 1985). In Luke G., there was no evidence that the children's father was a threat to their physical or emotional safety. Id. at 1059. In this case, that possibility exists as there may be such evidence. Obviously, the question of the propriety of supervised visitation would differ from case to case.

In Mallory v. Mallory, 539 A.2d 995 (Conn. 1988), the Supreme Court of Connecticut held that "the normal civil standard of proof, which is a fair preponderance of the evidence, is applicable in child custody hearings in which there are allegations that a parent has sexually abused his child, at least where that parent retains some visitation rights[.]" Id. at 998. In Mallory, the trial court had ordered that the father, against whom there was evidence that he had sexually abused his daughter, was permitted four hours of visitation per week under the supervision of the Superior Court's Family Relations Division. This portion of the trial court's order was affirmed by the Connecticut Supreme Court by upholding application of the preponderance of the evidence standard.

It has also been recognized that prior to even being considered for supervised visitation, a court may order that the sexually abusive parent enter a treatment program. See S.G.K. v. K.S.K., 374 N.W.2d 525 (Minn. Ct. App. 1985).

In D.L.M. v. L.E.M., 788 S.W.2d 753 (Mo. Ct. App. 1990), it was held that where the evidence demonstrated that the children manifested physical signs of sexual abuse by their father, then supervised visitation was proper under applicable statutory provisions. Similarly, in S.H. v. B.L.H., 572 A.2d 730 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1990), the court affirmed a trial court's ruling that evidence of sexual abuse by a father of his child warranted modification of a custody order to allow only supervised visitation.

The commonality of the cases discussed above is that they all involve a determination by the court or referee who presided over the divorce or family law issues as to whether the child had been sexually abused. We believe that in this case, a similar finding should be made in the family law proceeding prior to ordering supervised visitation if there is evidence that supports such a finding.

W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991] provides, in part:

> (b) Upon ordering the annulment of a marriage or a divorce or granting of decree of separate maintenance, the court may further order all or any part of the following relief:
>
> (1) The court may provide for the custody of minor children of the parties, subject to such rights of visitation, both in and out of the residence of the custodial parent or other person or persons having custody, as may be appropriate under the circumstances.

We believe that this statutory provision contemplates that a court may order supervised visitation if there is evidence that one of the parents has sexually abused a child involved. See footnote 12 In finding that a child has been sexually abused and that supervised visitation is proper, the petitioner urges this Court to adopt a standard of "clear and convincing" proof as used in proceedings to terminate parental rights under W. Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1984].

In syllabus point 6 to In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973), this Court held: "The standard of proof required to support a court order limiting or terminating parental rights to the custody of minor children is clear, cogent and convincing proof." (emphasis supplied) See Kenneth B. v. Elmer Jimmy S., 184 W. Va. 49, 53, 399 S.E.2d 192, 196 (1990); syl. pt. 1, In re Adoption of Schoffstall, 179 W. Va. 350, 368 S.E.2d 720 (1988); Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W. Va. 710, 715, 356 S.E.2d 464, 469 (1987).

Although the petitioner contends that clear and convincing proof should be the standard in this context, we do not believe that the standard should be so stringent. Rather, because termination of parental rights is not involved, but only supervised visitation, we believe that credible evidence of such sexual abuse allegations is all that is necessary for a family law master or circuit court to order supervised visitation. Furthermore, the risk of harm of supervised visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the abuse should be weighed against the risk of harm of supervised visitation to the child.

Where a family law master or circuit court is confronted with a case where a previous criminal proceeding was held involving the question of whether one parent sexually abused a child, this issue must be addressed in the civil proceeding. In other words, the family law master and circuit court should not just accept the criminal verdict of acquittal as a basis for ordering visitation, even if it is supervised visitation. Rather, because the visitation matter stems from a civil divorce proceeding, the family law master and circuit court should approach it with a view toward resolving the best interests of the parties involved in the civil proceeding.

Accordingly, we hold that prior to ordering supervised visitation pursuant to W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991], if there is an allegation involving whether one of the parents sexually abused the child involved, a family law master or circuit court must make a finding with respect to whether that parent sexually abused the child. A finding that sexual abuse has occurred must be supported by credible evidence. The family law master or circuit court may condition such supervised visitation upon the offending parent seeking treatment. Prior to ordering supervised visitation, the family law master or circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of such visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the sexual abuse against the risk of harm of such visitation to the child. Furthermore, the family law master or circuit court should ascertain that the allegation of sexual abuse under these circumstances is meritorious and if made in the context of the family law proceeding, that such allegation is reported to the appropriate law enforcement agency or prosecutor for the county in which the alleged sexual abuse took place. Cf. W. Va. Code, 49-6A-5 [1984] (local state department child protective service agency shall forward copy of report of child abuse and neglect to appropriate law enforcement agency, prosecuting attorney, coroner, or medical examiner). Finally, if the sexual abuse allegations were previously tried in a criminal case, then the transcript of the criminal case may be utilized to determine whether credible evidence exists to support the allegations. If the transcript is utilized to determine that credible evidence does or does not exist, the transcript must be made a part of the record in the civil proceeding so that this Court, where appropriate, may adequately review the civil record to conclude whether the lower court abused its discretion. Such utilization will not only promote the efficient administration of justice, but it will also spare the child witness from having to testify to traumatic matters on more than one occasion. See footnote 13

However, where supervised visitation is permitted, it is of paramount importance that the child's best interests be served by not only what the court deems is in his or best interests, but also, that the child feels safe when such visitation is exercised by the noncustodial parent. Accordingly, the person who supervises such visitation must be one with whom the child is comfortable and feels safe. It is not enough that the person who is appointed to supervise visitation is in the best interests of the child from the court's standpoint, which would merely assure that no further abuse will occur during such visitation. Rather, the fears of the child must be allayed as well so that the child may be protected not only from further physical harm, but also further psychological harm. Therefore, we hold that where supervised visitation is ordered pursuant to W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991], the best interests of a child include determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience. The person(s) appointed to supervise the visitation should have had some prior contact with the child so that the child is sufficiently familiar with and trusting of that person in order for the child to have secure feelings and so that the visitation is not harmful to his or her emotional well being. Such a determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family law master or circuit court.

In this case, there was no record developed on the question of whether, by credible evidence, the respondent, George D., sexually abused the children. Therefore, such a record must be developed. With respect to whether the circuit court should have revoked referral of the custody/visitation matter to the family law master, because this Court does not have before it the record of the proceedings of either the criminal trial or the hearing on the custody/visitation issue, this matter must be reviewed further by the circuit court so that that court, consistent with this opinion, may determine whether good cause existed for it to retain jurisdiction over the custody/visitation matters, or if retaining jurisdiction over those matters would result in a more expeditious resolution. However, as enunciated herein, the circuit court may utilize the transcript from the criminal proceeding to determine whether credible evidence exists, which is especially appropriate in this case because the same circuit judge presided over both the criminal and civil proceedings. Moreover, with respect to whether there was an abuse of discretion in ordering all parties (including the children) to undergo psychiatric evaluations, this Court cannot conclude that error is present because the record is inadequate in this respect as well. This, too, is a matter for further review by the circuit court. See footnote 14

Therefore, the petitioner's writ of prohibition is granted as moulded.

Footnote: 3 Due to an irregularity in the original indictment procedure, George D. was indicted again on the same eight charges in October, 1990. Consequently, the trial was delayed until April, 1991.

Footnote: 4 The family law master's reversal was based upon W. Va. Code, 48-2-13(e)(1) [1986], which requires a showing that immediate and irreparable injury will result if the ex parte relief is not granted. That section provides, in part:

(e) An ex parte order granting all or part of the relief provided for in this section may be granted without written or oral notice to the adverse party if:

(1) It appears from specific facts shown by affidavit or by the verified complaint that immediate and irreparable injury, loss or damage will result to the applicant before the adverse party or such party's attorney can be heard in opposition.

Footnote: 5 The family law master's order specified that the supervised visitation shall be conducted in a therapeutic setting and it also specified the psychologist, the location, and the frequency of such visitation.

Footnote: 6 At the time of the petitioner's motion to stay, the circuit court was in the midst of a criminal trial.

Footnote: 7 On October 9, 1991, the respondent, George D., petitioned for a rehearing regarding the October 4, 1991 order. This Court denied that petition.

On November 25, 1991, the respondent moved to modify the October 4, 1991 order, so as to allow him to communicate with the Pines Treatment Center at the Center's discretion and without the prior permission of the petitioner. This Court granted that relief.

Footnote: 8 Following the January 14, 1992 submission of this case, this Court was notified by the petitioner herself that the children would be at Pines until February 19, 1992. On February 25, 1992, the petitioner, by letter, notified this Court that she and the children have moved to Florida. On March 30, 1992, the respondent, George D., filed a "motion to proceed," alleging that the petitioner has given custody of the children to the Division of Human Services without notifying him, and requesting that this Court permit the family law master and/or the circuit court to hear the divorce matter but not the custody or visitation issue.

Footnote: 9 The petitioner also asserts that the proceeding before this Court is brought pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-1, et seq.

Footnote: 10 The petitioner also alleges that the prosecutor never filed an action for termination of parental or custodial rights. W. Va. Code, 49-6-10 [1984] imposes a duty upon a prosecutor to cooperate with the efforts of one seeking relief under W. Va. Code, 49-6-1, et seq. That section provides:

It shall be the duty of every prosecuting attorney to fully and promptly cooperate with persons seeking to apply for relief under the provisions of this article in all cases of suspected child abuse and neglect, to promptly prepare applications and petitions for relief requested by such persons, to investigate reported cases of suspected child abuse and neglect for possible criminal activity and to report at least annually to the grand jury regarding the discharge of his or her duties with respect thereto.

In this case, though, we are not confronted with the question as to why the prosecutor failed or decided not to participate in the filing of a petition under W. Va. Code, 49-6-1, et seq. We note that the provisions of chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code may undergo comprehensive revision pursuant to S. Con. Res. 16 and H. Con. Res. 21, adopted March 6, 1992. See Journal of the House of Delegates 297-99 (Feb. 4, 1992). We further point out that in its most recent session, the legislature amended various provisions of chapters 48 and 49, as well as other sections of the West Virginia Code, pertaining to family protection, which, had they been in effect during the pertinent events in this case, may have had some bearing herein.

We also note that W. Va. Code, 49-5-4 [1975] provides, in part: "A person under the age of eighteen years who appears before the circuit court in any capacity shall be deemed to be a ward of the court and protected accordingly."

Footnote: 11 We recently addressed the extraordinary nature of cases involving allegations of sexual abuse of children: "We believe that cases involving sexually abused children are unique. Given the often elusive nature of the evidence in sexual abuse allegations, such cases require a certain attention to detail that may not be as important in other maltreatment cases." Jennifer A. v. Burgess, No. 21009, at 6 (May 15, 1992) (unpublished order).

It has been observed by one commentator, in addressing allegations of sexual abuse with respect to visitation, that [t]he harm [of sexual abuse] is sufficiently grave that courts should award temporary custody to the nonabusing parent whenever there is reason to believe sexual abuse has occurred or is likely to occur.

While the evidence needed to establish reasonable belief comes from many sources, it is important to remember that child sexual abuse is often very difficult to prove [, so] courts should not place a heavy burden of proof on the petitioner. The threat to the child's welfare is so high if abuse is occurring that temporary custody should be granted when the petitioner raises 'questions going to the merits so serious, substantial, difficult and doubtful, as to make fair ground for litigation and thus for more deliberate investigation.'

. . . Bearing in mind the effects of sexual abuse, and the interim nature of temporary custody, the court should err in the direction of protecting sexually abused children. That is, improvidently granting temporary custody is less likely to harm a child than improvidently denying such custody.

J. Myers, Allegations of Child Sexual Abuse in Custody and Visitation Litigation: Recommendations for Improved Fact Finding and Child Protection, 28 J. Fam. L. 1, 37 (1989) (emphasis supplied) (internal footnote and citation omitted).

Footnote: 12 Some states have legislative authority which specifically provides for the ordering of supervised visitation. For example, Minn. Stat. Ann. § 518.175(1) (West 1990) provides, in part: "If the court finds, after a hearing, that visitation is likely to endanger the child's physical or emotional health or impair the child's emotional development, the court shall restrict visitation by the noncustodial parent as to time, place, duration, or supervision . . . as the circumstances warrant." (emphasis supplied) See also Mo. Ann. Stat. § 452.400(2) (Vernon 1986).

However, as stated above, we believe that the general provisions concerning visitation as contained in W. Va. Code, 48-2-15(b)(1) [1991] authorize a court to order supervised visitation.

Footnote: 13 Moreover, the inherent constitutional safeguards of a criminal proceeding will ensure that the defendant/accused parent will enjoy more protection with respect to what evidence will ultimately go in the civil record.

Footnote: 14 This case illustrates why prohibition is a difficult remedy due to the absence of an adequately developed record. However, in light of our holding, future cases with similar facts should have an adequately developed record so that, if appropriate, this Court may conclusively determine whether there has been an abuse of discretion.

497 U.S. 836, 110 S. Ct. 3157
Supreme Court of the United States
MARYLAND, Petitioner
v.
Sandra Ann CRAIG.
No. 89-478.

Argued April 18, 1990.
Decided June 27, 1990.

Syllabus FN*

FN* The syllabus constitutes no part of the opinion of the Court but has been prepared by the Reporter of Decisions for the convenience of the reader. See United States v. Detroit Lumber Co., 200 U.S. 321, 337, 26 S.Ct. 282, 287, 50 L.Ed. 499.

Respondent Craig was tried in a Maryland court on several charges related to her alleged sexual abuse of a 6-year-old child. Before the trial began, the State sought to invoke a state statutory procedure permitting a judge to receive, by one-way closed circuit television, the testimony of an alleged child abuse victim upon determining that the child's courtroom testimony would result in the child suffering serious emotional distress, such that he or she could not reasonably communicate. If the procedure is invoked, the child, prosecutor, and defense counsel withdraw to another room, where the child is examined and cross-examined; the judge, jury, and defendant remain in the courtroom, where the testimony is displayed. Although the child cannot see the defendant, the defendant remains in electronic communication with counsel, and objections may be made and ruled on as if the witness were in the courtroom. The court rejected Craig's objection that the procedure's use violates the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment, ruling that Craig retained the essence of the right to confrontation. Based on expert testimony, the court also found that the alleged victim and other allegedly abused children who were witnesses would suffer serious emotional distress if they were required to testify in the courtroom, such that each would be unable to communicate. Finding that the children were competent to testify, the court permitted testimony under the procedure, and Craig was convicted. The State Court of Special Appeals affirmed, but the State Court of Appeals reversed. Although it rejected Craig's argument that the Clause requires in all cases a face-to-face courtroom encounter between the accused and accusers, it found that the State's showing was insufficient to reach the high threshold required by Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012, 108 S.Ct. 2798, 101 L.Ed.2d 857 before the procedure could be invoked. The court held that the procedure usually cannot be invoked unless the child initially is questioned in the defendant's presence and that, before using the one-way television procedure, the trial court must determine whether a child would suffer severe emotional distress if he or she were to testify by two-way television.

Held:

1. The Confrontation Clause does not guarantee criminal defendants an absolute right to a face-to-face meeting with the witnesses against them at trial. The Clause's central purpose, to ensure the reliability of the evidence against a defendant by subjecting it to rigorous testing in an adversary proceeding before the trier of fact, is served by the combined effects of the elements of confrontation: physical presence, oath, cross-examination, and observation of demeanor by the trier of fact. Although face-to-face confrontation forms the core of the Clause's values, it is not an indispensable element of the confrontation right. If it were, the Clause would abrogate virtually every hearsay exception, a result long rejected as unintended and too extreme, Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 63, 100 S.Ct. 2531, 2537, 65 L.Ed.2d 597. Accordingly, the Clause must be interpreted in a manner sensitive to its purpose and to the necessities of trial and the adversary process. See, e.g., Kirby v. United States, 174 U.S. 47, 19 S.Ct. 574, 43 L.Ed. 890. Nonetheless, the right to confront accusatory witnesses may be satisfied absent a physical, face-to-face confrontation at trial only where denial of such confrontation is necessary to further an important public policy and only where the testimony's reliability is otherwise assured. Coy, supra, at 1021. Pp. 3162-3166.

2. Maryland's interest in protecting child witnesses from the trauma of testifying in a child abuse case is sufficiently important to justify the use of its special procedure, provided that the State makes an adequate showing of necessity in an individual case. Pp. 3166-3170.

(a) While Maryland's procedure prevents the child from seeing the defendant, it preserves the other elements of confrontation and, thus, adequately ensures that the testimony is both reliable and subject to rigorous adversarial testing in a manner functionally equivalent to that accorded live, in-person testimony. These assurances are far greater than those required for the admission of hearsay statements. Thus, the use of the one-way closed circuit television procedure, where it is necessary to further an important state interest, does not impinge upon the Confrontation Clause's truth-seeking or symbolic purposes. Pp. 3166-3167.

(b) A State's interest in the physical and psychological well-being of child abuse victims may be sufficiently important to outweigh, at least in some cases, a defendant's right to face his or her accusers in court. The fact that most States have enacted similar statutes attests to widespread belief in such a public policy's importance, and this Court has previously recognized that States have a compelling interest in protecting minor victims of sex crimes from further trauma and embarrassment, see, e.g., Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court of Norfolk County, 457 U.S. 596, 607, 102 S.Ct. 2613, 2620, 73 L.Ed.2d 248. The Maryland Legislature's considered judgment regarding the importance of its interest will not be second-guessed, given the State's traditional and transcendent interest in protecting the welfare of children and the growing body of academic literature documenting the psychological trauma suffered by child abuse victims who must testify in court. Pp. 3167-3169.

(c) The requisite necessity finding must be case specific. The trial court must hear evidence and determine whether the procedure's use is necessary to protect the particular child witness' welfare; find that the child would be traumatized, not by the courtroom generally, but by the defendant's presence; and find that the emotional distress suffered by the child in the defendant's presence is more than de minimis. Without determining the minimum showing of emotional trauma required for the use of a special procedure, the Maryland statute, which requires a determination that the child will suffer serious emotional distress such that the child cannot reasonably communicate, clearly suffices to meet constitutional standards. Pp. 3169-3170.

(d) Since there is no dispute that, here, the children testified under oath, were subject to full cross-examination, and were able to be observed by the judge, jury, and defendant as they testified, admitting their testimony is consonant with the Confrontation Clause, provided that a proper necessity finding has been made. P. 3170.

3. The Court of Appeals erred to the extent that it may have rested its conclusion that the trial court did not make the requisite necessity finding on the lower court's failure to observe the children's behavior in the defendant's presence and its failure to explore less restrictive alternatives to the one-way television procedure. While such evidentiary requirements could strengthen the grounds for the use of protective measures, only a case-specific necessity finding is required. This Court will not establish, as a matter of federal constitutional law, such categorical evidentiary prerequisites for the use of the one-way procedure. Pp. 3170-3171.

Justice O'CONNOR delivered the opinion of the Court.

This case requires us to decide whether the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment categorically prohibits a child witness in a child abuse case from testifying against a defendant at trial, outside the defendant's physical presence, by one-way closed circuit television.

I

In October 1986, a Howard County grand jury charged respondent, Sandra Ann Craig, with child abuse, first and second degree sexual offenses, perverted sexual practice, assault, and battery. The named victim in each count was a 6-year-old girl who, from August 1984 to June 1986, had attended a kindergarten and prekindergarten center owned and operated by Craig.

In March 1987, before the case went to trial, the State sought to invoke a Maryland statutory procedure that permits a judge to receive, by one-way closed circuit television, the testimony of a child witness who is alleged to be a victim of child abuse.[FN1] To invoke the procedure, the trial judge must first "determin[e] that testimony by the child victim in the courtroom will result in the child suffering serious emotional distress such that the child cannot reasonably communicate." Md.Cts. & Jud.Proc.Code Ann. § 9-102(a)(1)(ii) (1989). Once the procedure is invoked, the child witness, prosecutor, and defense counsel withdraw to a separate room; the judge, jury, and defendant remain in the courtroom. The child witness is then examined and cross-examined in the separate room, while a video monitor records and displays the witness' testimony to those in the courtroom. During this time the witness cannot see the defendant. The defendant remains in electronic communication with defense counsel, and objections may be made and ruled on as if the witness were testifying in the courtroom.

FN1. Maryland Cts. & Jud.Proc.Code Ann. § 9-102 of the Courts and Judicial Proceedings Article of the Annotated Code of Maryland (1989) provides in full:

"(a)(1) In a case of abuse of a child as defined in § 5-701 of the Family Law Article or Article 27, § 35A of the Code, a court may order that the testimony of a child victim be taken outside the courtroom and shown in the courtroom by means of a closed circuit television if:

"(i) The testimony is taken during the proceeding; and

"(ii) The judge determines that testimony by the child victim in the courtroom will result in the child suffering serious emotional distress such that the child cannot reasonably communicate.

"(2) Only the prosecuting attorney, the attorney for the defendant, and the judge may question the child.

"(3) The operators of the closed circuit television shall make every effort to be unobtrusive.

"(b)(1) Only the following persons may be in the room with the child when the child testifies by closed circuit television:

"(i) The prosecuting attorney;

"(ii) The attorney for the defendant;

"(iii) The operators of the closed circuit television equipment; and

"(iv) Unless the defendant objects, any person whose presence, in the opinion of the court, contributes to the well-being of the child, including a person who has dealt with the child in a therapeutic setting concerning the abuse.

"(2) During the child's testimony by closed circuit television, the judge and the defendant shall be in the courtroom.

"(3) The judge and the defendant shall be allowed to communicate with the persons in the room where the child is testifying by any appropriate electronic method.

"(c) The provisions of this section do not apply if the defendant is an attorney pro se.

"(d) This section may not be interpreted to preclude, for purposes of identification of a defendant, the presence of both the victim and the defendant in the courtroom at the same time."

For a detailed description of the § 9-102 procedure, see Wildermuth v. State, 310 Md. 496, 503-504, 530 A.2d 275, 278-279 (1987).

In support of its motion invoking the one-way closed circuit television procedure, the State presented expert testimony that the named victim as well as a number of other children who were alleged to have been sexually abused by Craig, would suffer "serious emotional distress such that [they could not] reasonably communicate,"§ 9-102(a)(1)(ii), if required to testify in the courtroom. App. 7-59. The Maryland Court of Appeals characterized the evidence as follows:

> "The expert testimony in each case suggested that each child would have some or considerable difficulty in testifying in Craig's presence. For example, as to one child, the expert said that what 'would cause him the most anxiety would be to testify in front of Mrs. Craig....' The child 'wouldn't be able to communicate effectively.' As to another, an expert said she 'would probably stop talking and she would withdraw and curl up.' With respect to two others, the testimony was that one would 'become highly agitated, that he may refuse to talk or if he did talk, that he would choose his subject regardless of the questions' while the other would 'become extremely timid and unwilling to talk.' " 316 Md. 551, 568-569, 560 A.2d 1120, 1128-1129 (1989).

Craig objected to the use of the procedure on Confrontation Clause grounds, but the trial court rejected that contention, concluding that although the statute "take[s] away the right of the defendant to be face to face with his or her accuser," the defendant retains the "essence of the right of confrontation," including the right to observe, cross-examine, and have the jury view the demeanor of the witness. App. 65-66. The trial court further found that, "based upon the evidence presented ... the testimony of each of these children in a courtroom will result in each child suffering serious emotional distress ... such that each of these children cannot reasonably communicate." Id., at 66. The trial court then found the named victim and three other children competent to testify and accordingly permitted them to testify against Craig via the one-way closed circuit television procedure. The jury convicted Craig on all counts, and the Maryland Court of Special Appeals affirmed the convictions, 76 Md.App. 250, 544 A.2d 784 (1988).

The Court of Appeals of Maryland reversed and remanded for a new trial. 316 Md. 551, 560 A.2d 1120 (1989). The Court of Appeals rejected Craig's argument that the Confrontation Clause requires in all cases a face-to-face courtroom encounter between the accused and his accusers, id., at 556-562, 560 A.2d, at 1122-1125, but concluded:

> "[U]nder § 9-102(a)(1)(ii), the operative 'serious emotional distress' which renders a child victim unable to 'reasonably communicate' must be determined to arise, at least primarily, from face-to-face confrontation with the defendant. Thus, we construe the phrase 'in the courtroom' as meaning, for sixth amendment and [state constitution] confrontation purposes, 'in the courtroom in the presence of the defendant.' Unless prevention of 'eyeball-to-eyeball' confrontation is necessary to obtain the trial testimony of the child, the defendant cannot be denied that right." Id., at 566, 560 A.2d, at 1127.

Reviewing the trial court's finding and the evidence presented in support of the § 9-102 procedure, the Court of Appeals held that, "as [it] read Coy [v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012, 108 S.Ct. 2798, 101 L.Ed.2d 857 (1988)], the showing made by the State was insufficient to reach the high threshold required by that case before § 9-102 may be invoked." Id. 316 Md., at 554-555, 560 A.2d, at 1121 (footnote omitted).

We granted certiorari to resolve the important Confrontation Clause issues raised by this case. 493 U.S. 1041, 110 S.Ct. 834, 107 L.Ed.2d 830 (1990).

II

The Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment, made applicable to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment, provides: "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right ... to be confronted with the witnesses against him."

We observed in Coy v. Iowa that "the Confrontation Clause guarantees the defendant a face-to-face meeting with witnesses appearing before the trier of fact." 487 U.S., at 1016, 108 S.Ct., at 2801 (citing Kentucky v. Stincer, 482 U.S. 730, 748, 749-750, 107 S.Ct. 2658, 2669, 2669, 2670, 96 L.Ed.2d 631 (1987) (MARSHALL, J., dissenting)); see also Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39, 51, 107 S.Ct. 989, 998, 94 L.Ed.2d 40 (1987) (plurality opinion); California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149, 157, 90 S.Ct. 1930, 1934, 26 L.Ed.2d 489 (1970); Snyder v. Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97, 106, 54 S.Ct. 330, 332, 78 L.Ed. 674 (1934); Dowdell v. United States, 221 U.S. 325, 330, 31 S.Ct. 590, 592, 55 L.Ed. 753 (1911); Kirby v. United States, 174 U.S. 47, 55, 19 S.Ct. 574, 577, 43 L.Ed. 890 (1899); Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237, 244, 15 S.Ct. 337, 340, 39 L.Ed. 409 (1895). This interpretation derives not only from the literal text of the Clause, but also from our understanding of its historical roots. See Coy, supra, 487 U.S., at 1015-1016, 108 S.Ct., at 2800; Mattox, supra, 156 U.S., at 242, 15 S.Ct. at 339 (Confrontation Clause intended to prevent conviction by affidavit); Green, supra, 399 U.S., at 156, 90 S.Ct., at 1934 (same); cf. 3 J. Story, Commentaries on the Constitution § 1785, p. 662 (1833).

We have never held, however, that the Confrontation Clause guarantees criminal defendants the absolute right to a face-to-face meeting with witnesses against them at trial. Indeed, in Coy v. Iowa, we expressly "le[ft] for another day ... the question whether any exceptions exist" to the "irreducible literal meaning of the Clause: 'a right to meet face to face all those who appear and give evidence at trial.' " 487 U.S., at 1021, 108 S.Ct., at 2803 (quoting Green, supra, 399 U.S., at 175, 90 S.Ct., at 1943 (Harlan, J., concurring)). The procedure challenged in Coy involved the placement of a screen that prevented two child witnesses in a child abuse case from seeing the defendant as they testified against him at trial. See 487 U.S., at 1014-1015, 108 S.Ct., at 2799-2800.

In holding that the use of this procedure violated the defendant's right to confront witnesses against him, we suggested that any exception to the right "would surely be allowed only when necessary to further an important public policy"-i.e., only upon a showing of something more than the generalized, "legislatively imposed presumption of trauma" underlying the statute at issue in that case. Id., at 1021, 108 S.Ct., at 2803; see also id., at 1025, 108 S.Ct., at 2805 (O'Connor, J., concurring). We concluded that "[s]ince there ha[d] been no individualized findings that these particular witnesses needed special protection, the judgment [in the case before us] could not be sustained by any conceivable exception." Id., at 1021, 108 S.Ct., at 2803. Because the trial court in this case made individualized findings that each of the child witnesses needed special protection, this case requires us to decide the question reserved in Coy.

[1] The central concern of the Confrontation Clause is to ensure the reliability of the evidence against a criminal defendant by subjecting it to rigorous testing in the context of an adversary proceeding before the trier of fact. The word "confront," after all, also means a clashing of forces or ideas, thus carrying with it the notion of adversariness. As we noted in our earliest case interpreting the Clause:

> "The primary object of the constitutional provision in question was to prevent depositions or ex parte affidavits, such as were sometimes > admitted in civil cases, being used against the prisoner in lieu of a personal examination and cross-examination of the witness in which the accused has an opportunity, not only of testing the recollection and sifting the conscience of the witness, but of compelling him to stand face to face with the jury in order that they may look at him, and judge by his demeanor upon the stand and the manner in which he gives his testimony whether he is worthy of belief." Mattox, supra, 156 U.S., at 242-243, 15 S.Ct., at 339-340.

As this description indicates, the right guaranteed by the Confrontation Clause includes not only a "personal examination," 156 U.S., at 242, 15 S.Ct., at 339, but also "(1) insures that the witness will give his statements under oath-thus impressing him with the seriousness of the matter and guarding against the lie by the possibility of a penalty for perjury; (2) forces the witness to submit to cross-examination, the 'greatest legal engine ever invented for the discovery of truth'; [and] (3) permits the jury that is to decide the defendant's fate to observe the demeanor of the witness in making his statement, thus aiding the jury in assessing his credibility." Green, supra, 399 U.S., at 158, 90 S.Ct., at 1935 (footnote omitted).

The combined effect of these elements of confrontation-physical presence, oath, cross-examination, and observation of demeanor by the trier of fact-serves the purposes of the Confrontation Clause by ensuring that evidence admitted against an accused is reliable and subject to the rigorous adversarial testing that is the norm of Anglo-American criminal proceedings. See Stincer, supra, 482 U.S., at 739, 107 S.Ct., at 2664 ("[T]he right to confrontation is a functional one for the purpose of promoting reliability in a criminal trial"); Dutton v. Evans, 400 U.S. 74, 89, 91 S.Ct. 210, 219, 27 L.Ed.2d 213 (1970) (plurality opinion) ("[T]he mission of the Confrontation Clause is to advance a practical concern for the accuracy of the truth-determining process in criminal trials by assuring that 'the trier of fact [has] a satisfactory basis for evaluating the truth of the [testimony]' "); Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530, 540, 106 S.Ct. 2056, 2061, 90 L.Ed.2d 514 (1986) (confrontation guarantee serves "symbolic goals" and "promotes reliability"); see also Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806, 818, 95 S.Ct. 2525, 2532, 45 L.Ed.2d 562 (1975) (Sixth Amendment "constitutionalizes the right in an adversary criminal trial to make a defense as we know it"); Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 684-685, 104 S.Ct. 2052, 2062-2063, 80 L.Ed.2d 674 (1984).

[2] We have recognized, for example, that face-to-face confrontation enhances the accuracy of factfinding by reducing the risk that a witness will wrongfully implicate an innocent person. See Coy, supra, 487 U.S., at 1019-1020, 108 S.Ct., at 2802 ("It is always more difficult to tell a lie about a person 'to his face' than 'behind his back.' ...That face-to-face presence may, unfortunately, upset the truthful rape victim or abused child; but by the same token it may confound and undo the false accuser, or reveal the child coached by a malevolent adult"); Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 63, n. 6, 100 S.Ct. 2531, 2537 n. 6, 65 L.Ed.2d 597 (1980); see also 3 W. Blackstone, Commentaries * 373-* 374. We have also noted the strong symbolic purpose served by requiring adverse witnesses at trial to testify in the accused's presence. See Coy, 487 U.S., at 1017, 108 S.Ct., at 2801 ("[T]here is something deep in human nature that regards face-to-face confrontation between accused and accuser as 'essential to a fair trial in a criminal prosecution' ") (quoting Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400, 404, 85 S.Ct. 1065, 1068, 13 L.Ed.2d 923 (1965)).

Although face-to-face confrontation forms "the core of the values furthered by the Confrontation Clause," Green, 399 U.S., at 157, 90 S.Ct., at 1934, we have nevertheless recognized that it is not the sine qua non of the confrontation right. See Delaware v. Fensterer, 474 U.S. 15, 22, 106 S.Ct. 292, 295, 88 L.Ed.2d 15 (1985) (per curiam) ("[T]he Confrontation Clause is generally satisfied when the defense is given a full and fair opportunity to probe and expose [testimonial] infirmities [such as forgetfulness, confusion, or evasion] through cross-examination, thereby calling to the attention of the factfinder the reasons for giving scant weight to the witness' testimony"); Roberts, supra, 448 U.S., at 69, 100 S.Ct., at 2540 (oath, cross-examination, and demeanor provide "all that the Sixth Amendment demands: 'substantial compliance with the purposes behind the confrontation requirement' ") (quoting Green, supra, 399 U.S., at 166, 90 S.Ct., at 1939); see also Stincer, 482 U.S. at 739-744, 107 S.Ct., at 2664-2667 (confrontation right not violated by exclusion of defendant from competency hearing of child witnesses, where defendant had opportunity for full and effective cross-examination at trial); Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308, 315-316, 94 S.Ct. 1105, 1109-1110, 39 L.Ed.2d 347 (1974); Douglas v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 415, 418, 85 S.Ct. 1074, 1076, 13 L.Ed.2d 934 (1965); Pointer, supra, 380 U.S., at 406-407, 85 S.Ct., at 1069; 5 J. Wigmore, Evidence § 1395, p. 150 (J. Chadbourn rev. 1974).

[3] For this reason, we have never insisted on an actual face-to-face encounter at trial in every instance in which testimony is admitted against a defendant. Instead, we have repeatedly held that the Clause permits, where necessary, the admission of certain hearsay statements against a defendant despite the defendant's inability to confront the declarant at trial. See, e.g., Mattox, 156 U.S., at 243, 15 S.Ct., at 339 ("[T]here could be nothing more directly contrary to the letter of the provision in question than the admission of dying declarations"); Pointer, supra, 380 U.S., at 407, 85 S.Ct., at 1069 (noting exceptions to the confrontation right for dying declarations and "other analogous situations"). In Mattox, for example, we held that the testimony of a Government witness at a former trial against the defendant, where the witness was fully cross-examined but had died after the first trial, was admissible in evidence against the defendant at his second trial. See 156 U.S., at 240-244, 15 S.Ct., at 338-340. We explained:

> "There is doubtless reason for saying that ... if notes of [the witness'] testimony are permitted to be read, [the defendant] is deprived of the advantage of that personal presence of the witness before the jury which the law has designed for his protection. But general rules of law of this kind, however beneficent in their operation and valuable to the accused, must occasionally give way to considerations of public policy and the necessities of the case. To say that a criminal, after having once been convicted by the testimony of a certain witness, should go scot free simply because death has closed the mouth of that witness, would be carrying his constitutional protection to an unwarrantable extent. The law in its wisdom declares that the rights of the public shall not be wholly sacrificed in order that an incidental benefit may be preserved to the accused." Id., at 243, 15 S.Ct., at 339-340.

We have accordingly stated that a literal reading of the Confrontation Clause would "abrogate virtually every hearsay exception, a result long rejected as unintended and too extreme." Roberts, 448 U.S., at 63, 100 S.Ct., at 2537. Thus, in certain narrow circumstances, "competing interests, if 'closely examined,' may warrant dispensing with confrontation at trial." Id., at 64, 100 S.Ct., at 2538 (quoting Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 295, 93 S.Ct. 1038, 1045, 35 L.Ed.2d 297 (1973), and citing Mattox, supra). We have recently held, for example, that hearsay statements of nontestifying co-conspirators may be admitted against a defendant despite the lack of any face-to-face encounter with the accused. See Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171, 107 S.Ct. 2775, 97 L.Ed.2d 144 (1987); United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387, 106 S.Ct. 1121, 89 L.Ed.2d 390 (1986). Given our hearsay cases, the word "confronted," as used in the Confrontation Clause, cannot simply mean face-to-face confrontation, for the Clause would then, contrary to our cases, prohibit the admission of any accusatory hearsay statement made by an absent declarant-a declarant who is undoubtedly as much a "witness against" a defendant as one who actually testifies at trial.

[4] In sum, our precedents establish that "the Confrontation Clause reflects a preference for face-to-face confrontation at trial," Roberts, supra, 448 U.S., at 63, 100 S.Ct., at 2537 (emphasis added; footnote omitted), a preference that "must occasionally give way to considerations of public policy and the necessities of the case," Mattox, supra, 156 U.S., at 243, 15 S.Ct., at 339-340. "[W]e have attempted to harmonize the goal of the Clause-placing limits on the kind of evidence that may be received against a defendant-with a societal interest in accurate factfinding, which may require consideration of out-of-court statements." Bourjaily, supra, 483 U.S., at 182, 107 S.Ct., at 2782. We have accordingly interpreted the Confrontation Clause in a manner sensitive to its purposes and sensitive to the necessities of trial and the adversary process. See, e.g., Kirby, 174 U.S., at 61, 19 S.Ct., at 578 ("It is scarcely necessary to say that to the rule that an accused is entitled to be confronted with witnesses against him the admission of dying declarations is an exception which arises from the necessity of the case"); Chambers, supra, 410 U.S., at 295, 93 S.Ct., at 1045 ("Of course, the right to confront and to cross-examine is not absolute and may, in appropriate cases, bow to accommodate other legitimate interests in the criminal trial process"). Thus, though we reaffirm the importance of face-to-face confrontation with witnesses appearing at trial, we cannot say that such confrontation is an indispensable element of the Sixth Amendment's guarantee of the right to confront one's accusers. Indeed, one commentator has noted that "[i]t is all but universally assumed that there are circumstances that excuse compliance with the right of confrontation." Graham, The Right of Confrontation and the Hearsay Rule: Sir Walter Raleigh Loses Another One, 8 Crim.L.Bull. 99, 107-108 (1972).

This interpretation of the Confrontation Clause is consistent with our cases holding that other Sixth Amendment rights must also be interpreted in the context of the necessities of trial and the adversary process. See, e.g., Illinois v. Allen, 397 U.S. 337, 342-343, 90 S.Ct. 1057, 1060, 25 L.Ed.2d 353 (1970) (right to be present at trial not violated where trial judge removed defendant for disruptive behavior); Ritchie, 480 U.S., at 51-54, 107 S.Ct., at 998-1000 (plurality opinion) (right to cross-examination not violated where State denied defendant access to investigative files); Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400, 410-416, 108 S.Ct. 646, 653-657, 98 L.Ed.2d 798 (1988) (right to compulsory process not violated where trial judge precluded testimony of a surprise defense witness); Perry v. Leeke, 488 U.S. 272, 280-285, 109 S.Ct. 594, 599-602, 102 L.Ed.2d 624 (1989) (right to effective assistance of counsel not violated where trial judge prevented testifying defendant from conferring with counsel during a short break in testimony). We see no reason to treat the face-to-face component of the confrontation right any differently, and indeed we think it would be anomalous to do so.

That the face-to-face confrontation requirement is not absolute does not, of course, mean that it may easily be dispensed with. As we suggested in Coy, our precedents confirm that a defendant's right to confront accusatory witnesses may be satisfied absent a physical, face-to-face confrontation at trial only where denial of such confrontation is necessary to further an important public policy and only where the reliability of the testimony is otherwise assured. See 487 U.S., at 1021, 108 S.Ct., at 2803 (citing Roberts, supra, 448 U.S. at 64, 100 S.Ct., at 2538; Chambers, supra, 410 U.S. at 295, 93 S.Ct., at 1045); Coy, supra, 487 U.S., at 1025, 108 S.Ct., at 2805 (O'Connor, J., concurring).

[5] Maryland's statutory procedure, when invoked, prevents a child witness from seeing the defendant as he or she testifies against the defendant at trial. We find it significant, however, that Maryland's procedure preserves all of the other elements of the confrontation right: The child witness must be competent to testify and must testify under oath; the defendant retains full opportunity for contemporaneous cross-examination; and the judge, jury, and defendant are able to view (albeit by video monitor) the demeanor (and body) of the witness as he or she testifies. Although we are mindful of the many subtle effects face-to-face confrontation may have on an adversary criminal proceeding, the presence of these other elements of confrontation-oath, cross-examination, and observation of the witness' demeanor-adequately ensures that the testimony is both reliable and subject to rigorous adversarial testing in a manner functionally equivalent to that accorded live, in-person testimony. These safeguards of reliability and adversariness render the use of such a procedure a far cry from the undisputed prohibition of the Confrontation Clause: trial by ex parte affidavit or inquisition, see Mattox, 156 U.S., at 242, 15 S.Ct., at 389; see also Green, 399 U.S., at 179, 90 S.Ct., at 1946 (Harlan, J., concurring) ("[T]he Confrontation Clause was meant to constitutionalize a barrier against flagrant abuses, trials by anonymous accusers, and absentee witnesses"). Rather, we think these elements of effective confrontation not only permit a defendant to "confound and undo the false accuser, or reveal the child coached by a malevolent adult," Coy, supra, 487 U.S., at 1020, 108 S.Ct., at 2802, but may well aid a defendant in eliciting favorable testimony from the child witness. Indeed, to the extent the child witness' testimony may be said to be technically given out of court (though we do not so hold), these assurances of reliability and adversariness are far greater than those required for admission of hearsay testimony under the Confrontation Clause. See Roberts, 448 U.S., at 66, 100 S.Ct., at 2539. We are therefore confident that use of the one-way closed circuit television procedure, where necessary to further an important state interest, does not impinge upon the truth-seeking or symbolic purposes of the Confrontation Clause.

The critical inquiry in this case, therefore, is whether use of the procedure is necessary to further an important state interest. The State contends that it has a substantial interest in protecting children who are allegedly victims of child abuse from the trauma of testifying against the alleged perpetrator and that its statutory procedure for receiving testimony from such witnesses is necessary to further that interest.

We have of course recognized that a State's interest in "the protection of minor victims of sex crimes from further trauma and embarrassment" is a "compelling" one. Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court of Norfolk County, 457 U.S. 596, 607, 102 S.Ct. 2613, 2620, 73 L.Ed.2d 248 (1982); see also New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 756-757, 102 S.Ct. 3348, 3354, 73 L.Ed.2d 1113 (1982); FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726, 749-750, 98 S.Ct. 3026, 3040-3041, 57 L.Ed.2d 1073 (1978); Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629, 640, 88 S.Ct. 1274, 1281, 20 L.Ed.2d 195 (1968); Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 168, 64 S.Ct. 438, 443, 88 L.Ed. 645 (1944). "[W]e have sustained legislation aimed at protecting the physical and emotional well-being of youth even when the laws have operated in the sensitive area of constitutionally protected rights." Ferber, supra, 458 U.S., at 757, 102 S.Ct., at 3354. In Globe Newspaper, for example, we held that a State's interest in the physical and psychological well-being of a minor victim was sufficiently weighty to justify depriving the press and public of their constitutional right to attend criminal trials, where the trial court makes a case-specific finding that closure of the trial is necessary to protect the welfare of the minor. See 457 U.S., at 608-609, 102 S.Ct., at 2620-21. This Term, in Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103, 110 S.Ct. 1691, 109 L.Ed.2d 98 (1990), we upheld a state statute that proscribed the possession and viewing of child pornography, reaffirming that " '[i]t is evident beyond the need for elaboration that a State's interest in "safeguarding the physical and psychological well-being of a minor" is "compelling." ' " Id., at 109, 110 S.Ct. at 1696 (quoting Ferber, supra, 458 U.S., at 756-757, 102 S.Ct., at 3354-55).

[6] We likewise conclude today that a State's interest in the physical and psychological well-being of child abuse victims may be sufficiently important to outweigh, at least in some cases, a defendant's right to face his or her accusers in court. That a significant majority of States have enacted statutes to protect child witnesses from the trauma of giving testimony in child abuse cases attests to the widespread belief in the importance of such a public policy. See Coy, 487 U.S., at 1022-1023, 108 S.Ct., at 2803-2804 (O'Connor, J., concurring) ("Many States have determined that a child victim may suffer trauma from exposure to the harsh atmosphere of the typical courtroom and have undertaken to shield the child through a variety of ameliorative measures"). Thirty-seven States, for example, permit the use of videotaped testimony of sexually abused children; [FN2] 24 States have authorized the use of one-way closed circuit television testimony in child abuse cases; [FN3] and 8 States authorize the use of a two-way system in which the child witness is permitted to see the courtroom and the defendant on a video monitor and in which the jury and judge are permitted to view the child during the testimony.[FN4]

The statute at issue in this case, for example, was specifically intended "to safeguard the physical and psychological well-being of child victims by avoiding, or at least minimizing, the emotional trauma produced by testifying." Wildermuth v. State, 310 Md. 496, 518, 530 A.2d 275, 286 (1987). The Wildermuth court noted:

> "In Maryland, the Governor's Task Force on Child Abuse in its Interim Report (Nov.1984) documented the existence of the [child abuse] problem in our State. Interim Report at 1. It brought the picture up to date in its Final Report (Dec.1985). In the first six months of 1985, investigations of child abuse were 12 percent more numerous than during the same period of 1984. In 1979, 4,615 cases of child abuse were investigated; in 1984, 8,321. Final Report at iii. In its Interim Report at 2, the Commission proposed legislation that, with some changes, became § 9-102. The proposal was 'aimed at alleviating the trauma to a child victim in the courtroom atmosphere by allowing the child's testimony to be obtained outside of the courtroom.' Id., at 2. This would both protect the child and enhance the public interest by encouraging effective prosecution of the alleged abuser." Id., at 517, 530 A.2d, at 285.

Given the State's traditional and " 'transcendent interest in protecting the welfare of children,' " Ginsberg, 390 U.S., at 640, 88 S.Ct., at 1281 (citation omitted), and buttressed by the growing body of academic literature documenting the psychological trauma suffered by child abuse victims who must testify in court, see Brief for American Psychological Association as Amicus Curiae 7-13; G. Goodman et al., Emotional Effects of Criminal Court Testimony on Child Sexual Assault Victims, Final Report to the National Institute of Justice (presented as conference paper at annual convention of American Psychological Assn., Aug.1989), we will not second-guess the considered judgment of the Maryland Legislature regarding the importance of its interest in protecting child abuse victims from the emotional trauma of testifying. Accordingly, we hold that, if the State makes an adequate showing of necessity, the state interest in protecting child witnesses from the trauma of testifying in a child abuse case is sufficiently important to justify the use of a special procedure that permits a child witness in such cases to testify at trial against a defendant in the absence of face-to-face confrontation with the defendant.

[7] The requisite finding of necessity must of course be a case-specific one: The trial court must hear evidence and determine whether use of the one-way closed circuit television procedure is necessary to protect the welfare of the particular child witness who seeks to testify. See Globe Newspaper Co., 457 U.S., at 608-609, 102 S.Ct., at 2621 (compelling interest in protecting child victims does not justify a mandatory trial closure rule); Coy, 487 U.S., at 1021, 108 S.Ct., at 2803; id., at 1025, 108 S.Ct., at 2805 (O'Connor, J., concurring); see also Hochheiser v. Superior Court, 161 Cal.App.3d 777, 793, 208 Cal.Rptr. 273, 283 (1984). The trial court must also find that the child witness would be traumatized, not by the courtroom generally, but by the presence of the defendant. See, e.g., State v. Wilhite, 160 Ariz. 228, 772 P.2d 582 (1989); State v. Bonello, 210 Conn. 51, 554 A.2d 277 (1989); State v. Davidson, 764 S.W.2d 731 (Mo.App.1989); Commonwealth v. Ludwig, 366 Pa.Super. 361, 531 A.2d 459 (1987). Denial of face-to-face confrontation is not needed to further the state interest in protecting the child witness from trauma unless it is the presence of the defendant that causes the trauma. In other words, if the state interest were merely the interest in protecting child witnesses from courtroom trauma generally, denial of face-to-face confrontation would be unnecessary because the child could be permitted to testify in less intimidating surroundings, albeit with the defendant present. Finally, the trial court must find that the emotional distress suffered by the child witness in the presence of the defendant is more than de minimis, i.e., more than "mere nervousness or excitement or some reluctance to testify," Wildermuth, supra, 310 Md., at 524, 530 A.2d, at 289; see also State v. Mannion, 19 Utah 505, 511-512, 57 P. 542, 543-544 (1899). We need not decide the minimum showing of emotional trauma required for use of the special procedure, however, because the Maryland statute, which requires a determination that the child witness will suffer "serious emotional distress such that the child cannot reasonably communicate,"§ 9-102(a)(1)(ii), clearly suffices to meet constitutional standards.

To be sure, face-to-face confrontation may be said to cause trauma for the very purpose of eliciting truth, cf. Coy, supra, 487 U.S., at 1019-1020, 108 S.Ct., at 2802-03, but we think that the use of Maryland's special procedure, where necessary to further the important state interest in preventing trauma to child witnesses in child abuse cases, adequately ensures the accuracy of the testimony and preserves the adversary nature of the trial. See supra, at 3166-3167. Indeed, where face-to-face confrontation causes significant emotional distress in a child witness, there is evidence that such confrontation would in fact disserve the Confrontation Clause's truth-seeking goal. See, e.g., Coy, supra, 487 U.S., at 1032, 108 S.Ct., at 2809 (BLACKMUN, J., dissenting) (face-to-face confrontation "may so overwhelm the child as to prevent the possibility of effective testimony, thereby undermining the truth-finding function of the trial itself"); Brief for American Psychological Association as Amicus Curiae 18-24; State v. Sheppard, 197 N.J.Super. 411, 416, 484 A.2d 1330, 1332 (1984); Goodman & Helgeson, Child Sexual Assault: Children's Memory and the Law, 40 U. Miami L.Rev. 181, 203-204 (1985); Note, Videotaping Children's Testimony: An Empirical View, 85 Mich.L.Rev. 809, 813-820 (1987).

[8] In sum, we conclude that where necessary to protect a child witness from trauma that would be caused by testifying in the physical presence of the defendant, at least where such trauma would impair the child's ability to communicate, the Confrontation Clause does not prohibit use of a procedure that, despite the absence of face-to-face confrontation, ensures the reliability of the evidence by subjecting it to rigorous adversarial testing and thereby preserves the essence of effective confrontation. Because there is no dispute that the child witnesses in this case testified under oath, were subject to full cross-examination, and were able to be observed by the judge, jury, and defendant as they testified, we conclude that, to the extent that a proper finding of necessity has been made, the admission of such testimony would be consonant with the Confrontation Clause.

[9] The Maryland Court of Appeals held, as we do today, that although face-to-face confrontation is not an absolute constitutional requirement, it may be abridged only where there is a " 'case-specific finding of necessity.' " 316 Md., at 564, 560 A.2d, at 1126 (quoting Coy, supra, 487 U.S., at 1025, 108 S.Ct., at 2805 (O'Connor, J., concurring)). Given this latter requirement, the Court of Appeals reasoned that "[t]he question of whether a child is unavailable to testify ... should not be asked in terms of inability to testify in the ordinary courtroom setting, but in the much narrower terms of the witness's inability to testify in the presence of the accused." 316 Md., at 564, 560 A.2d, at 1126 (footnote omitted). "[T]he determinative inquiry required to preclude face-to-face confrontation is the effect of the presence of the defendant on the witness or the witness's testimony." Id., at 565, 560 A.2d, at 1127. The Court of Appeals accordingly concluded that, as a prerequisite to use of the § 9-102 procedure, the Confrontation Clause requires the trial court to make a specific finding that testimony by the child in the courtroom in the presence of the defendant would result in the child suffering serious emotional distress such that the child could not reasonably communicate. Id., at 566, 560 A.2d, at 1127. This conclusion, of course, is consistent with our holding today.

In addition, however, the Court of Appeals interpreted our decision in Coy to impose two subsidiary requirements. First, the court held that "§ 9-102 ordinarily cannot be invoked unless the child witness initially is questioned (either in or outside the courtroom) in the defendant's presence." Id., at 566, 560 A.2d, at 1127; see also Wildermuth, 310 Md., at 523-524, 530 A.2d, at 289 (personal observation by the judge should be the rule rather than the exception). Second, the court asserted that, before using the one-way television procedure, a trial judge must determine whether a child would suffer "severe emotional distress" if he or she were to testify by two-way closed circuit television. 316 Md., at 567, 560 A.2d, at 1128.

Reviewing the evidence presented to the trial court in support of the finding required under § 9-102(a)(1)(ii), the Court of Appeals determined that "the finding of necessity required to limit the defendant's right of confrontation through invocation of § 9-102... was not made here." Id., at 570-571, 560 A.2d, at 1129. The Court of Appeals noted that the trial judge "had the benefit only of expert testimony on the ability of the children to communicate; he did not question any of the children himself, nor did he observe any child's behavior on the witness stand before making his ruling. He did not explore any alternatives to the use of one-way closed-circuit television." Id., at 568, 560 A.2d, at 1128 (footnote omitted). The Court of Appeals also observed that "the testimony in this case was not sharply focused on the effect of the defendant's presence on the child witnesses." Id., at 569, 560

A.2d, at 1129. Thus, the Court of Appeals concluded:

> "Unable to supplement the expert testimony by responses to questions put by him, or by his own observations of the children's behavior in Craig's presence, the judge made his § 9-102 finding in terms of what the experts had said. He ruled that 'the testimony of each of these children in a courtroom will [result] in each child suffering serious emotional distress ... such that each of these children cannot reasonably communicate.' He failed to find-indeed, on the evidence before him, could not have found-that this result would be the product of testimony in a courtroom in the defendant's presence or outside the courtroom but in the defendant's televised presence. That, however, is the finding of necessity required to limit the defendant's right of confrontation through invocation of § 9-102. Since that finding was not made here, and since the procedures we deem requisite to the valid use of § 9-102 were not followed, the judgment of the Court of Special Appeals must be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial." Id., at 570-571, 560 A.2d, at 1129 (emphasis added).

The Court of Appeals appears to have rested its conclusion at least in part on the trial court's failure to observe the children's behavior in the defendant's presence and its failure to explore less restrictive alternatives to the use of the one-way closed circuit television procedure. See id., at 568-571, 560 A.2d, at 1128-1129. Although we think such evidentiary requirements could strengthen the grounds for use of protective measures, we decline to establish, as a matter of federal constitutional law, any such categorical evidentiary prerequisites for the use of the one-way television procedure. The trial court in this case, for example, could well have found, on the basis of the expert testimony before it, that testimony by the child witnesses in the courtroom in the defendant's presence "will result in [each] child suffering serious emotional distress such that the child cannot reasonably communicate,"§ 9-102(a)(1)(ii). See id., at 568-569, 560 A.2d, at 1128-1129; see also App. 22-25, 39, 41, 43, 44-45, 54-57. So long as a trial court makes such a case-specific finding of necessity, the Confrontation Clause does not prohibit a State from using a one-way closed circuit television procedure for the receipt of testimony by a child witness in a child abuse case. Because the Court of Appeals held that the trial court had not made the requisite finding of necessity under its interpretation of "the high threshold required by [Coy] before § 9-102 may be invoked," 316 Md., at 554-555, 560 A.2d, at 1121 (footnote omitted), we cannot be certain whether the Court of Appeals would reach the same conclusion in light of the legal standard we establish today. We therefore vacate the judgment of the Court of Appeals of Maryland and remand the case for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

Justice SCALIA, with whom Justice BRENNAN, Justice MARSHALL, and Justice STEVENS join, dissenting.

Seldom has this Court failed so conspicuously to sustain a categorical guarantee of the Constitution against the tide of prevailing current opinion. The Sixth Amendment provides, with unmistakable clarity, that "[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right ... to be confronted with the witnesses against him." The purpose of enshrining this protection in the Constitution was to assure that none of the many policy interests from time to time pursued by statutory law could overcome a defendant's right to face his or her accusers in court. The Court, however, says:

> "We ... conclude today that a State's interest in the physical and psychological well-being of child abuse victims may be sufficiently important to outweigh, at least in some cases, a defendant's right to face his or her accusers in court. That a significant majority of States have enacted statutes to protect child witnesses from the trauma of giving testimony in child abuse cases attests to the widespread belief in the importance of such a public policy." Ante, at 3167.

Because of this subordination of explicit constitutional text to currently favored public policy, the following scene can be played out in an American courtroom for the first time in two centuries: A father whose young daughter has been given over to the exclusive custody of his estranged wife, or a mother whose young son has been taken into custody by the State's child welfare department, is sentenced to prison for sexual abuse on the basis of testimony by a child the parent has not seen or spoken to for many months; and the guilty verdict is rendered without giving the parent so much as the opportunity to sit in the presence of the child, and to ask, personally or through counsel, "it is really not true, is it, that I-your father (or mother) whom you see before you-did these terrible things?" Perhaps that is a procedure today's society desires; perhaps (though I doubt it) it is even a fair procedure; but it is assuredly not a procedure permitted by the Constitution.

Because the text of the Sixth Amendment is clear, and because the Constitution is meant to protect against, rather than conform to, current "widespread belief," I respectfully dissent.

I

According to the Court, "we cannot say that [face-to-face] confrontation [with witnesses appearing at trial] is an indispensable element of the Sixth Amendment's guarantee of the right to confront one's accusers." Ante, at 3166. That is rather like saying "we cannot say that being tried before a jury is an indispensable element of the Sixth Amendment's guarantee of the right to jury trial." The Court makes the impossible plausible by recharacterizing the Confrontation Clause, so that confrontation (redesignated "face-to-face confrontation") becomes only one of many "elements of confrontation." Ante, at 3163-3164. The reasoning is as follows: The Confrontation Clause guarantees not only what it explicitly provides for-"face-to-face" confrontation-but also implied and collateral rights such as cross-examination, oath, and observation of demeanor (TRUE); the purpose of this entire cluster of rights is to ensure the reliability of evidence (TRUE); the Maryland procedure preserves the implied and collateral rights (TRUE), which adequately ensure the reliability of evidence (perhaps TRUE); therefore the Confrontation Clause is not violated by denying what it explicitly provides for-"face-to-face" confrontation (unquestionably FALSE). This reasoning abstracts from the right to its purposes, and then eliminates the right. It is wrong because the Confrontation Clause does not guarantee reliable evidence; it guarantees specific trial procedures that were thought to assure reliable evidence, undeniably among which was "face-to-face" confrontation. Whatever else it may mean in addition, the defendant's constitutional right "to be confronted with the witnesses against him" means, always and everywhere, at least what it explicitly says: the " 'right to meet face to face all those who appear and give evidence at trial.' " Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012, 1016, 108 S.Ct. 2798, 2800, 101 L.Ed.2d 857 (1988), quoting California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149, 175, 90 S.Ct. 1930, 1943-44, 26 L.Ed.2d 489 (1970) (Harlan, J., concurring).

The Court supports its antitextual conclusion by cobbling together scraps of dicta from various cases that have no bearing here. It will suffice to discuss one of them, since they are all of a kind: Quoting Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 63, 100 S.Ct. 2531, 2537, 65 L.Ed.2d 597 (1980), the Court says that "[i]n sum, our precedents establish that 'the Confrontation Clause reflects a preference for face-to-face confrontation at trial,' "ante, at 3165. (emphasis added by the Court). But Roberts, and all the other "precedents" the Court enlists to prove the implausible, dealt with the implications of the Confrontation Clause, and not its literal, unavoidable text. When Roberts said that the Clause merely "reflects a preference for face-to-face confrontation at trial," what it had in mind as the nonpreferred alternative was not (as the Court implies) the appearance of a witness at trial without confronting the defendant. That has been, until today, not merely "nonpreferred" but utterly unheard-of. What Roberts had in mind was the receipt of other-than-first-hand testimony from witnesses at trial-that is, witnesses' recounting of hearsay statements by absent parties who, since they did not appear at trial, did not have to endure face-to-face confrontation. Rejecting that, I agree, was merely giving effect to an evident constitutional preference; there are, after all, many exceptions to the Confrontation Clause's hearsay rule. But that the defendant should be confronted by the witnesses who appear at trial is not a preference "reflected" by the Confrontation Clause; it is a constitutional right unqualifiedly guaranteed.

The Court claims that its interpretation of the Confrontation Clause "is consistent with our cases holding that other Sixth Amendment rights must also be interpreted in the context of the necessities of trial and the adversary process." Ante, at 3166. I disagree. It is true enough that the "necessities of trial and the adversary process" limit the manner in which Sixth Amendment rights may be exercised, and limit the scope of Sixth Amendment guarantees to the extent that scope is textually indeterminate. Thus (to describe the cases the Court cites): The right to confront is not the right to confront in a manner that disrupts the trial. Illinois v. Allen, 397 U.S. 337, 90 S.Ct. 1057, 25 L.Ed.2d 353 (1970). The right "to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses" is not the right to call witnesses in a manner that violates fair and orderly procedures. Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400, 108 S.Ct. 646, 98 L.Ed.2d 798 (1988). The scope of the right "to have the assistance of counsel" does not include consultation with counsel at all times during the trial. Perry v. Leeke, 488 U.S. 272, 109 S.Ct. 594, 102 L.Ed.2d 624 (1989). The scope of the right to cross-examine does not include access to the State's investigative files. Pennsylvania v. Ritchie, 480 U.S. 39, 107 S.Ct. 989, 94 L.Ed.2d 40 (1987). But we are not talking here about denying expansive scope to a Sixth Amendment provision whose scope for the purpose at issue is textually unclear; "to confront" plainly means to encounter face-to-face, whatever else it may mean in addition. And we are not talking about the manner of arranging that face-to-face encounter, but about whether it shall occur at all. The "necessities of trial and the adversary process" are irrelevant here, since they cannot alter the constitutional text.

II

Much of the Court's opinion consists of applying to this case the mode of analysis we have used in the admission of hearsay evidence. The Sixth Amendment does not literally contain a prohibition upon such evidence, since it guarantees the defendant only the right to confront "the witnesses against him." As applied in the Sixth Amendment's context of a prosecution, the noun "witness"-in 1791 as today-could mean either (a) one "who knows or sees any thing; one personally present" or (b) "one who gives testimony" or who "testifies," i.e.,"[i]n judicial proceedings, [one who] make[s] a solemn declaration under oath, for the purpose of establishing or making proof of some fact to a court." 2 N. Webster, An American Dictionary of the English Language (1828) (emphasis added). See also J. Buchanan, Linguae Britannicae Vera Pronunciatio (1757). The former meaning (one "who knows or sees") would cover hearsay evidence, but is excluded in the Sixth Amendment by the words following the noun: "witnesses against him." The phrase obviously refers to those who give testimony against the defendant at trial. We have nonetheless found implicit in the Confrontation Clause some limitation upon hearsay evidence, since otherwise the government could subvert the confrontation right by putting on witnesses who know nothing except what an absent declarant said. And in determining the scope of that implicit limitation, we have focused upon whether the reliability of the hearsay statements (which are not expressly excluded by the Confrontation Clause) "is otherwise assured." Ante, at 3166. The same test cannot be applied, however, to permit what is explicitly forbidden by the constitutional text; there is simply no room for interpretation with regard to "the irreducible literal meaning of the Clause." Coy, supra, 487 U.S., at 1020-1021, 108 S.Ct., at 2803.

Some of the Court's analysis seems to suggest that the children's testimony here was itself hearsay of the sort permissible under our Confrontation Clause cases. See ante, at 3166-3167. That cannot be. Our Confrontation Clause conditions for the admission of hearsay have long included a "general requirement of unavailability" of the declarant. Idaho v. Wright, 497 U.S. 805, 815, 110 S.Ct. 3139, 3146, 111 L.Ed.2d 638. "In the usual case ..., the prosecution must either produce, or demonstrate the unavailability of, the declarant whose statement it wishes to use against the defendant." Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S., at 65, 100 S.Ct., at 2538. We have permitted a few exceptions to this general rule-e.g., for co-conspirators' statements, whose effect cannot be replicated by live testimony because they "derive [their] significance from the circumstances in which [they were] made," United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387, 395, 106 S.Ct. 1121, 1126, 89 L.Ed.2d 390 (1986). "Live" closed-circuit television testimony, however-if it can be called hearsay at all-is surely an example of hearsay as "a weaker substitute for live testimony," id., at 394, 106 S.Ct., at 1126, which can be employed only when the genuine article is unavailable. "When two versions of the same evidence are available, longstanding principles of the law of hearsay, applicable as well to Confrontation Clause analysis, favor the better evidence." Ibid. See also Roberts, supra (requiring unavailability as precondition for admission of prior testimony); Barber v. Page, 390 U.S. 719, 88 S.Ct. 1318, 20 L.Ed.2d 255 (1968) (same).

The Court's test today requires unavailability only in the sense that the child is unable to testify in the presence of the defendant.[FN1] That cannot possibly be the relevant sense. If unconfronted testimony is admissible hearsay when the witness is unable to confront the defendant, then presumably there are other categories of admissible hearsay consisting of unsworn testimony when the witness is unable to risk perjury, un-cross-examined testimony when the witness is unable to undergo hostile questioning, etc. California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149, 90 S.Ct. 1930, 26 L.Ed.2d 489 (1970), is not precedent for such a silly system. That case held that the Confrontation Clause does not bar admission of prior testimony when the declarant is sworn as a witness but refuses to answer. But in Green, as in most cases of refusal, we could not know why the declarant refused to testify. Here, by contrast, we know that it is precisely because the child is unwilling to testify in the presence of the defendant. That unwillingness cannot be a valid excuse under the Confrontation Clause, whose very object is to place the witness under the sometimes hostile glare of the defendant. "That face-to-face presence may, unfortunately, upset the truthful rape victim or abused child; but by the same token it may confound and undo the false accuser, or reveal the child coached by a malevolent adult." Coy, 487 U.S., at 1020, 108 S.Ct., at 2802. To say that a defendant loses his right to confront a witness when that would cause the witness not to testify is rather like saying that the defendant loses his right to counsel when counsel would save him, or his right to subpoena witnesses when they would exculpate him, or his right not to give testimony against himself when that would prove him guilty.

FN1. I presume that when the Court says "trauma would impair the child's ability to communicate,"ante, at 3170, it means that trauma would make it impossible for the child to communicate. That is the requirement of the Maryland law at issue here: "serious emotional distress such that the child cannot reasonably communicate." Md.Cts. & Jud.Proc.Code Ann. § 9-102(a)(1)(ii) (1989). Any implication beyond that would in any event be dictum.

The Court characterizes the State's interest which "outweigh[s]" the explicit text of the Constitution as an "interest in the physical and psychological well-being of child abuse victims,"ante, at 3167, an "interest in protecting" such victims "from the emotional trauma of testifying,"ante, at 3169. That is not so. A child who meets the Maryland statute's requirement of suffering such "serious emotional distress" from confrontation that he "cannot reasonably communicate" would seem entirely safe. Why would a prosecutor want to call a witness who cannot reasonably communicate? And if he did, it would be the State's own fault. Protection of the child's interest-as far as the Confrontation Clause is concerned [FN2]-is entirely within Maryland's control. The State's interest here is in fact no more and no less than what the State's interest always is when it seeks to get a class of evidence admitted in criminal proceedings: more convictions of guilty defendants. That is not an unworthy interest, but it should not be dressed up as a humanitarian one.

FN2. A different situation would be presented if the defendant sought to call the child. In that event, the State's refusal to compel the child to appear, or its insistence upon a procedure such as that set forth in the Maryland statute as a condition of its compelling him to do so, would call into question-initially, at least, and perhaps exclusively-the scope of the defendant's Sixth Amendment right "to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor."

And the interest on the other side is also what it usually is when the State seeks to get a new class of evidence admitted: fewer convictions of innocent defendants-specifically, in the present context, innocent defendants accused of particularly heinous crimes. The "special" reasons that exist for suspending one of the usual guarantees of reliability in the case of children's testimony are perhaps matched by "special" reasons for being particularly insistent upon it in the case of children's testimony. Some studies show that children are substantially more vulnerable to suggestion than adults, and often unable to separate recollected fantasy (or suggestion) from reality. See Lindsay & Johnson, Reality Monitoring and Suggestibility: Children's Ability to Discriminate Among Memories From Different Sources, in Children's Eyewitness Memory 92 (S. Ceci, M. Toglia, & D. Ross eds. 1987); Feher, The Alleged Molestation Victim, The Rules of Evidence, and the Constitution: Should Children Really Be Seen and Not Heard?, 14 Am.J.Crim.L. 227, 230-233 (1987); Christiansen, The Testimony of Child Witnesses: Fact, Fantasy, and the Influence of Pretrial Interviews, 62 Wash.L.Rev. 705, 708-711 (1987). The injustice their erroneous testimony can produce is evidenced by the tragic Scott County investigations of 1983-1984, which disrupted the lives of many (as far as we know) innocent people in the small town of Jordan, Minnesota. At one stage those investigations were pursuing allegations by at least eight children of multiple murders, but the prosecutions actually initiated charged only sexual abuse. Specifically, 24 adults were charged with molesting 37 children. In the course of the investigations, 25 children were placed in foster homes. Of the 24 indicted defendants, one pleaded guilty, two were acquitted at trial, and the charges against the remaining 21 were voluntarily dismissed. See Feher, supra, at 239-240. There is no doubt that some sexual abuse took place in Jordan; but there is no reason to believe it was as widespread as charged. A report by the Minnesota attorney general's office, based on inquiries conducted by the Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, concluded that there was an "absence of credible testimony and [a] lack of significant corroboration" to support reinstitution of sex-abuse charges, and "no credible evidence of murders." H. Humphrey, Report on Scott County Investigation 8, 7 (1985). The report describes an investigation full of well-intentioned techniques employed by the prosecution team, police, child protection workers, and foster parents, that distorted and in some cases even coerced the children's recollection. Children were interrogated repeatedly, in some cases as many as 50 times, id., at 9; answers were suggested by telling the children what other witnesses had said, id., at 11; and children (even some who did not at first complain of abuse) were separated from their parents for months, id., at 9. The report describes the consequences as follows:

> "As children continued to be interviewed the list of accused citizens grew. In a number of cases, it was only after weeks or months of questioning that children would 'admit' their parents abused them.
> . . . . .
> "In some instances, over a period of time, the allegations of sexual abuse turned to stories of mutilations, and eventually homicide." Id., at 10-11.

The value of the confrontation right in guarding against a child's distorted or coerced recollections is dramatically evident with respect to one of the misguided investigative techniques the report cited: some children were told by their foster parents that reunion with their real parents would be hastened by "admission" of their parents' abuse. Id., at 9. Is it difficult to imagine how unconvincing such a testimonial admission might be to a jury that witnessed the child's delight at seeing his parents in the courtroom? Or how devastating it might be if, pursuant to a psychiatric evaluation that "trauma would impair the child's ability to communicate" in front of his parents, the child were permitted to tell his story to the jury on closed-circuit television?

In the last analysis, however, this debate is not an appropriate one. I have no need to defend the value of confrontation, because the Court has no authority to question it. It is not within our charge to speculate that, "where face-to-face confrontation causes significant emotional distress in a child witness," confrontation might "in fact disserve the Confrontation Clause's truth-seeking goal." Ante, at 3169. If so, that is a defect in the Constitution-which should be amended by the procedures provided for such an eventuality, but cannot be corrected by judicial pronouncement that it is archaic, contrary to "widespread belief," and thus null and void. For good or bad, the Sixth Amendment requires confrontation, and we are not at liberty to ignore it. To quote the document one last time (for it plainly says all that need be said): "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right ... to be confronted with the witnesses against him" (emphasis added).

The Court today has applied "interest-balancing" analysis where the text of the Constitution simply does not permit it. We are not free to conduct a cost-benefit analysis of clear and explicit constitutional guarantees, and then to adjust their meaning to comport with our findings. The Court has convincingly proved that the Maryland procedure serves a valid interest, and gives the defendant virtually everything the Confrontation Clause guarantees (everything, that is, except confrontation). I am persuaded, therefore, that the Maryland procedure is virtually constitutional. Since it is not, however, actually constitutional I would affirm the judgment of the Maryland Court of Appeals reversing the judgment of conviction.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

DONALD C. McCORMICK, Plaintiff Below, Appellant,

v.

ALLSTATE INSURANCE COMPANY and DAVID DAILEY,

Defendants Below, Appellee

Submitted: April 24, 1996

Filed: July 18, 1996

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard.

2. "Whenever a policyholder substantially prevails in a property damage suit against its insurer, the insurer is liable for: (1) the insured's reasonable attorneys' fees in vindicating its claim; (2) the insured's damages for net economic loss caused by the delay in settlement, and damages for aggravation and inconvenience." Syllabus point 1, Hayseeds, Inc. v. State Farm Fire & Casualty, 177 W.Va. 323, 352 S.E.2d 73 (1986).

3. To recover attorney fees and net economic loss damages and damages for aggravation and inconvenience under syllabus point 1 of Hayseeds, Inc. v. State Farm Fire & Casualty, 177 W.Va. 323, 352 S.E.2d 73 (1986), it is not necessary that a plaintiff show bad faith.

4. Damages for aggravation and inconvenience in a claim under Hayseeds, Inc. v. State Farm Fire & Casualty, 177 W.Va. 323, 352 S.E.2d 73 (1986), are not limited to damages associated with loss of use of the personal property but relate as well to the aggravation and inconvenience shown in the entire claims collection process.

5. "An insurer cannot be held liable for punitive damages by its refusal to pay on an insured's property damage claim unless such refusal is accompanied by a malicious intention to injure or defraud." Syllabus point 2, Hayseeds, Inc. v. State Farm Fire & Casualty, 177 W.Va. 323, 352 S.E.2d 73 (1986).

6. "An implied private cause of action may exist for a violation by an insurance company of the unfair settlement practice provisions of W.Va. Code, 33-11-4(9); but such implied private cause of action cannot be maintained until the underlying suit is resolved." Syllabus point 2, Jenkins v. J.C. Penney Casualty Insurance Company, 167 W.Va. 597, 280 S.E.2d 252 (1981).

7. "More than a single isolated violation of W.Va. Code, 33-11-4(9), must be shown in order to meet the statutory requirement of an indication of 'a general business practice,' which requirement must be shown in order to maintain the statutory implied cause of action." Syllabus point 3, Jenkins v. J.C. Penney Casualty Insurance Company, 167 W.Va. 597, 280 S.E.2d 252 (1981).

8. Punitive damages for failure to settle a property dispute shall not be awarded against an insurance company unless the policyholder can establish a high threshold of actual malice in the settlement process. By "actual malice" we mean that the company actually knew that the policyholder's claim was proper, but willfully, maliciously and intentionally denied the claim.

9. The conditions and predicate for bringing a case under Jenkins v. J.C. Penney Casualty Insurance Company, 167 W.Va. 597, 280 S.E.2d 252 (1981), are wholly different from those necessary for bringing an underlying contract action or for bringing an action under Hayseeds, Inc. v. State Farm Fire & Casualty, 177 W.Va. 323, 352 S.E.2d 73 (1986). Whereas under Hayseeds it is necessary that a policyholder substantially prevail on an underlying contract action before he may recover enhanced damages, under Jenkins there is no requirement that one substantially prevail; it is required that liability and damages be settled previously or in the course of the Jenkins litigation. Jenkins instead predicates entitlement to relief solely upon violation of the West Virginia Unfair Trade Practices Act, W.Va. Code 33-11-4(9), where such violation arises from a "general business practice" on the part of the insurer.

Albright, Justice:
The appellant in this proceeding, Donald McCormick, is appealing from a final order of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, West Virginia, in an action which was instituted against his automobile insurer under an automobile policy, Allstate Insurance Company (Allstate). In count one of his complaint, the appellant claimed that Allstate not only failed to honor its insurance contract, but also breached its duty of good faith and fair dealing in handling his claim. As we interpret the claims pleaded and tried, the appellant asserted a cause of action under the principles first enunciated by this Court in Hayseeds, Inc. v. State Farm Firm & Casualty, 177 W.Va. 323, 352 S.E.2d 73 (1986). In a second count, he claimed that Allstate had violated the West Virginia Fair Trade Practices Act, W.Va. Code 33-11-4(9), and he sought attorney fees and punitive damages under the principles set out in Jenkins v. J.C. Penney Casualty Insurance Company, 167 W.Va. 597, 280 S.E.2d 252 (1981).

Before the case was actually tried, the circuit court ordered that the trial be bifurcated, with the Hayseeds issues to be tried first and the Jenkins issues to be tried later. The Hayseeds trial resulted in the jury awarding the appellant $995.00 in compensatory damages. Because this amount was substantially less than what the court found the appellant had initially demanded, the court ruled that the appellant had not "substantially prevailed" in his underlying case and that, as a consequence, he was not entitled to pursue his attorney fees and punitive damages. In so doing, the court effectively precluded the appellant from seeking further his Hayseeds and his Jenkins relief.

On appeal, the appellant makes a number of assignments of error which, combined, pose the question of whether the court appropriately precluded the appellant from pursuing his claims for Hayseeds and Jenkins relief after the jury returned its compensatory damages award.

After reviewing the questions raised, this Court cannot conclude that the trial court committed reversible error in denying the appellant attorney fees or in precluding him from seeking punitive damages on the count tried, that is, the Hayseeds count. The Court does believe, however, that the trial court erred in denying the appellant a trial on the Jenkins issue and reversed and remands on that point.

FACTS

The appellant owned a 1984 Ford Escort, which was insured by the appellee, Allstate Insurance Company (Allstate). This vehicle was damaged in a collision on August 28, 1988, and the appellant made a claim under his own insurance policy with Allstate for the damages to the vehicle.

David Dailey, the Allstate adjuster who handled the claim, inspected the vehicle and determined it was a total loss. Allstate calculated the loss payable under the policy to be $1,429.50 and on September 9, 1988, issued its check for that amount, payable to the appellant's bank which held a lien on the automobile. The payoff on the vehicle loan at that time was $2,808.36.

In determining the amount of the loss, Mr. Dailey consulted the National Automobile Dealer's Association Used Car Guide (NADA), an approved guide under West Virginia insurance regulations, and determined that the average retail value of the car was $3,100.00. He made the following adjustments to arrive at the $1,429.50 paid the appellant:

> Total Loss: Average Retail Value $3,100.00
> Minus: High Mileage $ 940.00
> Automobile Reconditioning 595.00
> Deductible 250.00 1,785.00
> Net: $ 1,315.00
> Plus: AM/FM Radio $ 25.00
> Taxes 79.50
> License fee 10.00 114.50
> Total Claim Payment $ 1,429.50

Although the appellant was unhappy with the amount paid by Allstate, there is some dispute as to whether the appellant notified Mr. Dailey of the amount which he felt he was owed and which would reasonably compensate him. We do find that at the trial of this action below, the appellant testified that he never did make a money offer to Allstate or to Mr. Dailey.

On November 4, 1988, appellant filed this action against Allstate and Mr. Dailey. His complaint contained five counts. Two of these counts were strictly against Mr. Dailey, who was later dismissed from the case. Those counts are thus irrelevant to this proceeding. A third count was also eliminated. The two counts which survived, and which are relevant to this appeal, are the Hayseeds count against Allstate and the Jenkins count against Allstate, to which considerable reference has already been made. We note that in pleading the first count, the appellant here alleged a breach of good faith and fair dealing. We note later that bad faith is not an element of the Hayseeds claim. For the surviving counts, the appellant sought $595.00 in damages under the policy terms, $100,000.00 in resulting economic damages, interest, $3,500,000.00 in punitive damages, attorney fees, and costs.

The litigation had a long and rather involved life below, much of which is irrelevant to this proceeding. However, on July 31, 1992, one particularly important event for the resolution of this appeal occurred -- the trial court, as has previously been indicated, bifurcated the issues for trial purposes by entering an order which provided:

> The trial shall be bifurcated; Phase I to be limited to the Plaintiff's underlying claim and Phase II shall be for the Defendant's [sic - the Court believes that the trial court mean the plaintiff's (or appellant's)] implied private cause of action if any, pursuant to the W.Va. Unfair Trade practices Act . . . .

The situation was complicated further by the fact that the parties and the trial court later apparently agreed that, in the trial of the first count, the question of whether the appellant was entitled to compensatory damages and economic loss would first be tried by the jury, and only after the jury returned its verdict on those matter would the remaining damage questions be presented to the jury. See footnote 1

A jury trial was conducted commencing on May 2, 1994. As tried, the case was restricted to the question of whether Allstate had breached its insurance contract and to what compensatory and economic damages the appellant was entitled, if any.

At the conclusion of the trial, a verdict form was, without objection from either party, submitted to the jury. That form asked the jury to break down the appellant's damages, if any, into property damages, damages for loss of use of the vehicle, and damages for aggravation and inconvenience. It did not request "net economic damages" or punitive damages, and it did not ask if the appellant "substantially prevailed" on his underlying claim.

At the conclusion of the trial, the jury returned a verdict for the appellant for a total of $995.00. This verdict was composed of $595.00 for Allstate's underpayment of damages to the appellant's vehicle and $400.00 for loss of use of the vehicle. No damages were awarded for aggravation and inconvenience.

After the jury returned its verdict, the parties made several post-trial motions and presented several issues to the circuit court. See footnote 2 By far the most important questions presented, and the ones relevant to this appeal, were whether the appellant was entitled to attorney fees and whether he was entitled to proceed and present his punitive damage claim to the jury. On both of these issues the trial court ruled against the appellant, and this set the stage for the present appeal.

In denying the appellant's request or demand for attorney fees, the court found that appellant had not "substantially prevailed" in the first phase of trial and that he was not, therefore, entitled to attorney fees and costs. Additionally, in denying the appellant's request to proceed on the punitive damages issue, the court ruled that the appellant had failed to establish the initial threshold of malice necessary to justify pursuit of the punitive damages claim.

Although from the bifurcation order, the transcripts of the jury trial, the instructions given to the jury, and the arguments of the parties, the trial was restricted to the first bifurcation issue (Hayseeds) and in no way involved the separate Jenkins Fair Trade Practices issue, it appears that the trial court's post-trial rulings not only denied the appellant's claim for attorney fees and punitive damages on the Hayseeds count, but also precluded him from proceeding with the second phase of the bifurcated trial, the phase which, according to the bifurcation order, was to be devoted to the appellant's Jenkins count.

In the present appeal, the appellant essentially claims that the trial court factually erred in finding that he had not "substantially prevailed" on his underlying claim. He also claims that, from a legal point of view, the trial court erred in holding that since he did not make an adequate showing of malice in the matters which were tried before the jury, he was precluded from developing further his punitive damages claim. It is also implicit in the appellant's rambling assignments of error that he feels that he was improperly denied a trial on his second bifurcation issue.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. "We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard." Phillips v. Fox, 193 W.Va. 657, 661, 458 S.E.2d 327, 331 (1995). See syllabus point 1, Burnside v. Burnside, 194 W.Va. 263, 460 S.E.2d 264 (1995).

DISCUSSION

Before discussing the particular issues in this case, the court feels that it is important to note that it appears that a substantial portion of the difficulty in this case grows out of the lengthy and complex nature of the proceedings and out of confusion over precisely what was being tried when this case was submitted to the jury. Initially, it was ordered that the trial be bifurcated, the first phase to be what the trial court called "the underlying claim" and second phase to be the Jenkins claim. As the first phase of the case was tried, the elements of a Hayseeds claim necessary for punitive damages were not presented to the jury. The appellant treated malice as being postponed to phase 2 of the trial, and the court considered the case tried as limited to compensatory damages. When the appellant, in the trial court's view, failed to prevail substantially in part one, the trial court concluded that the appellant was precluded from proceeding to part two of that trial. However, since part two involved attorney fees and punitive damages, the court apparently confused part two of the Hayseeds trial with the Jenkins trial, which also involved punitive damages and attorney fees, and precluded the appellant from proceeding to his Jenkins trial.

The Court also believes that before going into the particular issues it is essential to examine and compare the legal concepts implicit in basic contractual actions on an insurance contract, in Hayseeds, and in Jenkins and related law.

Before analyzing an action under the authority of Hayseeds, the court notes that in an action by an insured against an insurer on an insurance policy covering damage to personal property, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the cost of repair or the value of the property immediately prior to the damage, whichever is less, to the extent of the policy. He is also entitled to recover expenses stemming from the injury including compensation for loss of use. "Damages for annoyance and inconvenience may also be recovered when measuring damages for loss of use to the property," w*hich is an elemen*t of loss of use. Ellis v. King, 184 W.Va. 227, 229, 400 S.E.2d 235, 237 (1990). Punitive damages are not normally recoverable in such claims. Berry v. Nationwide Mutual Fire Insurance Company, 181 W.Va. 168, 381 S.E.2d 367 (1989), and Hayseeds v. State Farm Fire & Casualty, supra. See also Jarrett v. E.L. Harper & Son, Inc., 160 W.Va. 399, 235 S.E.2d 362 (1977), a real property damages case. Further, since attorney fees are not recoverable by a party in the absence of provisions specifically permitting that recovery in a statute or court rule, attorney fees are not ordinarily recoverable in simple actions on a contract. Yost v. Fuscaldo, 185 W.Va. 493, 408 S.E.2d 72 (1991); Old National Bank of Martinsburg v. Hendricks, 181 W.Va. 537, 383 S.E.2d 502 (1989); Sally-Mike Properties v. Yokum, 179 W.Va. 48, 365 S.E.2d 246 (1986); Heckler v. Casey, 175 W.Va. 434, 333 S.E.2d 799 (1985); and Daily Gazette Company, Inc. v. Canady, 175 W.Va. 249, 332 S.E.2d 262 (1985).

Under the authority of Hayseeds and its progeny, if the insured suing an insurer on a personal property damage claim "substantially prevails", the insurer is liable, in addition to the damages for breach of the insurance contract, for plaintiff's reasonable attorney fees incurred in vindicating the claim, net economic loss caused by the delay in settlement, and damages for aggravation and inconvenience. Further, upon a showing that "actual malice" motivated the actions of the insurer, punitive damages may be recovered.

The basic rule was stated in Hayseeds v. State Farm Fire & Casualty, supra, in syllabus point 1, as follows:

> Whenever a policyholder substantially prevails in a property damage suit against its insurer, the insurer is liable for: (1) the insured's reasonable attorneys' fees in vindicating its claim; (2) the insured's damages for net economic loss caused by the delay in settlement, and damages for aggravation and inconvenience.

To recover attorney fees and net economic loss damages and damages for aggravation and inconvenience under this syllabus point, it is not necessary that a plaintiff show bad faith. In Hayseeds it is specifically stated that:

> [W]e consider it of little importance whether an insurer contests an insured's claim in good or bad faith. In either case, the insured is out his consequential damages and attorney's fees. To impose upon the insured the cost of compelling his insurer to honor its contractual obligation is effectively to deny him the benefit of his bargain.

177 W.Va. at 329, 352 S.E.2d at 79-80.

Further, we perceive that damages for aggravation and inconvenience in a Hayseeds claim are not limited to damages associated with loss of use of the personal property but relate as well to the aggravation and inconvenience shown in the entire claims collection process.

Syllabus point 2 of Hayseeds further states that, under the appropriate circumstances, an insurer can likewise be held liable for punitive damages. Specifically, syllabus point 2 says: "An insurer cannot be held liable for punitive damages by its refusal to pay on an insured's property damage claim unless such refusal is accompanied by a malicious intention to injure or defraud." See footnote 3

The third type of claim, brought in the present case, arises under the principles set forth in Jenkins v. J.C. Penney Casualty Insurance Company, supra. That claim is different from both the underlying contractual claim on the insurance policy and from the Hayseeds claim. Jenkins arose in the context a third-party action against a tortfeasor's insurer, brought by the person injured by the tortfeasor. Here an insured is asserting a first-party claim. Jenkins-type actions are sometimes characterized as "bad faith settlement" cases. See Shamblin v. Nationwide Mutual Insurance Company, 183 W.Va. 585, 396 S.E.2d 766 (1990), and Poling v. Motorists Mutual Insurance Company, 192 W.Va. 42, 450 S.E.2d 635 (1994). To show entitlement to recovery in a Jenkins claim, the plaintiff must essentially show that there has been a violation or that there have been multiple violations of the West Virginia Unfair Settlement Practices Act, W.Va. Code 33-11-4(9),[(4)] in the management of the plaintiff's claim and that the violation or violations entailed "a general business practice" on the part of the insurer. Operative syllabus points of the Jenkins case include syllabus point 2 and syllabus point 3, which state:

> 2. An implied private cause of action may exist for a violation by an insurance company of the unfair settlement practice provisions of W.Va. Code, 33-11-4(9); but such implied private cause of action cannot be maintained until the underlying suit is resolved.
> 3. More than a single isolated violation of W.Va. Code, 33-11-4(9), must be shown in order to meet the statutory requirement of an indication of "a general business practice," which requirement must be shown in order to maintain the statutory implied cause of action.

A prevailing plaintiff in a Jenkins claim may recover his increased costs and expenses, including increased attorney fees, resulting from the insurance company's use of an unfair business practice in the settlement or failure to settle fairly the underlying claim. He likewise may recover punitive damages in an appropriate case. See note 12, Jenkins v. J.C. Penney Casualty Insurance Company, supra. We have said that to recover punitive damages it must be shown that the conduct of the insurer was wilful, malicious, and intentional.

With this in mind, we now proceed to a discussion of specific issues in the present case.

The first issue is largely a factual issue. The question is whether the trial court erred by concluding that the appellant did not "substantially prevail" in his underlying contractual action. This factual finding is significant because under Hayseeds, as has been previously discussed, a plaintiff must "substantially prevail" on his underlying claim before he may recover attorney fees or punitive damages.

In the trial conducted below, the jury was allowed to consider damages to appellant's personal property, damages for loss of use, and damages for aggravation and inconvenience. The exact aggregate amount of damages sought by the appellant after the collision varied from time to time during his negotiations with Allstate and during the proceedings in this case. There was evidence that the appellant's last demand prior to trial was for $250,000.00 for these items. At another point, his attorney said that he would settle the case for "about $250 million." At another point, counsel said he would take $252,350.00. There is also evidence that the appellant at one point demanded enough "to simply cover the cost of repairs."

The issues of the amounts the appellant was entitled to for property loss, loss of use of his vehicle, and aggravation and inconvenience were submitted to the jury by instruction, and the jury found that the appellant was entitled to $595.00 in property damages, the amount of the deduction made by Allstate for "reconditioning", plus $400.00 for loss of use of his vehicle, and nothing for aggravation and inconvenience.

The trial court weighed the appellant's demands against the verdict which the jury returned, and ruled:

> After the filing of this action by Mr. McCormick, the parties exchanged various settlement offers but plaintiff failed to engage in any meaningful settlement negotiations. At no time did plaintiff indicate a willingness to settle the compensatory portion of his lawsuit for anything approximating the $995.00 jury award. Moreover, when negotiations finally broke down between the parties they were apparently even much farther apart. As the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals emphasized in Hadorn v. Shea, 456 S.E.2d at 198, "it is the status of the claim as a whole, at the time negotiations break down, that determines whether an insured substantially prevails." Apparently as the result of the lack of success in settlement negotiations, defendants moved to refer this case to mediation on August 6, 1993. At the hearing on that motion the plaintiff's counsel, Mr. Peterson, indicated that the parties were far apart in settlement negotiations and stated on the record in open court that plaintiff's demand was Two Hundred Fifty Two Million Dollars ($252,000,000) to settle the entire case and that he was prepared to take Two Hundred Two Thousand Three Hundred Fifty Dollars [sic] ($252,350) to settle the compensatory portion of the case . . . . The Two Hundred Fifty Two Thousand Three Hundred Fifty Dollars ($252,350) demand is the last statement in the record of what the plaintiff would take to settle the compensatory portion of the case. In the face of such demand, the plaintiff cannot reasonably contend that he substantially prevailed with a $995.00 award.

This Court has had the opportunity on different occasions to examine and determine whether parties to an action have substantially prevailed for the purpose of awarding attorney fees. In Hayseeds, supra, a restaurant which was insured for $150,000.00 burned down. State Farm Fire and Casualty (State Farm) declined to pay on the grounds of arson. The owner brought an action against the insurance company, and the jury returned a verdict of $150,000.00 on the insurance policy. The insurer appealed. This Court admitted that this was a close case, but found that there was sufficient evidence for the jury to infer that the owners were not at fault in the burning of the building. Consequently, the award of $150,000.00 was allowed to stand, and the policyholders were held to have substantially prevailed. As a result of substantially prevailing, this Court affirmed the award for attorney fees, costs, and consequential damages. However, the punitive damages award was reversed because the policyholders did not "establish a high threshold of actual malice in the settlement process." Hayseeds, 177 W.Va. at 330, 352 S.E.2d at 80.

In Thomas v. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company, 181 W.Va. 604, 383 S.E.2d 786 (1989), Ms. Thomas wrecked her pickup truck, which was insured by State Farm. The cost of repair was estimated at $8,200.05 for the pickup; $1,560.00 for the tank and pump apparatus; and $471.00 for painting and relettering. State Farm offered to settle for $4,960.72, which Ms. Thomas refused. She filed an action, and at trial she sought compensatory damages in the amount of $10,465.50 for property damage and $359.00 for towing charges. The jury awarded Ms. Thomas $13,213.00, representing $10,168.00 for property damage and towing and storage fees, and $3,045.00 for economic loss. The trial court found Ms. Thomas substantially prevailed and awarded attorney fees. The insurer appealed. This Court affirmed the trial court and further clarified the meaning of substantially prevail by stating:

> The question of whether an insured has substantially prevailed against his insurance company on a property damage claim is determined by the status of the negotiations between the insured and the insurer prior to the institution of the lawsuit. Where the insurance company has offered an amount materially below the damage estimates submitted by the insured, and the jury awards the insured an amount approximating the insured's damage estimates, the insured has substantially prevailed.

Id. at syllabus point 2.

In Jordan v. National Grange Mutual Insurance Company, 183 W.Va. 9, 393 S.E.2d 647 (1990), this Court stated that "the insured is entitled to recover reasonable attorney's fees from his or her insurer, as long as the attorney's services were necessary to obtain payment of the insurance proceeds." Id. at 14, 393 S.E.2d at 652.

The case of Hadorn v. Shea, 193 W.Va. 350, 456 S.E.2d 194 (1995), involved an action by a policyholder against her underinsured motorist carrier. After a jury returned a verdict of $90,000.00 in favor of the insured against her underinsured motorist carrier, the insured amended her complaint, seeking costs and expenses, including attorney fees, on the basis that she substantially prevailed at trial. This Court affirmed the trial court's granting of summary judgment to the insurer, finding appellant did not substantially prevail at trial. The insured demanded $300,000.00 for personal injury, rejecting the insurer's pretrial final settlement offer of $22,500.00. The jury awarded her $90,000.00. In making its decision, this Court reasoned that the insured failed to make counteroffers in conjunction with her rejection of her insurer's settlement offers. Instead, she appeared not interested in any settlement less than her original demand of $300,000.00. As a basis for affirming the trial court's denial of costs and expenses, this Court stated that "[i]t is not clear that 'but for' Ms. Hadorn's attorney's services she would not have been able to get State Farm to settle for $90,000 without proceeding to trial." Id. at 354, 456 S.E.2d at 198. If Ms. Hadorn had engaged in active settlement negotiations, there may have been no need for a trial.

In Hadorn, this Court also detailed the standard by which one can determine if an insured has substantially prevailed. This Court stated: "To determine if a plaintiff has substantially prevailed, we compare the plaintiff's last settlement demand before filing suit to the amount awarded by the jury." 193 W.Va. at 353, 456 S.E.2d at 197.

In the case at bar, the appellant contends in his brief filed to this Court that he made a counteroffer prior to filing this action. He claims he "counteroffered with a demand to simply cover the cost of repairs." Unfortunately, appellant has not directed us to the proof of this counteroffer in the record, and we do not find it documented there. We note that the trial judge, after listening to numerous hearings regarding evidence and a fairly lengthy trial, found "Plaintiff McCormick never made a meaningful counteroffer prior to filing this action and made no good faith attempt to settle before trial . . . Having failed to make any offer prior to filing suit, Mr. McCormick cannot be said to have substantially prevailed on any claim made prior to suit." The trial court did not abuse its discretion in reaching this conclusion. Therefore, we move on to the next phase of our analysis.

In Hadorn, this Court said that "it is the status of the claim as a whole, at the time negotiations broke down, that determines whether an insured substantially prevails." 193 W.Va. at 354, 456 S.E.2d at 198 (emphasis in original). After Mr. McCormick filed the action, the parties exchanged various settlement offers. However, none of the offers made by appellant approximates the $995.00 jury award. Appellant states in the record that his last demand prior to trial was to resolve only the compensatory portion of the case for $250,000.00. See footnote 5

It appears from the record that such an offer was made at a hearing held on August 13, 1993. Appellant's counsel stated he would settle the case for "about $250 million." When questioned by the judge regarding that comment, counsel stated he would settle the compensatory portion of the case for $252,350.00. At that point, negotiations had broken down.

Comparing the demands made by the appellant during settlement negotiations with the award of $995.00 he received from the jury verdict, we cannot say, in view of the overall evidence and status of the case, that the trial judge abused his discretion in failing to find that the appellant substantially prevailed by the test suggested in Hadorn, and, as previously indicated, we cannot conclude that the trial court erred in effectively finding that the appellant was precluded, under the Hayseeds theory, from seeking attorney fees or punitive damages, since under Hayseeds substantial recovery on the underlying claim is a clear predicate to seeking additional Hayseeds relief.

Having come to that conclusion, we are troubled by, but do not find reversible error in one facet of the problem. The issue of whether appellant substantially prevailed for the purpose of awarding attorney fees is, in our view, correctly governed by the principles we have just reviewed. However, given the fact that the first phase trial was perceived by the trial court as being limited to compensatory damages, the comparison of the last offers made by appellant to settle the case with the amount of the jury verdict appears to us to be inappropriate. We believe that, on the facts of this case only, that comparison does not serve its intended purpose. Here not all the issues under consideration in the negotiations were submitted to the jury. It may be fair to conclude that the high demand made by the appellant justifies this Court and the trial court in leaving him where he was found, but we note the principles we have reviewed here work as they were intended where all the issues appropriate to a Hayseeds-type case have been put before a jury. In the present case, not all elements of damages appropriate under Hayseeds were presented to the jury.

SHOWING OF MALICE

The appellant also claims that the trial court erred in effectively ruling that he had to show malice during the first phase of his Hayseeds trial before he was entitled to proceed to the second, or punitive damage, phase.

As has already been discussed, a clear predicate to recovering punitive damages in a Hayseeds claim is that the plaintiff "substantially prevail" on his underlying claim, and, as has already been discussed, the trial court, without committing reversible error, found that the appellant did not "substantially prevail" on his under lying claim. Accordingly, the Court concludes that the trial court's ultimate conclusion that the appellant was not entitled to a Hayseeds punitive damages trial was proper.

The trial court was also correct in saying that malice must be shown in a Hayseeds case before punitive damages may be recovered. In Hayseeds itself, we said:

> . . . [P]unitive damages for failure to settle a property dispute shall not be awarded against an insurance company unless the policyholder can establish a high threshold of actual malice in the settlement process. By "actual malice" we mean that the company actually knew that the policyholder's claim was proper, but willfully, maliciously and intentionally denied the claim. We intend this to be a bright line standard, highly susceptible to summary judgment for the defendant, such as exists in the law of libel and slander, or the West Virginia law of commercial arbitration. See, e.g., N.Y. Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 84 S.Ct. 710, 11 L.Ed.2d 686 (1964) and Board of Education v. Miller, 160 W.Va. 473, 236 S.E.2d 439 (1977). Unless the policyholder is able to introduce evidence of intentional injury -- not negligence, lack of judgment, incompetence, or bureaucratic confusion -- the issue of punitive damages should not be submitted to the jury. Furthermore, a willingness to settle a case of alleged arson can no longer be used as evidence of "bad faith" because the concept of "bad faith" short of actual malice no longer has any place in the law of property damage insurance cases. In fact, to make the matter entirely explicit, an offer of settlement can never be used to show "actual malice" nor be used against an insurance carrier in any way.

Hayseeds, 177 W.Va. at 330-31, 352 S.E.2d at 80-81 (footnotes omitted).

We do, however, note one troubling aspect of the present case. As has already been discussed, by apparent agreement of the parties, the trial of the Hayseeds claim was divided into two parts, the first of which related to compensatory damages, and the second of which related to punitive damages. Punitive damages were clearly not an issue in the first part, and malice was not a necessary element of the issues which were tried in the first part. In the circumstances before us in this case, we believe that it was wholly contradictory and erroneous for the trial court to hold that the appellant was precluded from proceeding to the second phase of this case because he failed to introduce evidence of malice in the case tried, after the court clearly limited the case tried to compensatory damages.

TRIAL ON BAD FAITH SETTLEMENT PRACTICES

As previously indicated, an action under Jenkins v. J.C. Penney Casualty Insurance Company, supra, and its progeny, is a type of action which is wholly distinct from an underlying contractual action on an insurer's failure to comply with its insurance contract. Such an action is also wholly distinct from a Hayseeds action. Further, the conditions and predicate for bringing a Jenkins-type case are wholly different from those necessary for bringing an underlying contract action or for bringing a Hayseeds action. Whereas under Hayseeds it is necessary that a policyholder substantially prevail on an underlying contract action before he may recover enhanced damage, under Jenkins there is no requirement that one substantially prevail; it is required that liability and damages be settled previously or in the course of the Jenkins litigation. Jenkins instead predicates entitlement to relief solely upon violation of the West Virginia Unfair Trade Practices Act, W.Va. Code 33-11-4(9), where such violation arises from a "general business practice" on the part of the insurer.

The fundamental holding of Jenkins recognizes a private, implied cause of action for violations of W.Va. Code 33-11-4(9) and permits plaintiff to recover attorney fees and, under the appropriate circumstances, punitive damages, if it can be shown that there was more than a single isolated violation of W.Va. Code 33-11-4(9) and that the violations indicate a "general business practice" on the part of the insurer.

In the body of Jenkins, the Court further indicated:

> We conceive that proof of several breaches by an insurance company of W.Va. Code, 33-11-4(9), would be sufficient to establish the indication of a general business practice. It is possible that multiple violations of W.Va. Code, 33-11-4(9), occurring in the same claim would be sufficient, since the term "frequency" in the statute must relate not only to repetition of the same violation but to the occurrence of different violations. Proof of other violations by the same insurance company to establish the frequency issue can be obtained from other claimants and attorneys who have dealt with such company and its claims agents, or from any person who is familiar with the company's general business practice in regard to claim settlement.

167 W.Va. at 610, 280 S.E.2d at 260.

Since the predicate for seeking relief under Jenkins and its progeny does not require that an insured substantially prevail on an underlying action, and since Jenkins does allow, under certain conditions, a party to seek reasonable attorney fees and punitive damages, this Court believes that insofar as the trial court's order in the present case precludes the appellant from seeking attorney fees or punitive damages because the appellant failed substantially to prevail below, the trial court's order in the present case was erroneous.

Additionally, as previously indicated, on July 31, 1992, the trial court entered an order bifurcating the issues for trial in this case and specifically provided that any questions arising under the Unfair Trade Practices Act would be handled in a separate trial. It appears that at the conclusion of the trial, the trial court not only found that the appellant had not substantially prevailed in his underlying action, but refused to allow the appellant to proceed to trial to seek damages or attorney fees under any cause of action.

This Court believes that, in the circumstances of this case, litigation of the Jenkins-type claim is appropriate. The appellant has prevailed in the first phase on his claim that Allstate failed to pay the amount to which the appellant was entitled under the insurance contract. Pursuit of the Jenkins claim, if either of the parties elects to proceed, will afford full opportunity to litigate the substance of the remaining issues that were not adequately addressed during the first phase trial had below, including, if supported by the evidence, the issue of whether the reconditioning deductions used by Allstate are a "general business practice", whether, under the applicable Jenkins rule, punitive damages should be awarded, and whether appellant should be awarded attorney fees for vindicating his Jenkins-type claim and, if so, in what amount.

The Court notes that the remainder of the errors assigned by the appellant relate to matters which may be raised in the Jenkins phase of the trial and are not prejudicial with respect to the result which we announce today relating to the trial had below, even if they constituted error.

ALLSTATE'S COUNTER ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR

The Court notes that, among other points, Allstate in the present case assigns as error the fact that the jury's verdict awarded the appellant $400.00 for the loss of use of his vehicle, and Allstate claims that there was no evidence to support such an award.

The evidence which the appellant did adduce to support this was are the fact that he had bought a used car for $300.00 and paid $100.00 to fix it up.

This Court agrees with Allstate that this evidence does not demonstrate loss of use or support the loss of use award. The basic measure of damages for loss of use of personal property is rental value, O'Dell v. McKenzie, 150 W.Va. 346, 145 S.E.2d 388 (1965), although as we have indicated above, other factors may be relevant. The cost of a replacement car is not one of those factors. Accordingly, the Court concludes that the $400.00 loss of use award contained in the jury verdict must be set aside.

We have examined the remaining cross assignments and note that, even if they rise to the level of error, the error, if any, was not prejudicial.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated, this Court believes that the judgment of the circuit court, insofar as it relates to the first count of the appellant's complaint, should be affirmed, except that the $400.00 award for loss of use is set aside. Further, while the Court believes that the denial of attorney fees at the conclusion of the trial had was proper, and such denial is affirmed. The judgment of the court denying a phase 2 trial is reversed, and the matter is remanded on the appellant's Jenkins unfair trade practices claim for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Affirmed in part; reversed in part; and remanded with directions.

Footnote: 1 Another event which occurred involved one of the appellant's proposed witnesses, Mr. Jack Lane. When it became apparent that the appellant might call Mr. Lane as a witness, Allstate, in a motion in limine moved to limit his testimony relating to certain other claims against Allstate. Mr. Lane was a former Allstate employee, who, working as an attorney, had examined 167 Allstate West Virginia claims for the years 1983 to 1988 in preparation for Allstate's defense of another lawsuit involving a reconditioning deduction issue analogous to a reconditioning deduction issue which the appellant sought to introduce in the present case.
Allstate, in its motion in limine, took the position that Mr. Lane's knowledge of the 167 cases was protected under attorney/client privilege. The trial court granted the motion in limine, and, in State ex rel. McCormick v. Zakaib, 189 W.Va. 258, 430 S.E.2d 316 (1993), this Court reasoned that since Allstate had already provided the appellant with the 167 cases on discovery, the attorney/client privilege had been waived.

Footnote: 2 One of these occasioned this Court's second involvement with this litigation prior to the granting of this appeal. Appellant previously attempted to appeal the decision of the court below that he had not substantially prevailed. The trial court originally made that determination in its order of May 18, 1994. When appellant undertook to appeal that order, a motion for new trial and other post trial motions were pending. This Court held the new trial motion suspended finality of judgment and made the action unripe for appeal. McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Co., 194 W.Va. 82, 459 S.E.2d 359 (1995.)

Footnote: 3 In the body of Hayseeds, the Court explained in considerable detail what must be shown to recover punitive damages, as quoted later in this opinion.

Footnote: 4 West Virginia Code 33-11-4(9) provides:
Unfair claim settlement practices. -- No person shall commit or perform with such frequency as to indicate a general business practice any of the following:
(a) Misrepresenting pertinent facts or insurance policy provisions relating to coverages at issue;
(b) Failing to acknowledge and act reasonably promptly upon communications with respect to claims arising under insurance policies;
(c) Failing to adopt and implement reasonable standards for the prompt investigation of claims arising under insurance policies;
(d) Refusing to pay claims without conducting a reasonable investigation based upon all available information;
(e) Failing to affirm or deny coverage of claims within a reasonable time after proof of loss statements have been completed;
(f) Not attempting in good faith to effectuate prompt, fair and equitable settlements of claims in which liability has become reasonably clear;
(g) Compelling insureds to institute litigation to recover amounts due under an insurance policy by offering substantially less than the amounts ultimately recovered in actions brought by such insureds, when such insureds have made claims for amounts reasonably similar to the amounts ultimately recovered;
(h) Attempting to settle a claim for less than the amount to which a reasonable man would have believed he was entitled by reference to written or printed advertising material accompanying or made part of an application;
(i) Attempting to settle claims on the basis of an application which was altered without notice to, or knowledge or consent of the insured;
(j) Making claims payments to insureds or beneficiaries not accompanied by a statement setting forth the coverage under which payments are being made;
(k) Making known to insureds or claimants a policy of appealing from arbitration awards in favor of insureds or claimants for the purpose of compelling them to accept settlements or compromises less than the amount awarded in arbitration;
(l) Delaying the investigation or payment of claims by requiring an insured, claimant or the physician of either to submit a preliminary claim report and then requiring the subsequent submission of formal proof of loss forms, both of which submissions contain substantially the same information;
(m) Failing to promptly settle claims, where liability has become reasonably clear, under one portion of the insurance policy coverage in order to influence settlements under other portions of the insurance policy coverage;
(n) Failing to promptly provide a reasonable explanation of the basis in the insurance policy in relation to the facts or applicable law for denial of a claim or for the offer of a compromise settlement;

(o) Failing to notify the first party claimant and the provider(s) of services covered under accident and sickness insurance and hospital and medical service corporation insurance policies whether the claim has been accepted or denied and if denied, the reasons therefor, within fifteen calendar days from the filing of the proof of loss: Provided, That should benefits due the claimant be assigned, notice to the claimant shall not be required: Provided, however, That should the benefits be payable directly to the claimant, notice to the health care provided shall not be required. If the insurer needs more time to investigate the claim, it shall so notify the first party claimant in writing within fifteen calendar days from the date of the initial notification and every thirty calendar days, thereafter; but in no instance shall a claim remain unsettled and unpaid for more than ninety calendar days from the first party claimant's filing of the proof of loss unless there is, as determined by the insurance commissioner, (1) a legitimate dispute as to coverage, liability or damages; or (2) if the claimant has fraudulently caused or contributed to the loss. In the event that the insurer fails to pay the claim in full within ninety calendar days from the claimant's filing of the proof of loss, except for exemptions provided above, there shall be assessed against the insurer and paid to the insured a penalty which will be in addition to the amount of the claim and assessed as interest on such at the then current prime rate plus one percent. Any penalty paid by an insurer pursuant to this section shall not be a consideration in any rate filing made by such insurer.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "In reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court made after a bench trial, a two-pronged deferential standard of review is applied. The final order and the ultimate disposition are reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard, and the circuit court's underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to a de novo review." Syllabus Point 1, Public Citizen, Inc. v. First Nat. Bank in Fairmont, 198 W.Va. 329, 480 S.E.2d 538 (1996).

2. "Failure to observe a constitutional right constitutes reversible error unless it can be shown that the error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt." Syllabus Point 5, State ex rel. Grob v. Blair, 158 W.Va. 647, 214 S.E.2d 330 (1975).

3. "The two central requirements for admission of extrajudicial testimony under the Confrontation Clause contained in the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution are: (1) demonstrating the unavailability of the witness to testify; and (2) proving the reliability of the witness's out-of-court statement." Syllabus Point 2, State v. James Edward S., 184 W.Va. 408, 400 S.E.2d 843 (1990).

4. "For purposes of the Confrontation Clause found in the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution, no independent inquiry into reliability is required when the evidence falls within a firmly rooted hearsay exception." Syllabus Point 6, State v. Mason, 194 W.Va. 221, 460 S.E.2d 36 (1995).

5. "We modify our holding in James Edward S., 184 W.Va. 408, 400 S.E.2d 843 (1990), to comply with the United States Supreme Court's subsequent pronouncements regarding the application of its decision in Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 100 S.Ct. 2531, 65 L.Ed.2d 597 (1980), to hold that the unavailability prong of the Confrontation Clause inquiry required by syllabus point one of James Edward S. is only invoked when the challenged extrajudicial statements were made in a prior judicial proceeding." Syllabus Point 2, State v. Kennedy, 205 W.Va. 224, 517 S.E.2d 457 (1999).

6. Pursuant to Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004), the Confrontation Clause contained within the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution bars the admission of a testimonial statement by a witness who does not appear at trial, unless the witness is unavailable to testify and the accused had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the witness.

7. To the extent that State v. James Edward S., 184 W.Va. 408, 400 S.E.2d 843 (1990), State v. Mason, 194 W.Va. 221, 460 S.E.2d 36 (1995), and State v. Kennedy, 205 W.Va. 224, 517 S.E.2d 457 (1999), rely upon Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980) (overruled by Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004)) and permit the admission of a testimonial statement by a witness who does not appear at trial, regardless of the witness's unavailability for trial and regardless of whether the accused had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the witness, those cases are overruled.

8. Under the Confrontation Clause contained within the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution, a testimonial statement is, generally, a statement that is made under circumstances which would lead an objective witness reasonably to believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial.

9. Under the Confrontation Clause contained within the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution, a witness's statement taken by a law enforcement officer in the course of an interrogation is testimonial when the circumstances objectively indicate that there is no ongoing emergency, and that the primary purpose of the witness's statement is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution. A witness's statement taken by a law enforcement officer in the course of an interrogation is non-testimonial when made under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the statement is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency.

10. A court assessing whether a witness's out-of-court statement is "testimonial" should focus more upon the witness's statement, and less upon any interrogator's questions.

11. Under the doctrine of forfeiture, an accused who obtains the absence of a witness by wrongdoing forfeits the constitutional right to confrontation.

Starcher, J.:

This is an appeal of a domestic battery conviction from the Circuit Court of Monongalia County. We are asked to examine whether the circuit court erred in permitting the admission of statements made by the victim to three individuals – statements indicating that the victim was battered by the defendant – when the victim did not appear and testify at the defendant's trial.

As set forth below, we find that the statements made by the victim were improperly admitted in violation of the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Article III, Section 14 of the West Virginia Constitution.

I.
Facts & Background

The State contends that on March 20, 2004, defendant James Allen Mechling committed misdemeanor domestic battery against his girlfriend, victim Angela Thorn, in violation of W.Va. Code, 61-2-28(a) [2001].[1] To establish guilt under that section, the State was specifically required to prove that the defendant did "intentionally make[] physical contact of an insulting or provoking nature" with a family or household member. The statute stated:

[1]W.Va. Code, 61-2-28 was amended by the Legislature on March 13, 2004, and the amendments took effect ninety days later. See 2004 Acts of the Legislature, ch. 85. These amendments do not, however, affect the appellant's claims.

> (a) Domestic battery. – Any person who unlawfully and intentionally makes physical contact of an insulting or provoking nature with his or her family or household member or unlawfully and intentionally causes physical harm to his or her family or household member, is guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, shall be confined in a county or regional jail for not more than twelve months, or fined not more than five hundred dollars, or both.

The defendant was tried and convicted under this statute in magistrate court, and then appealed the conviction to the circuit court. In a de novo bench trial in the circuit court on November 8, 2004, the defendant was once again convicted of domestic battery.

The victim, Ms. Thorn, did not appear at either of the defendant's trials. The circuit clerk issued subpoenas for the victim, upon the request of the State. However, it appears that the circuit clerk mailed the subpoenas, rather than formally serving the subpoenas upon Ms. Thorn. The State was apparently unable to call the victim to testify.

Furthermore, no witnesses testified before the circuit court that they saw the defendant "intentionally make physical contact" with the victim. Instead, the State established that the defendant battered the victim through the testimony of three individuals who heard the victim say that the defendant had struck her.

Witness Ralph Alvarez testified that, on March 20, 2004, he was out in his yard by his garage working on his car. Several times he heard a man and woman yelling and arguing, but continued working. However, when Mr. Alvarez heard a child crying, he walked out into his yard and saw – approximately seventy to eighty yards away on the side of a nearby road – a young woman (later identified as Ms. Thorn) getting up off of the ground. Mr. Alvarez testified that his view of the scene was partly obstructed by a tree, so he took a few more steps across his yard and saw the defendant, James Mechling. Between the defendant and Ms. Thorn was a baby buggy with defendant Mechling's and Ms. Thorn's infant daughter.

Mr. Alvarez stated that he perceived that the defendant was standing up straight, facing across the baby buggy as Ms. Thorn was getting up off the ground. Mr. Alvarez testified that he saw the defendant "take as swing" at Ms. Thorn, but that his view was still partly obstructed by the tree:

> I couldn't tell whether it was a punch, a slap. I could just tell he was swinging – he'd swung at her or something in front of him, the way the tree was situated. . . . I really didn't pay attention to it when I seen what was going on. I just knew there was something happening that shouldn't be.

Trial Tr. at 8-9. Mr. Alvarez could not, however, say whether the defendant's swing "connected with" Ms. Thorn, stating, "I did not physically see him make physical contact with her." Trial Tr. at 7, 13-14, 18.

Mr. Alvarez yelled at the defendant to stop, and the defendant did. Mr. Alvarez went to his daughter's nearby trailer and asked her to call the sheriff's department, and then walked back across the yard toward the defendant and Ms. Thorn. Before Mr. Alvarez reached the defendant, a vehicle pulled to the side of the road and the defendant climbed in and fled the scene.

Over defense counsel's objection, Mr. Alvarez was permitted to testify about his conversation with Ms. Thorn. Mr. Alvarez stated that:

> She said, he hit me in the head and I've got a knot on my head, and I asked her if she was okay, and she said, yes, she would be okay.

Trial Tr. at 11. Mr. Alvarez comforted Ms. Thorn until two sheriff's deputies arrived shortly thereafter.

Deputies Robert Fields and Thornton Merrifield testified that they received a call of a domestic dispute in progress around 9:30 in the morning, and that they arrived on the scene "within 15 minutes." When they arrived at the scene they found Ms. Thorn to be crying and "really shook up." Over the objections of defense counsel, the sheriff's deputies testified to their conversation with Ms. Thorn. Deputy Fields stated that Ms. Thorn "told me that her head hurt from where she was punched in the head." Trial Tr. at 22. Deputy Merrifield stated:

> Deputy Merrifield: [Ms. Thorn] said she'd been struck in the head twice, and she felt her head, and I went ahead and felt, and there was two knots on the right side of her head.
> Prosecutor: And she attributed those knots to the defendant's actions?
>
> Deputy Merrifield: Yes, ma'am.

Trial Tr. at 27. As a result of Ms. Thorn's statements identifying the defendant as her assailant, the deputies testified they sought a warrant for the arrest of the defendant.

The defendant invoked his constitutional right not to testify.

At the close of the trial, the circuit court found, beyond a reasonable doubt and "upon the basis of the testimony" that the defendant was guilty of domestic battery for striking the victim "one time in the head." The circuit court sentenced the defendant to be incarcerated in the regional jail for six months, and imposed a $100.00 fine. The circuit court formalized its decision in an order dated November 19, 2004.[2]

The defendant now appeals his conviction and the court's November 19, 2004 order.

II.
Standard of Review

Our standard of review of the circuit court's judgment after a bench trial was set out in Syllabus Point 1 of Public Citizen, Inc. v. First Nat. Bank in Fairmont, 198 W.Va. 329, 480 S.E.2d 538 (1996):

> In reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court made after a bench trial, a two-pronged deferential standard of review is applied. The final order and the ultimate disposition are reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard, and the circuit court's underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to a de novo review.

[2]At the November 8, 2004 trial, the circuit court indicated that the effective sentence date was the date of the defendant's arrest, April 12, 2004. Accordingly, the six-month sentence was effectively discharged as of October 6, 2004, because the defendant had been in pretrial incarceration pending the resolution of several felony charges including DUI Resulting in Death, Fleeing the Scene, and Forgery of Public Documents.

This does not, however, mean that the defendant's appeal is pointless or moot. If the defendant is subsequently convicted for additional acts of domestic violence, in this state or another state, a court may be empowered to impose a greater penalty upon the defendant. See, e.g., W.Va. Code, 61-2-28(c) (increasing the penalties for second offense of domestic assault or domestic battery) and -28(d) (making third or subsequent domestic assault or domestic battery a felony) [2004].

The defendant, however, alleges that constitutional error occurred in the admission of Ms. Thorn's statements through the testimony of Mr. Alvarez and Deputies Fields and Merrifield. We have stated that the "[f]ailure to observe a constitutional right constitutes reversible error unless it can be shown that the error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt." Syllabus Point 5, State ex rel. Grob v. Blair, 158 W.Va. 647, 214 S.E.2d 330 (1975). In accord, Syllabus Point 14, State v. Salmons, 203 W.Va. 561, 509 S.E.2d 842 (1998). "An error in admitting plainly relevant evidence which possibly influenced the jury [or a trial judge] adversely to a litigant cannot . . . be conceived of as harmless." Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18, 23-24 (1967). "'Errors involving deprivation of constitutional rights will be regarded as harmless only if there is no reasonable possibility that the violation contributed to the conviction.'" State v. Jenkins, 195 W.Va. 620, 629, 466 S.E.2d 471, 480 (1995) (quoting, Syllabus Point 20, State v. Thomas, 157 W.Va. 640, 203 S.E.2d 445 (1974)). Moreover, once an error of constitutional dimensions is shown, the burden is upon "the beneficiary of a constitutional error" – usually the State – "to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the error complained of did not contribute to the verdict obtained." Chapman, 386 U.S. at 24.

With these standards in mind, we consider the defendant's arguments.

III.
Discussion

The defendant argues that his rights under the Confrontation Clause – set forth in the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and in Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution – were violated when the circuit court, over defense counsel's objection, permitted three witnesses to testify regarding oral statements made by the victim accusing the defendant of a crime when the victim did not appear for trial.

The Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution guarantee an accused the right to confront and cross-examine witnesses. The Confrontation Clause contained in the Sixth Amendment provides: "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall . . . be confronted with the witnesses against him[.]" Likewise, the Confrontation Clause contained in the West Virginia Constitution, Section 14 of Article III, provides that in the "[t]rials of crimes, and misdemeanors . . . the accused shall be . . . confronted with the witness against him[.]"

In Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980), the United States Supreme Court decided that the Confrontation Clause allowed the out-of-court statement of a witness to be admitted against an accused if it was shown that the witness was unavailable for trial, and that the witness's statement bore "adequate 'indicia of reliability.'" 448 U.S. at 66.

This Court has grappled with the Roberts decision in three cases. We first adopted the test set forth in Roberts in State v. James Edward S., 184 W.Va. 408, 400 S.E.2d 843 (1990), stating at Syllabus Point 2:

> The two central requirements for admission of extrajudicial testimony under the Confrontation Clause contained in the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution are: (1) > demonstrating the unavailability of the witness to testify; and (2) proving the reliability of the witness's out-of-court statement.

In State v. Mason, 194 W.Va. 221, 460 S.E.2d 36 (1995), we expanded our holding in James Edward S. to state that no independent assessment of the reliability of the witness's out-of-court statement was necessary if the statement was admissible because of an exception to the hearsay rules. We stated, in Syllabus Point 6 of Mason, that:

> For purposes of the Confrontation Clause found in the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution, no independent inquiry into reliability is required when the evidence falls within a firmly rooted hearsay exception.

And finally, in State v. Kennedy, 205 W.Va. 224, 517 S.E.2d 457 (1999), we concluded that the Confrontation Clause test espoused in Roberts applied only to out-of-court statements made by a witness in a prior judicial proceeding. We therefore modified our holding in James Edward S., stating in Syllabus Point 2:

> We modify our holding in James Edward S., 184 W.Va. 408, 400 S.E.2d 843 (1990), to comply with the United States Supreme Court's subsequent pronouncements regarding the application of its decision in Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 100 S.Ct. 2531, 65 L.Ed.2d 597 (1980), to hold that the unavailability prong of the Confrontation Clause inquiry required by syllabus point one of James Edward S. is only invoked when the challenged extrajudicial statements were made in a prior judicial proceeding.

Subsequent to our three decisions interpreting and applying Roberts, the U.S. Supreme Court issued Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004). In Crawford, the appellant argued that the test adopted by the Roberts Court "strays from the original meaning of the Confrontation Clause" and urged the Court to reconsider its holding. 541 U.S. at 42.

The U.S. Supreme Court examined the common law and history surrounding the Confrontation Clause, and concluded in Crawford that Roberts should be overruled. The Court stated in Crawford that, contrary to Roberts:

> . . . the Framers would not have allowed admission of testimonial statements of a witness who did not appear at trial unless he was unavailable to testify, and the defendant had had a prior opportunity for cross-examination. The text of the Sixth Amendment does not suggest any open-ended exceptions from the confrontation requirement to be developed by the courts . . . As the English authorities above reveal, the common law in 1791 conditioned admissibility of an absent witness's examination on unavailability and a prior opportunity to cross-examine.

541 U.S. at 53-54 (citation omitted). The Court therefore set forth the following summation of the law behind the Confrontation Clause:

> Testimonial statements of witnesses absent from trial have been admitted only where the declarant is unavailable, and only where the defendant has had a prior opportunity to cross-examine.

541 U.S. at 59.

The central holding of Crawford is that the testimonial character of a witness's statement separates it from other hearsay statements, and determines whether the statement is admissible at trial or not because of the Confrontation Clause. The Confrontation Clause is a rule of procedure, not a rule of evidence. "If there is one theme that emerges from Crawford, it is that the Confrontation Clause confers a powerful and fundamental right that is no longer subsumed by the evidentiary rules governing the admission of hearsay statements." United States v. Cromer, 389 F.3d 662, 679 (6th Cir. 2004).

The Court acknowledged that its reasoning in Roberts was flawed because it allowed a jury to hear evidence that was untested by the adversarial process, and admission of the evidence was based on a mere judicial determination of reliability, a determination usually made under the rules of hearsay. 541 U.S. at 62. The Court determined that the Framers of the Constitution did not mean "to leave the Sixth Amendment's protection to the vagaries of the rules of evidence, much less to amorphous notions of 'reliability.'" 541 U.S. at 61. The Court therefore rejected the reasoning of Roberts, stating:

> Dispensing with confrontation because testimony is obviously reliable is akin to dispensing with jury trial because a defendant is obviously guilty. This is not what the Sixth Amendment prescribes.

541 U.S. at 62. Because of the unpredictability of the "reliability" concept espoused by the Roberts Court, as well as "its demonstrated capacity to admit core testimonial statements that the Confrontation Clause plainly meant to exclude," 541 U.S. at 63, the Court concluded that Roberts was "a fundamental failure on our part to interpret the Constitution in a way that secures its intended constraint on judicial discretion." 541 U.S. at 67. The Court conceded that lower courts relying on Roberts were likely acting in good faith when they found a witness's out-of-court statement to be admissible against an accused merely because it was reliable, but said:

> The Framers, however, would not have been content to indulge this assumption. They knew that judges, like other government > officers, could not always be trusted to safeguard the rights of the people[.] . . . They were loath to leave too much discretion in judicial hands.

541 U.S. at 67. The Court therefore overruled its reasoning in Roberts.

The law of Crawford is clear: the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution, and of Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution, bars the admission of a testimonial statement by a witness who does not appear at trial, unless the witness is unavailable to testify and the accused had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the witness.

Furthermore, Crawford explicitly overrules Ohio v. Roberts, thereby undermining the fundamental holdings at least three Confrontation Clause cases of this Court that were directly based upon that case. Accordingly, to the extent that State v. James Edward S., supra, State v. Mason, supra, and State v. Kennedy, supra, rely upon Ohio v. Roberts, supra, and permit the admission of testimonial statements by a witness who does not appear at trial, regardless of the witness's unavailability for trial and regardless of whether the accused had a prior opportunity to cross-examine the witness, this Court overrules those cases.

Crawford makes clear that only "testimonial statements" cause the declarant to be a "witness" subject to the constraints of the Confrontation Clause. Non-testimonial statements by an unavailable declarant, on the other hand, are not precluded from use by the Confrontation Clause. While the Court in Crawford did not clearly define the term

"testimonial statements," it did leave some clues as to the types of witness declarations which might fit the meaning of "testimonial statements:"

> Various formulations of this core class of "testimonial" statements exist: ex parte in-court testimony or its functional equivalent – that is, material such as affidavits, custodial examinations, prior testimony that the defendant was unable to cross-examine, or similar pretrial statements that declarants would reasonably expect to be used prosecutorially[;] extrajudicial statements . . . contained in formalized testimonial materials, such as affidavits, depositions, prior testimony, or confessions[;] statements that were made under circumstances which would lead an objective witness reasonably to believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial. These formulations all share a common nucleus and then define the Clause's coverage at various levels of abstraction around it. Regardless of the precise articulation, some statements qualify under any definition – for example, ex parte testimony at a preliminary hearing.
>
> Statements taken by police officers in the course of interrogations are also testimonial under even a narrow standard.

541 U.S. at 51-52 (quotations and citations omitted).

The Crawford Court, however, "[left] for another day any effort to spell out a comprehensive definition of 'testimonial.'" 541 U.S. at 68.[3]

---

[3]Other clues to the meaning of the "testimonial statements" can be found in Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530, 540 (1986) ("The Confrontation Clause . . . ensur[es] that convictions will not be based on the charges of unseen and unknown – and hence unchallengable – individuals."); Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. at 78 (Brennan J., dissenting) ("Historically, the inclusion of the Confrontation Clause in the Bill of Rights reflected the Framers' conviction that the defendant must not be denied the opportunity to challenge his accusers in a direct encounter before the trier of fact."); California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149, 179 (1970) (Harlan, J., concurring) ("[T]he Confrontation Clause was meant to constitutionalize a barrier against flagrant abuses, trials by anonymous accusers, and absentee witnesses."); and Bruton v.

In Davis v. Washington, 547 U.S. ___, 2006 WL 1667285 (Nos. 05-5444 and 05-5705, June 19, 2006), the U.S. Supreme Court returned to the Crawford decision and, for the first time, began to establish some parameters for the term "testimonial." The Court again recognized that it could not produce an "exhaustive classification of all conceivable statements" that were either testimonial or non-testimonial. 547 U.S. at ___ (Slip. Op. at 7). But, within the context of the fact patterns before the Court, the Davis Court crafted some diffuse guidelines which, because of the Court's circumlocution, we must now attempt to distill into practical rules.

The Davis case was actually a consolidation of two separate domestic violence criminal convictions. In these cases, the Court was asked to determine the effect of the Confrontation Clause upon two forms of out-of-court witness statements made to law enforcement personnel that, when the witness did not appear for trial, were used against the accused: a recording of a 911 call by the crime victim as the crime was occurring; and the testimony of a police officer relating his conversation with the victim some time after arriving at the crime scene.

In the first case, Adrian Martell Davis challenged his conviction for felony violation of a domestic no-contact order involving his former girlfriend. At trial, the victim did not testify. Instead, the prosecution admitted a recording of the victim's 911 call. In a colloquy with a 911 operator, the former girlfriend stated that she was being beaten, and identified Davis as her assailant.[4]

In the second case, Hammon v. Indiana,[5] police officers responded to a reported domestic disturbance at the home of Herschel and Amy Hammon. They found Amy alone on the front porch, but she told them that "nothing was the matter." 547 U.S. at ___ [4]The conversation with the 911 operator began as follows:

> 911 Operator: Hello.
> Complainant: Hello.
> 911 Operator: What's going on?
> Complainant: He's here jumpin' on me again.
> 911 Operator: Okay. Listen to me carefully. Are you in a house or an apartment?
> Complainant: I'm in a house.
> 911 Operator: Are there any weapons?
> Complainant: No. He's usin' his fists.
> 911 Operator: Okay. Has he been drinking?
> Complainant: No.
> 911 Operator: Okay, sweetie. I've got help started. Stay on the line with me, okay?
> Complainant: I'm on the line.
> 911 Operator: Listen to me carefully. Do you know his last name?
> Complainant: It's Davis.
> 911 Operator: Davis? Okay, what's his first name?
> Complainant: Adrian
> 911 Operator: What is it?
> Complainant: Adrian.
> 911 Operator: Adrian?
> Complainant: Yeah.
> 911 Operator: Okay. What's his middle initial?
> Complainant: Martell. He's runnin' now.

Davis, 547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 2).

[5]The underlying case is Hammon v. State, 829 N.E.2d 444 (Ind. 2005).

(Slip Op. at 4). The officers entered the house and found glass broken on the front of a gas heating unit, and flames coming out. Herschel, who was in the kitchen, told officers that he and his wife had been in an argument, but that it "never became physical." The officers kept the Hammons separated, and one officer again asked Amy what had happened. Amy altered her story and told the officer she had been assaulted by Herschel. The officer then had Amy fill out and sign an affidavit. Amy handwrote the following:

> Broke our Furnace & shoved me down on the floor into the broken glass. Hit me in the chest and threw me down. Broke our lamps & phone. Tore up my van where I couldn't leave the house. Attacked my daughter.

547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 4). At a bench trial, Amy was subpoenaed but did not appear. Over the objection of defense counsel, the prosecutor admitted into evidence Amy's affidavit and admitted the police officer's testimony relating his conversation with Amy.[6] Herschel Hammon was convicted of domestic battery and of violating his probation.

[6]The police officer testified that Amy > informed me that she and Hershel had been in an argument. That he became irrate [sic] over the fact of their daughter going to a boyfriend's house. The argument became . . . physical after being verbal and she informed me that Mr. Hammon, during the verbal part of the argument was breaking things in the living room and I believe she stated he broke the phone, broke the lamp, broke the front of the heater. When it became physical he threw her down into the glass of the heater.

> . . . . .
>
> She informed me Mr. Hammon had pushed her onto the ground, had shoved her head into the broken glass of the heater and that he had punched her in the chest twice I believe.

Davis, 547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 5).

The U.S. Supreme Court began its analysis of these two cases in Davis by considering whether the Confrontation Clause applies only to prohibit the use of formal, courtroom-style "testimonial hearsay." The Court acknowledged that the "perimeter" of the Confrontation Clause includes sworn statements before government officers:

> The text of the Confrontation Clause reflects this focus [on testimonial hearsay]. It applies to "witnesses" against the accused – in other words, those who "bear testimony." 1 N. Webster, An American Dictionary of the English Language (1828). "Testimony," in turn, is typically "a solemn declaration or affirmation made for the purpose of establishing or proving some fact." Ibid. An accuser who makes a formal statement to government officers bears testimony in a sense that a person who makes a casual remark to an acquaintance does not.

547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 8-9)(quoting Crawford, 541 U.S. at 51). However, the Confrontation Clause historically applied to statements beyond prior courtroom testimony and formal depositions and included informal statements to government officials:

> [T]he English cases that were the progenitors of the Confrontation Clause did not limit the exclusionary rule to prior court testimony and formal depositions. In any event, we do not think it conceivable that the protections of the Confrontation Clause can readily be evaded by having a note-taking policeman recite the unsworn hearsay testimony of the declarant, instead of having the declarant sign a deposition. Indeed, if there is one point for which no case – English or early American, state or federal – can be cited, that is it.

Davis, 547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 11) (citation omitted).

In Davis, the Court sought to establish principles regarding the use of witness statements made to police during "interrogations." The Court stated that, when it said in Crawford that "interrogations by law enforcement officers fall squarely within [the] class" of testimonial hearsay barred from use at trial, what the Court really meant to say was that the Confrontation Clause only bars the use of any statement made during "interrogations solely directed at establishing the facts of a past crime, in order to identify (or provide evidence to convict) the perpetrator." Davis, 547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 11) (citing Crawford, 541 U.S. at 53). In other words, witness statements made to law enforcement officers that are comparable to those that would be given in a courtroom – that is, statements about "what happened" – are testimonial statements the use of which is proscribed by the Confrontation Clause.

The Court therefore set forth the following narrow rule, which the Court felt was necessary to determine the cases before it:

> Statements are nontestimonial when made in the course of police interrogation under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency. They are testimonial when the circumstances objectively indicate that there is no such ongoing emergency, and that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution.

547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 7). The Court later emphasized that the phrase "ongoing emergency" means just that, and once a government officer has gained the information "needed to address the exigency of the moment" and "the emergency appears to have ended," then any further questioning by the government officer is more likely to elicit testimonial statements from the witness. 547 U.S. at ___-___ (Slip Op. at 13-14).

The guidelines adopted by the Court in Davis are flexible and inherently fact-based, and the existence or lack of government interrogation does not necessarily determine whether a statement is testimonial. Similarly, a police officer's declaration that a statement was taken during an "ongoing emergency" does not make it so. See 547 U.S. at ___-___ n.6 (Slip Op. at 17-18 n.6) ("While prosecutors may hope that inculpatory 'nontestimonial' evidence is gathered, this is essentially beyond police control. Their saying that an emergency exists cannot make it be so."). Instead, the focus of a court attempting to assess whether a witness's out-of-court statement is "testimonial" should be determined by evaluating the witness's statement, not any interrogator's questions. The Court further stated in Davis:

> Our holding refers to interrogations because . . . the statements in the cases presently before us are the products of interrogations – which in some circumstances tend to generate testimonial responses. This is not to imply, however, that statements made in the absence of any interrogation are necessarily nontestimonial. The Framers were no more willing to exempt from cross-examination volunteered testimony or answers to open-ended questions than they were to exempt answers to detailed interrogation. (Part of the evidence against Sir Walter Raleigh was a letter from Lord Cobham that was plainly not the result of sustained questioning. Raleigh's Case, 2 How. St. Tr. 1, 27 (1603).) And of course even when interrogation exists, it is in the final analysis the declarant's statements, not the interrogator's questions, that the Confrontation Clause requires us to evaluate.

547 U.S. at ___-___ n.1 (Slip. Op. at 7-8 n.1).

We believe that the Court's holdings in Crawford and in Davis regarding the meaning of "testimonial statements" may therefore be distilled down into the following three points. First, a testimonial statement is, generally, a statement that is made under circumstances which would lead an objective witness reasonably to believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial. Second, a witness's statement taken by a law enforcement officer in the course of an interrogation is testimonial when the circumstances objectively indicate that there is no ongoing emergency, and that the primary purpose of the witness's statement is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution. A witness's statement taken by a law enforcement officer in the course of an interrogation is non-testimonial when made under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the statement is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency. And third, a court assessing whether a witness's out-of-court statement is "testimonial" should focus more upon the witness's statement, and less upon any interrogator's questions.

The Court in Davis proceeded to apply these guidelines to the facts of Davis's and Hammon's cases. As to Davis, the Court concluded that circumstances objectively indicated that the primary purpose of the victim's statement in the 911 call was to appeal for police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency. The victim was not "acting as a witness; she was not testifying. . . . No 'witness' goes into court to proclaim an emergency and seek help." 547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 13). The Court therefore found that the victim's "early statements identifying Davis as her assailant . . . were not testimonial," and that the admission of the 911 call into evidence against Davis did not violate the Confrontation Clause.[7] 547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 14). Davis's conviction was affirmed.

In Hammon's case, however, the Court found a "much easier task" than in Davis's case, 547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 14), and concluded that the victim's affidavit and statements to a police officer clearly should not have been admitted. The Court found that the statements taken by the police officer took place some time after the events described were over, and the statements were "neither a cry for help nor the provision of information enabling officers immediately to end a threatening situation." 547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 17).

> It is entirely clear from the circumstances that the interrogation was part of an investigation into possibly criminal past conduct . . . There was no emergency in progress; the interrogating officer testified that he had heard no arguments or crashing and [7]The Court did suggest, however, that once it appeared that the emergency ended (when the victim stated that Davis had driven away from the premises), and the 911 operator told the victim to be quiet and began to ask questions comparable to a structured form of police questioning, the 911 operator began to elicit testimonial statements from the victim that might be barred from use by the Confrontation Clause.

> This presents no great problem. . . . [T]rial courts will recognize the point at which, for Sixth Amendment purposes, statements in response to interrogations become testimonial. Through in limine procedure, they should redact or exclude the portions of any statement that have become testimonial, as they do, for example, with unduly prejudicial portions of otherwise admissible evidence.

547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 14). The Court went on to point out that Davis's jury did not hear the complete 911 call, and that even if some latter portions of the call were testimonial, a lower court had determined their admission was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. Id. Furthermore, the Court noted that Davis did not challenge the lower court's finding that the admission of the latter portions of the 911 call was harmless.

> saw no one throw or break anything. When the officers first arrived, [the victim] Amy told them that things were fine, and there was no immediate threat to her person. When the officer questioned Amy for the second time, and elicited the challenged statements, he was not seeking to determine (as in Davis) "what is happening," but rather "what happened." Objectively viewed, the primary, if not indeed the sole, purpose of the investigation was to investigate a possible crime – which is, of course, precisely what the officer should have done.

547 U.S. at ___ - ___ (Slip Op. at 14-15) (citations omitted).

The Court conceded that, particularly in domestic disputes, "[o]fficers called to investigate . . . need to know whom they are dealing with in order to assess the situation, the threat to their own safety, and possible danger to the potential victim." Davis, 547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 17) (quoting Hiibel v. Sixth Judicial Dist. Court of Nev., Humbolt Cty., 542 U.S. 177, 186 (2004)). In such exigent circumstances, a law enforcement officer's initial inquiries will often produce non-testimonial statements. But once it becomes objectively apparent that the emergency has passed, the investigation of a past crime – while necessary to prevent future harms and lead to necessary arrests – is likely to elicit testimonial statements from witnesses that will be subject to the constraints of the Confrontation Clause. As the Court said:

> Police investigations themselves are, of course, in no way impugned by our characterization of their fruits as testimonial. Investigations of past crimes prevent future harms and lead to necessary arrests. While prosecutors may hope that inculpatory "nontestimonial" evidence is gathered, this is essentially beyond police control. Their saying that an emergency exists cannot make it be so. The Confrontation Clause in no way governs police conduct, because it is the trial use of, not the investigatory collection of, ex parte testimonial statements which offends that > provision. But neither can police conduct govern the Confrontation Clause; testimonial statements are what they are.

547 U.S. at ___ - ___ n.6 (Slip Op. at 17-18 n.6).

The Court in Davis concluded that the Confrontation Clause clearly operated to exclude the victim's statements made in an affidavit and made to a law enforcement officer. Accordingly, the Court reversed the lower court judgment affirming Herschel Hammon's conviction, and remanded the case for further proceedings.

We turn now to the case before us.

Defendant Mechling asserts that the circuit court erred in permitting the State, contrary to the Confrontation Clause, to admit Ms. Thorn's statements made to the two sheriff's deputies when she did not appear for trial.[8] Based upon the U.S. Supreme Court's holding in Davis, we agree. It is clear from the circumstances that the deputies' interrogation of Ms. Thorn was part of an investigation into possibly criminal past conduct. There was no emergency in progress when the deputies arrived, and the defendant had clearly departed the scene when the interrogation occurred. When the deputies questioned Ms. Thorn, they were seeking to determine "what happened" rather than "what is happening." Objectively viewed, the purpose of the deputies' interrogation was to investigate a possible crime – which is, of course, precisely what the deputies should have done. But the statements taken by the deputies could not become a substitute for Ms. Thorn's live testimony, because those statements "do precisely what a witness does on direct examination; they are inherently testimonial." Davis, 547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 16).

Accordingly, we conclude it was error under the Confrontation Clause for the circuit court to permit the sheriff's deputies to testify as to their conversations with the victim. The record firmly establishes that this constitutionally infirm evidence influenced the trial court's decision,[9] and the beneficiary of this constitutional error – the State – has not attempted to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the error complained of did not contribute to the verdict obtained. We must therefore set aside the defendant's conviction, and remand the case for further proceedings.

The defendant also challenges on appeal the State's use of Mr. Alvarez's testimony regarding his conversation with Ms. Thorn. The defendant asserts that Ms. Thorn's statements to Mr. Alvarez were "testimonial hearsay" subject to the Confrontation Clause because an objective witness could have reasonably believed that the statements would be used at a later trial.[10] The record, however, does not reveal the full extent of Mr.

[9]The circuit court stated that he found the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt "upon the basis of the testimony" in the case, and the only testimony presented was that of Mr. Alvarez and Deputies Fields and Merrifield.

[10]In footnotes 1 and 2 of Davis, the U.S. Supreme Court indicated that its opinion was focused upon "interrogations" by law enforcement officers, and thus it was "unnecessary to consider whether and when statements made to someone other than law enforcement personnel are 'testimonial.'" 547 U.S. at ___-___ n.1 and n.2 (Slip Op at 7-8 n.1 and n.2).

However, in Davis the Court cited as authority decisions suggesting that statements made to non-law-enforcement individuals may be testimonial and also be subject to Confrontation Clause limitations. See 547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 13) (citing King v.

Alvarez's interaction with Ms. Thorn, and we cannot discern whether the admission of Ms. Thorn's statements through Mr. Alvarez was constitutionally permissible. The U.S. Supreme Court, in Crawford and Davis, seems to suggest that Ms. Thorn's statements would be non-testimonial to the extent that Mr. Alvarez was intervening to address an emergency and heard Ms. Thorn relate "what is happening." But those statements would be testimonial if the statements related "what happened," and the circumstances reflect a significant lapse of time before the statements were made to Mr. Alvarez. We leave it for the parties on remand to develop a thorough record of the circumstances surrounding Mr. Alvarez's admirable intervention, and for the circuit court to resolve whether the victim's statements to Mr. Alvarez were testimonial or non-testimonial.

We reach our decision in this case with some hesitation. This Court is painfully aware that domestic violence cases inherently present a combination of circumstances that obstruct, yet simultaneously intensify the need for, successful criminal prosecutions: low victim cooperation and high same-victim recidivism. See Tom Lininger,

Brasier, 1 Leach 199, 168 Eng. Rep. 202 (1779) (wherein a "young rape victim, 'immediately on her coming home, told all the circumstances of the injury' to her mother. . . . The case would be helpful to Davis if the relevant statement had been the girl's screams for aid as she was being chased by her assailant. By the time the victim got home, her story was an account of past events."). Furthermore, the Court said that readers should not infer from the opinion that "statements made in the absence of any interrogation are necessarily nontestimonial." 547 U.S. at ___ n.1 (Slip Op. at 7 n.1).

Until the U.S. Supreme Court holds otherwise, we interpret the Court's remarks to imply that statements made to someone other than law enforcement personnel may also be properly characterized as testimonial.

"Prosecuting Batterers after Crawford," 91 Va.L.Rev. 747, 768-71 (2005). Frequently, the victims of domestic violence are deeply conflicted about their plight and refuse to seek police intervention, let alone testify at trial. Society commonly expects a victim of domestic violence to call the police. However, empirical data show that most domestic-violence victims do not call the police, and even when the police are called, the outcome is not always positive. May Ann Dutton, "Understanding Women's Responses to Domestic Violence: A Redefinition of Battered Woman Syndrome," 21 Hofstra L. Rev. 1191, 1229 (1993). According to one recent estimate, eighty to ninety percent of domestic violence victims who appeal to the criminal justice system for help recant or otherwise fail to assist the prosecution at some point in the proceedings. Lininger, 91 Va.L.Rev. at 768 n. 103; Douglas E. Beloof & Joel Shapiro, "Let the Truth Be Told: Proposed Hearsay Exceptions to Admit Domestic Violence Victims' Out of Court Statements as Substantive Evidence," 11 Colum. J. Gender & L., 1, 3 (2002).

Yet, without a successful arrest and prosecution, these victims are likely to be battered again. See American Medical Association, Diagnostic and Treatment Guidelines on Domestic Violence 6 (1992) (stating that 47% of husbands who batter their wives do so three or more times per year).

Some victims do not cooperate with prosecutors because they fear retaliation by the defendant. That fear may be a reasonable projection of past conduct. In other instances, there may be express threats of retaliation or actual retaliatory violence – against the victim or those close to the victim[11] – by the batterer. Indeed, some studies indicate that such threats and retaliation may occur in the majority of domestic violence prosecutions. See, e.g., Lininger, 91 Va.L.Rev. at 769; Laura Dugan, et al., "Exposure Reduction or Retaliation? The Effects of Domestic Violence Resources on Intimate-Partner Homicide," 37 Law & Soc'y Rev. 169, 179 (2003); Deborah Epstein et al., "Transforming Aggressive Prosecution Policies: Prioritizing Victims' Long-Term Safety in the Prosecution of Domestic Violence Cases," 11 Am.U.J. Gender Soc. Pol'y & L. 465, 476 and n.38 (2003) (describing a study in which women identified fear of their batterer as the number one reason why they were unwilling to cooperate with government).

Battered women are at an extremely heightened risk of violence – and even death – at the moment they seek to separate from their abusers. Cooperation in a criminal prosecution is often meant and understood, by both the abuser and victim, as a means of formally separating from an abuser – and thus, presents increased danger to the victim. See, e.g., Dugan, 37 Law & Soc'y Rev. at 174. As a result, many individuals who have experienced domestic violence quite reasonably conclude that criminal prosecution of their abusers will leave them less, rather than more, safe. Individuals who have experienced domestic violence understand this dynamic; individuals who have not, and who rely on varied notions of law-abiding societal norms, do not understand and compound the victim's [11]We understand that batterers typically threaten not only the victim, but also the victim's children. Batterers threaten to either harm the victim's children, or to take the children from the victim by force or by judicial proceeding.

already difficult situation by blaming the victim for tolerating the batterer's misconduct. While attitudes are changing, battered women too often are viewed by the criminal justice system as somehow responsible for the crimes against them, further leading domestic violence victims to reject participation in criminal trials. Barbara Hart, "Battered Women and the Criminal Justice System," 36 Am. Behavioral Scientist 624, 626 (1993).[12]

The U.S. Supreme Court was not unmindful of this problem in domestic violence prosecutions when it issued Crawford and Davis, and neither is this Court. Still, the protections provided by the Constitution and the Confrontation Clause cannot be sacrificed by the State upon the altar of expediency to achieve a conviction in a domestic violence case.[13] But those protections may be sacrificed by the accused through a time-tested equitable doctrine: forfeiture.

[12]Other reasons victims of domestic violence do not testify include economic dependence on their batterer; concern that an immigrant batterer will be deported upon conviction; fear of an adverse reaction from family or community who might regard a victim's participation in the prosecution as a betrayal; apprehension that involvement in the criminal justice system will lead to the loss of child custody to a state child protective services agency; or continuing emotional connections to their batterers. Epstein, 11 Am. U.J. Gender Soc. Pol'y & L. at 477-82; Hart, 36 Am. Behavioral Scientist at 627-28.

[13]Prosecutors claim that a domestic violence conviction can never be obtained without the use of the victim's statement; yet, prosecutors routinely obtain convictions in murder cases without any statement from the victim.

It is important to recognize that, as with all crimes, some alleged victims will refuse to testify because their initial accusations were untrue or exaggerated. Some alleged victims may falsely accuse their partners of abuse in an attempt to gain an upper hand in the relationship, or in a separate court proceeding. Thus, the function of confrontation as a tool to vindicate the innocent has as much of a role in domestic violence prosecutions as in other criminal prosecutions.

Under the doctrine of forfeiture, an accused who obtains the absence of a witness by wrongdoing forfeits the constitutional right to confrontation. In both Crawford, 541 U.S. at 62 (citing Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145, 158-59 (1870)) and in Davis, 547 U.S. at ___ - ___ (Slip Op. at 18-19), the U.S. Supreme Court identified the doctrine of forfeiture as a means by which an accused might lose the protection afforded by the Confrontation Clause.

The Court recognized that domestic violence crimes are "notoriously susceptible to intimidation of the victim to ensure that she does not testify at trial." Davis, 547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 18).

> When this occurs, the Confrontation Clause gives the criminal a windfall. We may not, however, vitiate constitutional guarantees when they have the effect of allowing the guilty to go free. . . . But when defendants seek to undermine the judicial process by procuring or coercing silence from witnesses and victims, the Sixth Amendment does not require courts to acquiesce. While defendants have no duty to assist the State in proving their guilt, they do have the duty to refrain from acting in ways that destroy the integrity of the criminal-trial system. We reiterate what we said in Crawford: that "the rule of forfeiture by wrongdoing . . . extinguishes confrontation claims on essentially equitable grounds."

547 U.S. at ___ (Slip Op. at 18) (citations omitted). See also, United States v. Dhinsa, 243 F.3d 635, 651 (2nd Cir. 2001) ("threats, actual violence, or murder" forfeit confrontation right); West Virginia Rules of Evidence, Rule 804(a)(5) [1994] ("A declarant is not unavailable as a witness if exemption, refusal, claim of lack of memory, inability, or absence is due to the procurement or wrongdoing of the proponent of a statement for the purpose of preventing the witness from attending or testifying."); Federal Rules of Evidence, Rule 804(b)(6) [1997] (excluded from the hearsay rule is any "statement offered against a party that has engaged or acquiesced in wrongdoing that was intended to, and did, procure the unavailability of the declarant as a witness.").

An accused's coercion or intimidation of a victim of domestic violence so as to trigger forfeiture can take many forms. The most obvious situation is where the accused directly confronts the victim after being charged, and intentionally coerces the victim into changing his or her statement, or simply not testifying. Another likely situation where an accused may trigger forfeiture is when, after being charged, the accused engages in further abuse or intimidation of the victim which is not explicitly intended to alter, but has the effect of altering, the victim's testimony. But, "[b]attered women . . . may perceive danger and imminence differently from men. . . . A subtle gesture or a new method of abuse, insignificant to another person, may create a reasonable fear in a battered woman." People v. Romero, 13 Cal.Rptr.2d 332, 336 n.6 (Cal. Ct. App. 1992) (citation omitted). Hence, the most difficult forfeiture situation for courts to assess will be those circumstances where the victim responds to a batterer's actions that precede the domestic violence charge – that is, where the accused's earlier conduct and threats (statements like "don't you ever call the police or else!") cause the victim to decline to testify, claim a lack of memory, or be absent from the trial.

In order for forfeiture to be proven in domestic violence actions, prosecutors, law enforcement officers and courts must secure evidence – possibly from third parties – prior to trial indicating that these victims are too frightened to testify about the intimidating and coercive character of the accused's actions. If a victim is too scared to testify against the accused, for fear of retribution, the victim will probably also be too scared to testify in any pre-trial forfeiture proceeding.

The U.S. Supreme Court has suggested that the government must meet a preponderance-of-the-evidence standard to establish forfeiture, and suggested that if a hearing on forfeiture is required, hearsay evidence may be considered by the trial court. Davis, 547 U.S. at ___ - ___ (Slip Op. at 18-19). The purpose of a court relying upon the forfeiture doctrine is to protect the integrity of their proceedings.

Absent a finding of forfeiture by wrongdoing in this case, the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and of Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution operates to exclude the sheriff's deputies' testimony – and possibly Mr. Alvarez's testimony – regarding Ms. Thorn's accusations against the defendant. On remand, the circuit court may determine whether such a claim of forfeiture is properly raised and, if so, whether it is meritorious.

IV.
Conclusion

The circuit court's November 19, 2004 judgment order is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

"In reviewing the findings of fact and conclusions of law of a circuit court supporting a civil contempt order, we apply a three-pronged standard of review. We review the contempt order under an abuse of discretion standard; the underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard; and questions of law and statutory interpretations are subject to a de novo review." Syl. Pt. 1, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by former Grant County Sheriff Charles Kimble (hereinafter "Appellant") from an order of the Circuit Court of Grant County holding him in contempt of court for his failure to serve an order to remove children from a home in an abuse and neglect matter. Upon thorough review of the matters presented in this appeal, this Court reverses the determination of the lower court, finding that the contempt order was improper and should be vacated.

I. Factual and Procedural History

On September 10, 2004, the Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") applied to Grant County Magistrate Willard L. Earle, II, sitting as a juvenile referee,[1] for an order permitting the DHHR to take four children into State custody in an abuse and neglect proceeding. Magistrate Earle signed[2] the requested order and sent it to Sheriff Kimble through a DHHR representative with an oral request that the Sheriff

[1]West Virginia Code § 49-1-4(10) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2004) permits a circuit court to designate one or more magistrates of the county to perform the functions and duties of a juvenile referee.

[2]The order also specified that Magistrate Earle had, by telephonic communication, received oral confirmation of the order from Circuit Judge Phillip Jordan.

promptly serve it on the parents of the juveniles.[3] Sheriff Kimble informed the DHHR representative that he had an important meeting and would be unable to immediately serve the order but could do so in approximately seventy minutes. When Magistrate Earle learned of the Sheriff's refusal to immediately serve the order, he personally went to speak with Sheriff Kimble. Again, the Sheriff explained the situation and informed the Magistrate that he could not immediately serve the order but could serve it seventy minutes later. A state trooper visiting the office offered to serve the order, and the Sheriff maintains that his final understanding of the situation was that the state trooper would "take care of it." The Sheriff testified at the hearing that "that was the end of it and we all went our separate ways." The record reflects that the order did get served by approximately 6:00 or 7:00 p.m. that same evening by the state police.

On September 17, 2004, the lower court entered a show cause order stating that the lower court had become aware of Sheriff Kimble's refusal to serve the emergency order. The show cause order did not include any statement indicating that the proceeding would be in the nature of a contempt proceeding. It explained only that the Honorable Andrew N. Frye, Jr., had learned of the Appellant's "refusal, on September 10, 2004, to accompany the [3]The record reflects that the need for immediate service of the order arose from the fact that the children had informed authorities that they would be severely punished at home if their parents learned that they had revealed the existence of abuse and neglect to authorities. Thus, the plan was to intervene and remove the children prior to their arrival home from school.

Department of Health and Human Resources Child Protective Services Worker to the . . . children's residence to assist in the removal of said children and to serve the parents with the Emergency Removal Order entered by Magistrate Earle." The show cause order further commanded the Sheriff to appear before the circuit court "to show cause why he failed to discharge his statutorily required duties in this matter."

On October 6, 2004, the lower court conducted a hearing in this matter. The Appellant waived his right to have an attorney, and the lower court did not utilize a prosecutor or empanel a jury. The Appellant and Magistrate Earle testified at the hearing, and the lower court found that the Appellant had failed to serve the order and was therefore in contempt of court as defined by West Virginia Code § 61-5-26 (1923) (Repl. Vol. 2005). The lower court did not specify whether the contempt was criminal or civil in nature.

In an October 12, 2004, written order, the lower court held that the Appellant had failed to exercise his obligation under West Virginia Code § 50-1-14(a) (2004) (Supp. 2005). That statute provides, in part, that the sheriff must "execute all civil and criminal process from any magistrate court which may be directed to such sheriff." The lower court ordered the Appellant to send a letter of apology to the children involved in the underlying abuse and neglect case, to serve ten days in jail, to forfeit ten days' pay, and to place the county deputies on notice that abuse and neglect matters take priority. The jail sentence and the loss of pay were suspended contingent upon the Appellant's completion of 120 hours of community service.

Upon appeal to this Court, the Appellant contends that the contempt order was in the nature of criminal contempt and therefore required the involvement of a prosecutor, a jury trial, and the utilization of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence. Further, the Appellant contends that he did not receive proper notice that the hearing was a contempt proceeding and that the lower court referenced West Virginia Code § 61-5-26 as the basis for its decision, despite the fact that the underlying order was a magistrate order rather than a circuit court order. The Appellant also contends that the evidence was insufficient to support a finding of contempt. The contempt order was stayed pending the outcome of this appeal.

II. Standard of Review

In syllabus point one of Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996), this Court explained as follows:

> In reviewing the findings of fact and conclusions of law of a circuit court supporting a civil contempt order, we apply a three-pronged standard of review. We review the contempt order under an abuse of discretion standard; the underlying factual findings are reviewed under a clearly erroneous standard; and questions of law and statutory interpretations are subject to a de novo review.

See also Harris v. Harris, 212 W.Va. 705, 575 S.E.2d 315 (2002).

III. Discussion

West Virginia Code § 50-1-14(a), in its entirely, provides as follows: "It shall be the duty of each sheriff to execute all civil and criminal process from any magistrate court which may be directed to such sheriff. Process shall be served in the same manner as provided by law for process from circuit courts." The facts presented in this case reveal a situation in which the Sheriff was orally requested to serve the Order Ratifying Emergency Custody, entered by the Magistrate sitting as a juvenile referee assisting the circuit court. However, neither the order itself nor any other paper issued by the court or its clerk directed the Sheriff to serve the order.

West Virginia Code § 61-5-26 governs the issue of punishment for contempt, providing as follows:

> The courts and the judges thereof may issue attachment for contempt and punish them summarily only in the following cases: (a) Misbehavior in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct or interrupt the administration of justice; (b) violence or threats of violence to a judge or officer of the court, or to a juror, witness, or party going to, attending or returning from the court, for or in respect of any act or proceeding had, or to be had, in such court; (c) misbehavior of an officer of the court, in his official character; (d) disobedience to or resistance of any officer of the court, juror, witness, or other person, to any lawful process, judgment, decree or order of the said court. No court shall, without a jury, for any such contempt as is mentioned in subdivision (a) of this section, impose a fine exceeding fifty dollars, or imprison more than ten days. But in any such case the court may impanel a jury (without an indictment or any formal pleading) to ascertain the fine or imprisonment proper to be inflicted, and may give judgment > according to the verdict. No court shall impose a fine for contempt, unless the defendant be present in court, or shall have been served with a rule of the court to show cause, on some certain day, and shall have failed to appear and show cause.

It is not clear from the record whether the lower court considered the failure of the sheriff to immediately serve the Magistrate's order to constitute "misbehavior of an officer of the court, in his official character. . ." as referenced in subsection (c) above, or whether the Sheriff's conduct was deemed to violate another portion of the statute quoted above. Upon this Court's review of the facts of this case, we do not find any act on the part of the Appellant which is in disobedience to a court order, which constituted misbehavior of the Sheriff in his official character, or which was in violation of West Virginia Code § 61-5-26 in any manner.

Under all of the circumstances, this Court does not believe that the Sheriff's conduct in this case constituted contempt of the Circuit Court of Grant County. The circuit court relied upon a claimed violation of West Virginia Code § 50-1-14(a), which deals with the duty a sheriff owes to the Magistrate Court. Moreover, West Virginia Code § 50-1-14(a) defines a sheriff's duty to execute all civil and criminal process which may be directed to such sheriff. The order at issue in this case did not contain any direction to the sheriff regarding service of process.[4]

[4]This Court recognizes the deficiency in the form for emergency custody and will endeavor to create a supplement or addition to the form to provide express and written direction to a sheriff or other law enforcement officer for such service of process or other assistance as the court may wish to be afforded in a case. In the meantime, it is appropriate (continued...)

Further, the Appellant promised to effectuate service in a short time and could reasonably conclude that the problem was solved when a state trooper volunteered to undertake the task. The order was thereafter served by the state police.[5]

Under the unique facts of the present case, we find that the lower court exceeded its legitimate powers by holding the Sheriff in contempt of court. We find no violation of the

for any court to add to its emergency custody order such specific direction to a sheriff or other law enforcement officer as it deems appropriate to serve and effectuate its order.

[5]This Court's determination in this case is not inconsistent with the rationale of other courts in examining alleged contempt violations within the context of service of process difficulties. In In re Smith, 424 S.E.2d 45 (Ga. App. 1993), for instance, a woman had brought a proceeding against a sheriff for contempt regarding the sheriff's failure to arrest her former husband. The ultimate question was explained by that court as follows:

> In light of the foregoing statutes, it is clear that a sheriff can be found in contempt of court by "neglecting" to perform his duties. Stated somewhat differently, a sheriff can be fined for contempt if he fails to perform his duties with "due diligence." Did the sheriff neglect to perform his duties? Did he fail to act with due diligence? The answer to these questions lies in Heard v. Callaway, 51 Ga. 314 (1874).
> In Heard, the Supreme Court of Georgia held that whether a sheriff neglected his duty "would depend on the good faith of his conduct, in view of the circumstances under which he acted, of which the court is to judge." Id. at 317. In determining whether the sheriff acted in good faith, the court is to exercise its sound discretion. Id.

Appellant's statutory duties.[6] The contempt order entered by the lower court is reversed.

Reversed.

[6]Our decision today does not condone any failure of a sheriff to render prompt assistance to the courts. In setting aside the instant contempt order, we do not mean to suggest that officers of the court can rely upon technicalities to refuse promptly to execute an oral order of the court given to a sheriff in open court or any order first made orally for expeditious execution to be promptly followed by a proper written order.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

IN THE INTEREST OF: MICAH ALYN R., A CHILD UNDER THE AGE OF EIGHTEEN YEARS

No. 24878
Submitted: March 24, 1998
Filed: June 22, 1998

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. When a parent is unable to properly care for a child due to the parent's terminal illness, so that conditions which would constitute neglect of the child occur and continue to be threatened, termination of parental rights, without consent, is contrary to public policy, even though there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect will be substantially corrected in the future. In such circumstances, a circuit court should ordinarily postpone or defer any decision on termination of parental rights. However, such deference on the parental rights termination issue does not require a circuit court to postpone or defer decisions on custody or other issues properly before the court. In fact, efforts towards locating prospective adoptive parents shall be made so long as every measure is taken to foster and maintain the bond and ongoing relationship between the parent and child.

MAYNARD, Justice:
This action is before this Court upon an appeal from a final order of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County entered on October 16, 1997. Pursuant to that order, the circuit court terminated the parental rights of the appellant, Ada R., See footnote 1to her son, Micah Alyn R. The parental termination was based on evidence that Ada R. had physically abused Micah and had on occasion, failed to properly administer his HIV medication. On appeal, Ada R. contends that the circuit court erred by finding that her son was abused and neglected and concluding that the best interests of the child required termination of her parental rights.

This Court has before it the petition for appeal, all matters of record, and the briefs and argument of counsel. Based upon a careful review of the record and for the reasons set forth below, we remand this case to the circuit court for action consistent with this opinion.

I

This case originated on July 11, 1996, when Ada R. placed her son in foster care by filing a voluntary placement agreement. At that time, Ada R. had been diagnosed with AIDS, and Micah, who was two and a half years old, was HIV positive. See footnote 2Ada R. sought foster care for Micah due to both her and her child's severe illnesses. Although Micah was placed in the care of the Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "Department"), Ada R. visited her son regularly.

On September 26, 1996, the Department filed a petition for review of the voluntary placement in the Circuit Court of Raleigh County. A hearing was held on September 27, 1996, at which time appellant and the Department agreed to continue the placement and visitation. On March 25, 1997, the Department filed a supplemental petition seeking to have the parental rights of Micah's father, Hansel R., terminated. See footnote 3The petition indicated that Ada R. wanted Micah to be adopted. However, subsequently, Ada R. changed her mind and decided to pursue full custody.

Hansel R. never appeared for any hearings in this matter and his parental rights were terminated on July 19, 1997. That same day, the Department sought termination of Ada R.'s parental rights. Kim Peck, the social services case worker, testified that she believed Ada R. was unable to physically take care of Micah because of her mental and physical condition. She stated that Ada R. was experiencing mental stress and anxiety and did not have the patience to take care of the child's needs. Ms. Peck further testified that Ada R. had told her that she had shaken and slapped Micah and put her hands around his throat. Ms. Peck was also concerned that Ada R. was not capable of remembering to give Micah the several different medications he was taking for his illness. See footnote 4Ms. Peck explained that at times Ada R. had forgotten to give Micah his medication and that she once gave him the wrong dosage.

JoAnn Gibson, case manager for Timberline Health Group, the agency providing social services to Ada R. in connection with the voluntary placement, testified that on one occasion she observed red marks on Micah's arms and legs. She said that Micah was crying, and he told her that his mother had hit him. Ada R. later admitted that she had hit Micah on the leg with a ruler. Ms. Gibson also testified that once, she had witnessed Ada R. slamming Micah down on the bed when she was changing his diaper. However, Ms. Gibson indicated that Ada R.'s attitude towards Micah had improved dramatically within the past three weeks. She also stated that Ada R. performed household chores well.

Nancy Jones, a support specialist with Timberline Health Group, testified that Ada R. was showing much more patience with Micah. She had worked with Ada R. since September 1996. She stated that Micah never exhibited any actions suggesting that he was afraid of his mother. She also testified that she only had to remind Ada R. once during the last three months to give Micah his medication.

Ada R. testified that she was feeling much stronger and was having less medical complications with her illness. She said that she loved her son very much and wanted him returned to her. Ada R.'s sister testified that she felt that Ada R. was capable of taking care of Micah and that if she needed help, her family was available.

Based on the foregoing testimony, the judge deferred making a ruling until the guardian ad litem had time to submit a recommendation. On June 25, 1997, the guardian ad litem filed a recommendation stating that it was in the best interests of the child to have any decision as to termination of parental rights held in abeyance.

Recognizing the expediency requirement of termination proceedings, See footnote 5 the guardian ad litem explained that he did not feel that the case was mature for a decision given the nature of Ada R.'s illness. The guardian ad litem recommended that Micah remain in foster care and that Ada R. be granted increased and liberal visitation.

In October 1997, Ada R. requested that the circuit court hold a supplemental termination hearing. In response, the Department filed a court summary which outlined problems that the Department was having with Ada R. regarding visitation and the treatment plan. The report indicated that Ada R. had become verbally aggressive and was alienating the people who were working with her. The Department was also aware that Ada R. had attended some support group meetings where she stated that Micah had been taken away from her for no reason. The report further indicated that Ada R. continues to tire easily, sleeps a lot, and complains of dizziness. The Department did not believe that Ada R. was capable of administering Micah's medication properly or providing his meals. Thus, the Department recommended that Ada R.'s parental rights be terminated, but that she be granted post-termination visitation.

The supplemental termination hearing was held on October 14, 1997. Following additional testimony by Ms. Peck and Ada R., the guardian ad litem recommended termination of Ada R.'s parental rights. As reflected in the final order, Ada R.'s parental rights were terminated, but she was afforded post-termination visitation of two hours per week.

II.

In Syllabus Point 1 of In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), we set forth the standard of review for abuse and neglect cases:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

> See also Syllabus Point 4, In the Matter of Taylor B., 201 W. Va. 60, 491 S.E. 2d 607 (1997); Syllabus Point 1, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W. Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997).

As her first assignment of error, Ada R. contends that the evidence of abuse is so weak that it does not meet the definition of abuse as set forth in the statute, especially considering that Micah was never removed from her home. Ada R. does admit to striking Micah with a ruler once and shaking him, but she states that these incidents were minimal and occurred at a time when she was under a great deal of stress. She further contends that there is no evidence that she neglected her son. At the time of the termination hearings, she had been properly administering Micah R.'s medication and had the support of her family to help with his care.

W. Va. Code 49-1-3(a)(1) (1994) defines an "abused child" as a child who is harmed or threatened by "[a] parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home[.]" A "neglected child" is defined by W. Va. Code 49-1-3(g)(1)(A) as a child "[w]hose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with the necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian[.]"

The evidence in the record shows that Ada R. has experienced difficulties in properly administering Micah's medications which are crucial to his health. At times, she has forgotten to give him the medicine, and at least once, she administered the wrong dosage. In addition, Ada R. has admitted to striking her child with a ruler and slapping and shaking him on other occasions. These incidents clearly fit within the statutory definitions of abuse and neglect. Therefore, the circuit court did not err in finding Micah was an abused and neglected child.

Ada R. next contends that the circuit court erred in terminating her parental rights. In this regard, she argues the evidence did not support the circuit court's finding that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be corrected in the future. She asserts that even with the current knowledge about AIDS, it is difficult to project the progression of the disease on an individual basis. She further asserts that the evidence shows that she has become stronger and is under less stress indicating that any such conditions of abuse or neglect could be corrected.

W. Va. Code 49-6-5 (1996) governs the dispositional phase of abuse and neglect proceedings. Several dispositional alternatives are set forth in the statute with precedence given to the least restrictive alternative appropriate under the circumstances. With respect to these statutory provisions, we have held that:

> 'As a general rule the least restric tive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] will be employed; howe ver, courts are not required t o e xhaust eve ry speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is pa rticularly applicable to children under the age of three years old w ho are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by num erous placem ents.' Syl. pt. 1, In Re R.J.M., [164] W.Va. [496], 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of Darla B., 175 W. Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985). See also Syllabus Point 7, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). We have further held that:

> Termination of parent al rights, the m ost drastic rem edy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6- 5 [1977] may be em ployed wit hout the use of intervening less restrictiv e alternatives when it is found that there is no reasona ble likelihood under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.

Syllabus Point 2, of In re R. J. M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980). See also Syllabus Point 7, In re Katie S. and David S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

W. Va. Code 49-6-5(b) defines "no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect can be substantially corrected" as "based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve > the pr oblems of abuse and ne glect, on t heir ow n or with hel p." Pursuant to the statute, such conditions are deemed to exist in certain circumstances. For instance, if the abusing parent willfully refused or is presently unwilling to cooperat e in the development of a family case plan, a finding of "no reasonab le likelihood that the conditions of ne glect or abuse can be substa ntially corrected" under the statu te > is warranted. See foot note 6 Li kewise, the sam e findi ng is appropriate whe n t he abusi ng pare nt has repeatedly or seriousl y injured the child physically or emotionally. See footnote 7 Arguably, both of these circumstances exist in the case sub judice. However, it appears that the principal reason th at the circuit co urt terminated Ada L.'s parental rights is the tragic fact that she is suffering from a terminal illness.

The evidence in the record indicates that although Ada R.'s health and emotional state did improve somewhat after she initially placed Micah in foster care, by the time the supplemental termination hearing was held, her health had once again declined. See footnote 8She was tiring easily, sleeping a lot, complaining of dizziness, and suffering from occasional memory loss. Ms. Peck indicated that Ada R. was no longer capable of giving Micah his medication as prescribed or preparing his meals as needed. In addition, Ms. Peck stated that at times, Ada R. believed that Micah had been cured. In fact, Ada R. testified at the hearing on October 14, 1997, that she believed Micah would be "healed." Ada R. further testified that after a two-hour visitation with Micah, she became very tired. Given this evidence, the circuit court did not err in finding that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be substantially corrected in the future. However, we are troubled by the circuit court's conclusion that termination of Ada. R's parental rights was warranted.

This case illustrates the horrible crisis situation confronting many single custodial parents who are suffering from AIDS or some other terminal disease. Sadly, these parents must find someone to take care of their children once they are no longer able to do so. Unfortunately, traditional guardianship law presents only two choices. In order to formally grant another person parental authority while the parent is still living, the parent must relinquish his or her own authority. Testamentary guardianship, the second option, only becomes effective upon the parent's death.

Several states have begun to offer a third alternative by adopting stand-by guardianship statutes. See footnote 9 Generally, standby guardianship statutes allow parents who are at a substantial risk of becoming ill or disabled within a limited time period to select a "standby guardian" to take care of their children at the point when they become too ill or disabled to care for them. The parent does not relinquish any of his or her authority, but instead shares it with the standby guardian. Additionally, the parent may end the standby guardian's authority when he or she chooses to do so. See footnote 10

If the opportunity to choose a "standby guardian" had been available to Ada R., she might well have taken advantage of it. See footnote 11 The record indicates that Ada R. has expressed a desire throughout this case that the foster parents currently providing for Micah's care eventually be able to adopt him, and apparently, they want to do so. In fact, at one point, Ada R. wanted to proceed with the adoption. However, she decided she could not give up her child and changed her mind.

Ada R.'s heartbreaking struggle to deal with her disease, while, at the same time, not turning her back on her child makes this abuse and neglect case all the more tragic. By doing what she felt was best and voluntarily placing Micah with the Department, Ada R. has ended up not only fighting to remain alive, but also fighting to remain a parent. Unquestionably, she has suffered unbelievable emotional torment. While we certainly do not condone or ignore the physical abuse that Ada R. directed toward Micah and believe that the institution of abuse and neglect proceedings was proper, we find that the circumstances in this case simply do not warrant termination of parental rights. Through no fault of her own, Ada R. has been victimized by a disease which is stealing her life and seriously threatening that of her son. Although she is no longer able to take care of her son or provide for his needs, it is quite evident that Ada R. loves her son very much. In fact, the parental bond that Ada R. shares with her son may now be her only source of comfort.

What is done in this case regarding parental rights has the potential to be very far reaching. If the spread and growth of the AIDS virus remains unchecked, it will eventually touch all families, and then every family will have an Ada or a Micah. Of course, even absent AIDS, the same impossible dilemma is faced by some single parents who become profoundly disabled or who are slowly dying from cancer or other protracted terminal diseases. Would the law countenance terminating the parental rights of a parent dying from lung cancer or breast cancer, for example? We think not.

While we believe that termination of parental rights is not appropriate in this instance, the health, safety, and welfare of the child must continue to be our primary concern. In In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 32, 435 S.E.2d 162, 170 (1993), we recognized that the rights of the natural parents merit significant consideration, but "the best interests of the child are paramount." As discussed previously, the evidence in this case clearly indicates that Ada R. is unable to take care of Micah. He needs a stable home to provide him the special care that is required because of his medical condition. However, the evidence also indicates that there is a close and significant emotional bond between this parent and child. We refuse to compound the tragedy in this case further by forever severing this parent-child relationship.

However, we must also consider Micah's current placement. He is presently in a good home with foster parents who are providing him with love, care, support, and a nurturing environment in addition to attending to his medical needs. The foster parents' desire to adopt Micah clearly shows that they have established a strong emotional bond with him. Foster parents who are willing to assume such an awesome responsibility are extraordinary. It is not easy to find foster care placement for a child like Micah who is suffering from a severe disease, and it is even more difficult to find an adoptive home. Obviously, these foster parents need assurances that the adoption will be allowed to proceed in the future because they have made a substantial investment of emotional support and time.

W. Va. Code 49-2-14 (1995) does offer some protection for these foster parents. The statute provides:

When a child has been placed in a foster care arrangement for a period in excess of eighteen consecutive months and the state department determines that the placement is a fit and proper place for the child to reside, the foster care arrangement may not be terminated unless such termination is in the best interest of the child and:

> (1) The foster care arrangement is terminated pursuant to subsection (a) of this section; See footnote 12
> (2) The foster care arrangement is terminated due to the child being returned to his or her parent or parents;
>
> (3) The foster care arrangement is terminated due to the child being united or reunited with a sibling or siblings;
>
> (4) The foster parent or parents agree to the termination in writing;
>
> (5) The foster care arrangement is terminated at the written request of a foster child who has attained the age of fourteen; or
> (6) A circuit court orders the termination upon a finding that the state department has developed a more suitable long-term placement for the child upon hearing evidence in a proceeding brought by the department seeking removal and transfer.

W. Va. Code 49-2-14(b). Although the record is unclear as to exactly how long Micah has been residing with the foster parents who desire to adopt him, See footnote 13 it appears that this statute will soon provide some assurances for them. Certainly, Micah's current placement is in his best interest.

Therefore, we hold that when a parent is unable to properly care for a child due to the parent's terminal illness, so that conditions which would constitute neglect of the child occur and continue to be threatened, termination of parental rights, without consent, is contrary to public policy, even though there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect will be substantially corrected in the future. In such circumstances, a circuit court should ordinarily postpone or defer any decision on termination of parental rights. However, such deference on the parental rights termination issue does not require a circuit court to postpone or defer decisions on custody or other issues properly before the court. In fact, efforts towards locating prospective adoptive parents shall be made so long as every measure is taken to foster and maintain the bond and ongoing relationship between the parent and child.

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the final order of the circuit court is reversed and this case is remanded to the circuit court. On remand, the circuit court shall develop a visitation plan workable for all parties to permit a continued relationship between Micah and his mother. Furthermore, the circuit court shall develop a permanency plan which will provide additional protection for Micah's foster parents by ensuring that they become the adoptive parents at the appropriate time.

Reversed and remanded.

Workman, J., concurring:

I write separately to emphasize that the circuit court on remand should not leave Micah's future in limbo. While he, as the majority points out, may be one of few remaining sources of solace and comfort for his mother in her terminal illness, the legal system must not take from Micah what could be the only source of continued commitment and nurturance (to which every child should have a right) that he might ever have. And as tragic a situation as Ada faces, a greater tragedy would be an HIV positive four-year-old child with no one to count on. The foster parents with whom he has lived for almost two years, and with whom he has bonded and formed the mutual emotional attachment that results in real commitment, must know that they will be part of this child's permanency plan. That is something they deserve, but it is something that Micah deserves even more. As the majority points out, AIDS is a disease which, if not defeated, will eventually touch all of us. The pain and suffering that accompany this disease unfortunately leave many HIV positive children without permanent homes, and without parents willing to make the commitment to walk with these children on whatever road the disease takes them. It would be tragic indeed to take from Micah what could be his last chance for a permanent home.

I applaud the majority's suggestion that concurrent planning for permanency should occur even where parental rights are not terminated. This should be the practice in all abuse and neglect cases, so that there is a permanency plan for children where family reconciliation efforts are not successful for whatever reason.

It will be the task for the lower court on remand to see to it that Micah has a place to be, with people willing to make a permanent commitment. In the final analysis, however, it will be up to these two families to make it work for Micah. As we said in Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989), No matter how artfully or deliberately the trial court judge draws the plan for these coming months, however, its success and indeed the chances for . . . [the children's] future happiness and emotional security will rely heavily on the efforts of these two . . . [families]. The work that lies ahead for both of them is not without inconvenience and sacrifice on both sides. Their energies should not be directed even partially at any continued rancor at one another, but must be fully directed at developing compassion and understanding for one another, as well as showing love and sensitivity to the children's feelings at a difficult time in all their lives.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. " When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard." Syl. Pt. 1, McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Company, 197 W.Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996).

2. Where parental rights have been terminated pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) [1996] , and it is necessary to remove the abused and/or neglected child from his or her family, an adoptive home is the preferred permanent out-of-home placement of the child.

3. In determining the appropriate permanent out-of-home placement of a child under W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) [1996], the circuit court shall give priority to securing a suitable adoptive home for the child and shall consider other placement alternatives, including permanent foster care, only where the court finds that adoption would not provide custody, care, commitment, nurturing and discipline consistent with the child's best interests or where a suitable adoptive home can not be found.

4. "When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest." Syl. Pt. 5, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

McCuskey, Justice:

These are three consolidated child abuse and neglect cases which cause us to decide the important question of whether foster care or an adoptive home is the preferred permanent placement for a child who has been removed from his or her family following a termination of parental rights. In each case, the appellant, West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (the "Department"), challenges a disposition order entered by the Circuit Court of Berkeley County . The Department contends that the circuit court abused its discretion by directing that the children involved be placed in permanent foster care, rather than adoptive homes. Also at issue in these cases is the lower court's grant of post- termination visitation rights to the children's parents. While we understand the circuit court's obvious frustration with the delays that too frequently accompany the Department's efforts to execute court orders in matters of this kind, we must, nonetheless, conclude that the circuit court abused its discretion on both points. Accordingly, we reverse, in part, and remand the cases for further action consistent with this opinion.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

These appeals challenge final orders of the Circuit Court of Berkeley County in three child abuse and neglect cases. We have consolidated the appeals for purposes of argument and decision. In the three cases, following termination of parental rights, the circuit judge ordered that the children be placed in permanent foster care and granted their parents post-termination visitation rights. In each case, the Department asks this Court to remand to the circuit court with instructions that the final order be modified to permit the Department to secure adoptive parents for the child or children involved. In two cases, the Department also requests that we instruct the circuit court to deny post-termination visitation as not being in the children's best interests. In the third case, while the Department does not contest the grant of such visitation, the guardian ad litem assigns the grant as error.

A. Michael M., II

Angela H. is the natural mother of Michael M., II . See footnote 1 Michael M.'s biological father is deceased. On July 2, 1997, at the age of nine months, Michael M. was examined in the emergency room at City Hospital in Martinsburg, West Virginia , having been taken there by Angela H., his maternal grandmother, and his mother's boyfriend, Robbie G . An x-ray of Michael M.'s right leg showed that he had suffered fractures of both his femur and tibia . The explanation given by Angela H. for her baby's fractured bones was medically implausible, See footnote 2and, consequently, the matter was reported to the Department by hospital personnel as a case of suspected child abuse.

After referral to the Department, the case progressed according to the statutory procedure in cases of child abuse or neglect. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-1, et seq. On July 8, 1997, the Department filed a petition, alleging that Michael M. was an abused and neglected child within the meaning of W. Va. Code § 49-1-3.See footnote 3 On that same date, the circuit judge awarded emergency custody of the infant to the Department . A preliminary hearing was held on July 17, 1997. Following the hearing, the circuit court ordered that Michael M. be placed in the temporary physical custody of his paternal aunt and uncle, provided that the Department found their home to be suitable. On July 22, 1997, that placement was achieved. On August 25, 1997, the lower court conducted an adjudicatory hearing. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-2 [1996]. In an Adjudication Order, filed on August 29, 1997, the circuit judge concluded that Michael M. was an abused child as defined in W. Va. Code § 49-1-3; ordered the Department to retain temporary custody of Michael M. and develop a permanency plan within 30 days; and ordered that Michael M.'s visitation with his mother continue, but not in the presence of Robbie G., the putative abuser.

On September 19, 1997, the Department filed a child's case plan for Michael M. See W. Va. Code §49-6-5(a). In that document, the Department suggested that Angela H.'s parental rights be terminated and that Michael M. be placed permanently in the home of his paternal aunt and uncle, who were willing to adopt him. The Department also recommended that Angela H. be given visitation rights in the event that her parental rights were terminated.

A disposition hearing took place on September 29, 1997. See W. Va. Code §49-6-5 . Subsequently, on October 2, 1997, the circuit court entered a disposition order in which it found that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse could be corrected within a reasonable period of time;See footnote 4 terminated Angela H.'s parental rights; and granted Angela H. visitation rights. In addition, the circuit court awarded permanent guardianship of Michael M. to the Department with the direction that he be placed in permanent foster care. In so ordering, the circuit court stated:

However, it does not follow that Angela [H.] should have no future contact with this child and so the Court is of the opinion that visitation rights ought to be granted within limitation. WVDHHR in its permanency plan suggested adoption within the family as being the desired course of action. However, this Court is dismayed by the administrative delays within WVDHHR vis-a-vis adoptions and believes that permanent foster care is more appropriate especially since contact between the natural mother and the child is to be maintained. In this connection, however, WVDHHR is to understand that when the Court directs it to place a child in permanent foster care, the Court intends that there is to be a placement with a family which is willing to serve in that capacity until the child reaches his majority or is otherwise emancipated and that such a grant of authority does not permit a movement from one foster home to another, which process is deemed by this Court to be injurious to the child.

B. Brianna H.

Brianna H. is the natural daughter of Travis H. and Melissa Y. On April 14, 1997, six-month-old Brianna H. was admitted to City Hospital in Martinsburg, West Virginia at the direction of Dr. Edward Arnett, a local pediatrician . X-rays taken at the hospital revealed that Brianna H. had sustained multiple fractures of her ribs and right leg.

Brianna H.'s injuries were reported to the Department for investigation, and on April 15, 1997, the Department filed a civil petition against Travis H. and Melissa Y. See footnote 5On the same date, the circuit court awarded the Department temporary custody of Brianna H.

On April 24, 1997 , a preliminary hearing was held. After the hearing, the circuit judge entered an order continuing the transfer of custody to the Department and directing the Department to permit supervised visitation between Brianna H. and her parents.

An adjudicatory hearing occurred on July 1, 1997 . In an Adjudication Order filed July 7, 1997, the circuit judge found that Brianna H. was an abused and/or neglected child; See footnote 6 ordered the Department to retain temporary custody of Brianna H. and to continue supervised visitation between Brianna H. and her parents; and required the Department to prepare and submit a "permanency plan" See footnote 7for Brianna H.

On September 30, 1997, the evidentiary portion of a disposition hearing took place. At the hearing, counsel for Travis H. voiced an objection to the child's case plan, which the Department had submitted to the circuit court prior to the hearing. Counsel for all sides agreed that the plan did not fully comply with Rule 28 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings promulgated by this Court. Consequently, the circuit judge ordered the Department to submit a revised case plan within ten days and further ordered the parties to reconvene on October 17, 1997, to conclude the hearing.

On October 10, 1997, the Department submitted a revised child's case plan, recommending that parental rights be terminated and visitation discontinued. The Department also proposed, in the plan, that Brianna H. be placed for adoption, either with a family member or in one of the adoptive homes that had already been approved by the Department.

On October 17, 1997, the disposition hearing was concluded with oral arguments by counsel. On October 20, 1997 , the circuit judge entered a disposition order which departed markedly from the revised child's case plan submitted by the Department. In the order, the circuit judge terminated the parental rights of Travis H. and Melissa Y., as recommended by the Department. However, the circuit court, by its order, also required that Travis H. and Melissa Y. be afforded supervised visitation with Brianna H. Moreover, instead of ordering that Brianna H. be placed in an adoptive home, the circuit court awarded permanent guardianship of Brianna H. to the Department with the direction that she be placed in permanent foster care. See footnote 8

C. Tobias W., Joshua W., and Alicia W.

Kelly S. is the natural mother of three children: Tobias W., born April 1, 1990, Joshua W., born April 2, 1991, and Alicia W., born May 30, 1992. The children's natural father is deceased. On October 3, 1995, the Department submitted a civil petition to the circuit court alleging that Kelly S. had neglected her children. See footnote 9 By an order of the same date, the circuit court awarded the Department temporary custody of the children pending a preliminary hearing. See footnote 10

On October 13, 1995, a preliminary hearing was held. By an order filed on November 14, 1995, the circuit court renewed its award of temporary custody to the Department; granted the Department leave to place the children in foster care or with a suitable relative; and ordered that supervised visitation between Kelly S. and the children be conducted. Thereafter, Tobias W., Joshua W., and Alicia W. were placed in separate foster homes in Morgan County.

On March 18, 1996, Kelly S., her counsel, and two representatives of the Department convened for an adjudicatory hearing, at which time counsel for Kelly S. moved for a preadjudicatory improvement period. See footnote 11 The Department did not object, and by order filed July 31, 1996, the circuit court granted Kelly S. a preadjudicatory improvement period of one year. See footnote 12 By the same order, the circuit judge directed the Department to prepare a "family case plan" See footnote 13 and ordered Kelly S. to complete a drug and alcohol treatment program before the end of the improvement period. On December 17, 1996 , the Department filed a family case plan which outlined a plan for Kelly S.'s recovery from alcoholism and development of parenting skills.

On December 19, 1996, the guardian ad litem moved for revocation of the improvement period alleging that Kelly S. had failed to comply with the terms and conditions thereof . At a hearing on February 7, 1997, Kelly S. agreed to revocation of the improvement period and also waived her right to an adjudicatory hearing. By order filed February 28, 1997, the circuit judge found Kelly S. to be guilty of neglect, as defined in W. Va. Code § 49- 1-3; placed her on a six month post-adjudicatory improvement period; required the Department to prepare a family case plan; and granted the Department permission to keep the children in separate foster homes during the improvement period with the stipulation that visitation among them be maintained.

On April 18, 1997, the Department filed a second family case plan, detailing problems of and goals for Kelly S. and her children, including a plan to reunite the children with their mother. By order filed July 21, 1997, the post-adjudicatory improvement period was extended for three months in order to allow the Department sufficient time to complete the reunification. When the extension was ordered, two of the three children had already been returned to Kelly S.

On October 9, 1997, the guardian ad litem filed a Motion for Revocation of Improvement Period due to Kelly S. 's alleged failure to overcome her alcohol and substance abuse problems. At a hearing on the motion on October 20, 1997, testimony concerning Kelly S. 's relapse was presented. On October 22, 1997, a disposition order was filed. See footnote 14 In that order, the circuit court terminated Kelly S. 's parental rights; awarded permanent guardianship of the children to the Department with the direction that they be placed in permanent foster care; and granted Kelly S. post-termination visitation rights. See footnote 15

II. Discussion

The issues now before this Court concern the circuit court's direction in its disposition orders, following termination of parental rights, that the children be placed in permanent foster care and that their parents be afforded visitation. On appeal, we apply a two-pronged standard of review, as set forth in Syllabus Point 1 of McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Company, 197 W.Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996):

> When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard.

A. Permanent Foster Care

Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code is entitled "Child Welfare," and W.Va. Code § 49-1-3 [1994] therein defines an "abused child" as a child who is harmed or threatened by "[a] parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home[.]" In addition, W.Va. Code § 49-1-3 [1994] defines a "neglected child" as a child who is harmed or threatened "by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian[.]"

Article 6 of Chapter 49 is entitled "Procedure in Cases of Child Neglect or Abuse" and provides various remedies for the protection of children, including, in certain circumstances, the termination of parental rights. Specifically, pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) [1996], a circuit court may

> [u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental, custodial or guardianship rights and/or responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the state department or a licensed child welfare agency.

Additionally, W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) provides that if the circuit court makes the finding delineated therein, > then in fixing its dispositional order, the court shall consider the following factors: (1) The child's need for continuity of care and caretakers; (2) the amount of time required for the child to be integrated into a stable and permanent home environment; and (3) other factors as the court considers necessary and proper.

Plainly, W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) is silent on the issue of whether foster care or an adoptive home is the preferred permanent out-of-home placement option See footnote 16 for an abused or neglected child. However, W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) must be considered in light of W. Va. Code § 49-1-1(a) [1997], the purpose clause of the child welfare chapter, which provides generally that > it is the intention of the Legislature . . . when the child has to be removed from his or her family, to secure for the child custody, care and discipline consistent with the child's best interests and other goals herein set out.

In order to effectuate the legislative intent expressed in W. Va. Code § 49-1-1(a) , a circuit court must endeavor to secure for a child who has been removed from his or her family a permanent placement with the level of custody, care, commitment, nurturing and discipline that is consistent with the child's best interests. W e find that adoption, with its corresponding rights and duties , is the permanent out-of-home placement option which is most "consistent with the child's best interests." See footnote 17*W. Va. Code* § 49-1-1(a) . Only through adoption can a child who has been removed from his or her parents achieve a legal and economic status "on a par with natural children." Wheeling Dollar Sav. & Trust Co. v. Hanes , 160 W.Va. 711, 716, 237 S.E.2d 499, 502 (1977).

Accordingly, we hold that where parental rights have been terminated pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) [1996] , and it is necessary to remove the abused and/or neglected child from his or her family, an adoptive home is the preferred permanent out-of- home placement of the child. Therefore, we further hold that in determining the appropriate permanent out-of-home placement of a child under W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) [1996], the circuit court shall give priority to securing a suitable adoptive home for the child and shall consider other placement alternatives, including permanent foster care, only where the court finds that adoption would not provide custody, care , commitment, nurturing and discipline consistent with the child's best interests or where a suitable adoptive home can not be found.

As indicated above, the circuit court in these consolidated cases made the requisite finding for termination of parental rights, terminated the parental rights of the abusive and/or neglectful parents, and committed the children to the permanent guardianship of the Department with the direction that they be placed in permanent foster care. Neither the circuit court's termination of parental rights nor its commitment of the children to the permanent guardianship of the Department is now before us. Rather, we decide whether the circuit court abused its discretion by ordering that the children be placed in permanent foster care. In that regard, we observe that there is no evidence in the record which indicates that adoption would not be in each child's best interests. Instead, it appears from the record that the trial court's selection of permanent foster care, over adoption, was directly related to the court's overt dissatisfaction with the Department. See footnote 18 While we sympathize with the circuit court's frustration over any unwarranted delays caused by the Department, we cannot allow innocent children to be arbitrarily deprived of the chance to be adopted, especially when doing so would be contrary to the explicit intent of the Legislature embodied in W. Va. Code § 49-1-1(a). T hus, under our holding today, this Court concludes that the circuit court committed error in ordering foster care as a permanent placement for the five children without first trying to secure for each of them a suitable adoptive home.

Furthermore, as part of this Court's review of these cases, we entered an order on May 22, 1998, directing the Department "to provide to this Court on or before the 21st day of June, 1998, a complete and detailed report on each child presently within the custody of the Department, or its authorized agent, who has not been placed by the Department in permanent foster care, an adoptive home, or with a natural parent, pursuant to the intent of the Legislature outlined in W. Va. Code, 49-1-1, et seq." In addition, we ordered that "the Department shall include within its report to this Court a report on the status of all children legally free for adoption through the West Virginia foster care and adoption system." We further ordered that "[t]he Department's report should also include an explanation of the endeavors undertaken by the Department to rectify" its noncompliance with the law respecting adoption transfers, as set forth in Rule 15420 of the DHHR Social Service Manual.

B. Post-termination Visitation

In Syllabus Point 5 of In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), this Court held:

When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

Moreover, Rule 15 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings states that [i]f at any time the court orders a child removed from the custody of his or her parent(s) and placed in the custody of the Department or of some other responsible person, the court may make such provision for reasonable visitation as is consistent with the child's well-being and best interests. The court shall assure that any supervised visitation shall occur in surroundings and in a safe place, dignified, and suitable for visitation, taking into account the child's age and condition. . . . In determining the appropriateness of granting visitation rights to the person seeking visitation, the court shall consider whether or not the granting of visitation would interfere with the child's case plan and the overall effect granting or denying visitation will have on the child's best interest.

In these cases, the lower court summarily ordered the Department to provide post-termination visitation between the children and their parents without hearing any evidence or argument, or making any findings, regarding whether such visitation would be detrimental to each child's well being or in each child's best interests. See footnote 19 As indicated earlier, the Department does not contest the grant of post-termination visitation in Michael M. However, we note that the guardian ad litem in Michael M. assigns the grant as error in an appellate brief lodged with this Court, and, therefore, we review the issue in that case. In Brianna H., the Department recommended against visitation in the child's case plan and now contests the grant of post-termination visitation on appeal. Thus, we proceed to examine the propriety of the grant in Brianna H. as well. Lastly, in Tobias W., although we observe that the Department did not object to post-termination visitation in the court below, and "[a] litigant may not silently acquiesce to error . . . and then raise that error as a reason for reversal on appeal," In Interest of S. C., 168 W. Va. 366, 374, 284 S.E.2d 867, 872 (1981), we also find that the guardian ad litem failed to file an appellate brief and, further, failed to appear before this Court for oral argument. We conclude that it would be an unjust and rather twisted result for us to refuse to consider the issue in Tobias W. simply because the children's guardian completely failed to represent their interests on appeal. Accordingly, we review the circuit court's grant of post-termination visitation in all three cases.

Upon a careful review of the record, this Court finds that no evidence was introduced below on the issues of whether post-termination visitation would be detrimental to each child's well being and whether such visitation would be in his or her best interests. Under In re Christina L., supra , and Rule 15 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings , the circuit court should have taken evidence, heard arguments, and made specific findings of fact on these issues. Accordingly, this Court concludes in all three cases that the circuit court committed error in granting post-termination visitation to the children's parents without hearing evidence and making conclusions under the applicable standards. Furthermore, the children will more than likely be placed for adoption on remand, and their individual needs, wishes and "best interests" may significantly change following their placement in adoptive homes. Thus, post-termination visitation must be considered in that context on remand.

III. Conclusion

Upon all of the above, the final orders of the Circuit Court of Berkeley County are reversed to the extent that the Department was directed to place the children in permanent foster care, and these cases are remanded to the circuit court for the entry of an order in each case directing the Department to transfer the child or children involved to the adoption unit and to register each child on the Adoption Exchange, pursuant to Rule 15420 of the DHHR Social Service Manual. Additionally, upon remand in each case, the circuit court shall conduct a hearing, pursuant to In re Christina L., supra , and Rule 15 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, to determine whether post-termination visitation between each child and his or her parent(s) is appropriate. In the event that such visitation is found to be not detrimental to the child's well being and in the child's best interests, the Department shall prepare and submit a plan of supervised visitation for the circuit court's review. Furthermore, the circuit court shall revisit the issue of post- termination visitation with respect to each child after adoption .

Reversed, in part, and remanded with directions.

Footnote: 11 The record in Tobias W. indicates that the guardian ad litem failed to attend the March 18, 1996, hearing. The guardian ad litem also neglected to file a brief with this Court or to appear before us for oral argument. We find it disconcerting that the children's attorney abdicated his duty to represent them at these critical stages of the proceedings. In Syllabus Point 5 of James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), we held that "[t]he guardian ad litem's role in abuse and neglect proceedings does not actually cease until such time as the child is placed in a permanent home." In In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 454, n.7, 460 S.E.2d 692, 700, n.7 (1995), we admonished guardians ad litem that "it is their responsibility to represent their clients in every stage of the abuse and/or neglect proceedings. This duty includes appearing before this Court to represent the child during oral arguments." The guardian ad litem is also responsible for filing an appellate brief on behalf of his or her child ward. We recognized this duty in In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 91, n.16, 479 S.E.2d 589, 601, n.16 (1996), stating: "Part of this representation is to file an appellate brief to insure that their clients' interests are presented." We again underscore that guardians ad litem have a duty to fully represent the interests of their child wards at all stages of the abuse and/or neglect proceedings, both in the circuit court and on appeal.

Footnote: 12 By an Amended Order For Improvement Period, filed August 19, 1996, the circuit court preserved any objection which the State of West Virginia and guardian ad litem had to the improvement period .

Footnote: 13 Rule 3 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings defines "family case plan" as "the plan prepared by the Department pursuant to W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-2(b), 49-6D-3 and 49-6-12 following the grant of an improvement period."

Footnote: 14 We observe with great concern that more than two years lapsed between the circuit court's initial grant of emergency custody to the Department on October 3, 1995, and the filing of a disposition order on October 22, 1997. We find it particularly disturbing that during that period, Tobias W. was moved from one foster home to another because he was exhibiting "disruptive behaviors," and Alicia W. was removed from a foster home "[b]ased upon allegations of neglect," as evidenced by letters from the Department to the circuit judge, dated January 30, 1996, and May 13, 1997. We note that Judge Steptoe 's involvement in Tobias W. did not begin until approximately February 7, 1997, when he presided at a hearing in the case. In addition, we are cognizant that the various time limits set forth in the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, adopted December 5, 1996, effective January 1, 1997, were not in effect until the later stages of Tobias W. Nevertheless, given the extensive delays mentioned above , we reemphasize that decisions about the permanent placement of a child should not be delayed unnecessarily.

In Syllabus Point 1 of In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991), we recognized that "[u]njustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security." In In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 455, 460 S.E.2d 692, 701 (1995), we criticized delay in considering abandonment by a parent because such delay "leaves the status of the children dangling . . . in 'No Man's Land' with regard to any resolution in their lives." Accord In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 86, 479 S.E.2d 589, 596 (1996); see also In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 726, 482 S.E.2d 893, 903 (1996). O nce again, we urge circuit judges to resolve abuse and/or neglect proceedings as expeditiously as possible lest those maltreated children who come before the courts be further harmed while within our judicial system.

Footnote: 15 The disposition order in Tobias W. is, in relevant part, substantially the same as the above-quoted language from the disposition order in Michael M.

Footnote: 16 Under Rule 3(j)(3) of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, "[a] permanent out-of-home placement has been achieved only when the child has been placed in a permanent, court-approved, and ratified foster care home as defined by statute, or the child has been adopted or has been emancipated."

Footnote: 17 With regard to the effect of an adoption, W. Va. Code § 48-4-11 [1984] provides:

(a) Upon the entry of such order of adoption, any person previously entitled to parental rights, any parent or parents by any previous legal adoption, and the lineal or collateral kindred of any such person, parent or parents, except any such person or parent who is the husband or wife of the petitioner for adoption, shall be divested of all legal rights, including the right of inheritance from or through the adopted child under the statutes of descent and distribution of this State, and shall be divested of all obligations in respect to the said adopted child, and the said adopted child shall be free from all legal obligations, including obedience and maintenance, in respect to any such person, parent or parents. From and after the entry of such order of adoption, the adopted child shall be, to all intents and for all purposes, the legitimate issue of the person or persons so adopting him or her and shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges and subject to all the obligations of a natural child of such adopting parent or parents.

(b) For the purpose of descent and distribution, from and after the entry of such order of adoption, a legally adopted child shall inherit from and through the parent or parents of such child by adoption and from or through the lineal or collateral kindred of such adopting parent or parents in the same manner and to the same extent as though said adopted child were a natural child of such adopting parent or parents, but such child shall not inherit from any person entitled to parental rights prior to the adoption nor their lineal or collateral kindred, except that a child legally adopted by a husband or wife of a person entitled to parental rights prior to the adoption shall inherit from such person as well as from the adopting parent. If a legally adopted child shall die intestate, all property, including real and personal, of such adopted child shall pass, according to the statutes of descent and distribution of this State, to those persons who would have taken had the decedent been the natural child of the adopting parent or parents.

Footnote: 18 Besides stating in its disposition orders that it was " dismayed by the administrative delays within WVDHHR vis-a-vis adoptions," the circuit judge stated as follows at a hearing in Tobias W. on October 20, 1997:

And with regard to the disposition of the children, the Court is no longer granting guardianship to the department for purposes of seeking adoption. The department for bureaucratic reasons has what I consider to be an intolerable delay in the placement of children for adoption, so I will grant permanent guardianship to the department with the direction that they place the children in permanent foster care . . . . The Court will not permit the department to go the adoption route unless and until the department shows that it can move those things faster.

Footnote: 19 In the disposition order in Brianna H., the circuit court gave virtually no basis for its grant of visitation rights, stating merely that "it does not follow that these parents should have no future contact with this child and so the Court is of the opinion that visitation rights ought to be granted within limitation." The disposition orders in the Michael M. and Tobias W. cases were also cursory with respect to post-termination visitation.

Davis, Justice:

The appellants herein, and plaintiffs below, Paul and Virginia Williams [hereinafter collectively referred to as "the Williamses"], appeal from an order entered May 11, 1999, by the Circuit Court of Mercer County. By that order, the court denied the Williamses' motion to intervene in the abuse and neglect proceedings concerning their former foster children, Michael Ray T.[1] [hereinafter referred to as "Michael"], Scottie Lee T. [hereinafter referred to as "Scottie"], and Tonya Lynn T. [hereinafter referred to as "Tonya"]. The court further refused to consider the Williamses' motion for custody, wherein they sought the return of these children to their care following the youngsters' removal from their foster care by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources [hereinafter referred to as "DHHR"]. Upon a review of the parties' arguments, the appellate record, and the pertinent authorities, we conclude that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion by refusing the requested intervention. Therefore, we affirm the decision of the Circuit Court of Mercer County.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The facts underlying the instant appeal are as follows. On April 8, 1998, the DHHR filed a petition in the Circuit Court of Mercer County requesting the immediate and temporary transfer of custody of Michael,[2] Scottie,[3] and Tonya[4] to the DHHR as a result of the perceived imminent danger the children would face if they remained in the home of their biological parents, Frank T. and Lizzie T. The incidents leading to this petition centered around the life-threatening injuries sustained by then six-week-old Michael when he was repeatedly and viciously attacked by rodents in his parents' home on April 4, 1998. Additionally, the DHHR remained concerned that Lizzie would again return to the family home with Michael's siblings despite the persistence of the rodent infestation and warnings by DHHR officials that the home was not safe for children. The circuit court found that "[t]he danger presented by the child(ren)'s present circumstances creates an emergency situation which has made efforts to avoid removing the child(ren) from the home unreasonable or impossible," and transferred their temporary custody to the DHHR.

As a result of the critical injuries he sustained, Michael was hospitalized for an extended period of time at Women and Children's Hospital, in Charleston, West Virginia. His siblings, Tonya and Scottie, were placed with a foster family[5] following their removal from their parents' home. After Michael's partial recovery and release from the hospital, he was placed into foster care with the Williamses[6] on April 16, 1998. Due to the severity of Michael's injuries, Tonya and Scottie were not placed with the Williamses until July, 1998, when their younger brother had recovered further.[7] By order entered August 14, 1998, the circuit court adjudicated the children to have been neglected by their biological parents.[8] On September 11, 1998, the circuit court, during a dispositional hearing, granted Frank and [5]Tonya and Scottie were not immediately placed with the Williamses, but rather with a different foster family.

[6]The Williamses had been approved as a specialized foster care home and were sponsored in their provision of such care by Try-Again Homes, Inc.

[7]Because Michael's injuries had been so numerous and severe, there was concern that his siblings might pose a risk of infection to him and that the children would sustain psychological damage if they were reunited before Michael had healed.

[8]The adjudication of neglect was based upon the definition of that term contained in W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(g)(1)(A) (1994) (Repl. Vol. 1996):

> "Neglected child" means a child . . .
> [w]hose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian . . . .

For the current definition of this term, see W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(h)(1)(A) (1999) (Repl. Vol. 1999).

Lizzie a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period, and continued legal and physical custody of the children with the DHHR.

From the time of her placement into the Williamses' home, Tonya exhibited various behavioral and disciplinary problems, believed to be the result of parentification.[9] Although Tonya and Scottie had been having regular supervised visitation with their biological parents since their removal in April, 1998,[10] following one such supervised visit

[9]When she resided with her biological parents, Tonya reportedly enjoyed a great deal of control over her circumstances and assumed the care of and responsibility for her younger siblings. One of Tonya's counselors explained her behavior thusly:

> The term parentified child or parentification is widely accepted in the field of psychology and counseling to refer to the process in which a child is routinely permitted to assume responsibilities which appropriately belong to parents. For a young child, this is a frightening experience, because, at some level, the child realizes that s/he is unable to adequately assume the responsibilities being given. On the other hand, the child adapts to the situation by enjoying the feeling of power that results from being in charge. Being in charge becomes a survival skill for a young child whose parents do not consistently take responsibility and make decisions. If the child does not take charge, it is possible that nobody else will and this could be potentially life threatening. Therefore, when an adult attempts to assume the responsibilities such a child has been inappropriately given, the child customarily reacts with resistance and resentment, and is likely to fight to retain control. The result is a power struggle between the child and whichever adult is attempting to parent that child.

on October 14, 1998, Tonya's conduct worsened dramatically.[11] In an attempt to protect Scottie and Michael from their sister, Mrs. Williams requested respite care for Tonya.[12] Around the same time, Tonya confided in her foster parents that, during the recent supervised visit, she had been sexually abused by her biological mother. The Williamses reported this incident to the Child Protective Services [hereinafter referred to as "CPS"] caseworker who formerly had handled the children's case.[13] Nevertheless, Mr. and Mrs. Williams received the impression that the allegation would not be investigated and that no further action would be taken with regard thereto, due in large part to Tonya's failure to cooperate with DHHR officials by telling them her story.

[11]Such misconduct included abusive and self-abusive behavior, lying, and stealing.

[12]Generally,

> "respite care" envisions the short-term placement of a child outside of the child's home environment in order to permit the child's parent(s) or guardian(s) and the child a temporary reprieve from a stressful familial situation. Respite care is often sought by families who have children with severe physical, emotional, or mental difficulties as a type of "cooling off" period before the family relationship becomes irreparably damaged.

State ex rel. Paul B. v. Hill, 201 W. Va. at 251 n.9, 496 S.E.2d at 201 n.9.

[13]The Williamses state that although the children's case had recently been assigned to a different caseworker, they contacted the former caseworker because they were more familiar with her.

Following this incident, Tonya's weekly counseling sessions increased in number, and the guardian ad litem and the State jointly moved to temporarily suspend Tonya's visits with Frank and Lizzie. By order entered December 15, 1998, the circuit court suspended, for sixty days, supervised visitation between Tonya and her biological parents.[14] In late December, 1998, the Williamses again requested respite care for Tonya because of her continued defiance of family rules. Upon Tonya's return to the Williamses' home, her demeanor improved.

Thereafter, the DHHR alleges that, as a result of their continuing difficulties with Tonya, the Williamses were admonished and instructed as to acceptable forms of discipline during a multidisciplinary treatment team [hereinafter referred to as "MDT"] meeting on January 12, 1999. Because of the persistent "power struggle" between Tonya and Mrs. Williams, arising from Tonya's defiance and attempt to obtain and retain control, and concerns that the Williamses had inappropriately and negatively discussed Frank and Lizzie in the child's presence, the team also discussed the possibility of removing the children from the Williamses' care.[15] By letter to Mr. and Mrs. Williams dated January 21, [14]Frank and Lizzie continued to enjoy supervised visitation with Scottie and Michael.

[15]In the event that Tonya would be removed from the Williamses' care, her siblings would also be relocated to ensure the unity of the sibship. See State ex rel. Paul B., 201 W. Va. at 257, 496 S.E.2d at 207 (alluding to "State's public policy of attempting to unite siblings in foster care placements"). See also W. Va. Code § 49-2-14(b(3),d,e,f) (1995) (continued...)

1999, the CPS worker assigned to the children's case reiterated the tenor of the MDT meeting:

> The team members agreed that corrections needed to be made in your approach to dealing with Tonya and that if these corrections can not be made a team meeting will be held to discuss the removal of the T[.] children. . . .
>
> The Department [DHHR] looks forward to maintaining these children in your home as long as it is in the best interest of the children.

(Emphasis added).

In February, 1999, the circuit court ordered the gradual resumption of visits between Tonya and her biological parents. On March 26, 1999, the circuit court ordered the extension of the biological parents' improvement period to coincide with the expiration of their period of probation[16] in October, 2002. The circuit court also allegedly ordered the commencement of in-home visitation, whereby the children would visit Frank and Lizzie in their home. The Williamses submit that, upon explaining these visits to Tonya, she revealed that she had sustained numerous additional instances of sexual abuse, involving both of her biological parents and other relatives, before she had been removed from her parents' home.[17] Apparently out of concern for Tonya's safety and as a result of the perceived inaction by the DHHR in response to the October report of sexual abuse, the Williamses penned a nine-page letter, disclosing the children's full names, revealing certain confidences about them, and detailing Tonya's allegations, and sent it to various government officials and agencies on March 30, 1999.[18] Neither the DHHR nor the children's guardian ad litem had prior knowledge of this correspondence.

Presumably perceiving the letter to be a breach of the Williamses' duty of confidentiality and apparently due to growing concern about their care of the children, the DHHR removed the sibship from the Williamses' home on April 5, 1999, believing such [17]Upon learning such information, the children's guardian ad litem moved to suspend visitation between Frank and Lizzie and the three children pending further investigation of the sexual abuse allegations. The circuit court granted this motion on April 16, 1999.

[18]This letter was sent, by facsimile, to the following governmental agencies and officials: "Trooper Hinzman[,] Bob Wise[,] Sen. Rockefeller[,] Sen. Byrd[,] Gov. Underwood[,] The Whitehouse Office of Agency Liaison[,] Mr. Shank at DHHR[,] . . . Justice John E. [sic] McCusky [sic] - WV Supreme Court[,] WV Advocate[,] Joan Ohl[,] Bill Sadler[,] Tom Berry[,] Judge David Knight[,] Kathie King - DHHR CPS Office[,] State Prosecutor's Office[,] State Ethics Committee[,] Hillary Clinton's Office[, and] Dept. of HHS Children's Bureau, Wash[ington], DC."

The appellate record does not indicate whether a prior investigation of these charges had been initiated as a result of Tonya's October allegations, however an investigation was commenced on April 2, 1999, in response to communications by Tonya's counselor to the Princeton detachment of the West Virginia State Police. Failure to report suspected child abuse to the appropriate authorities is a misdemeanor offense. W. Va. Code § 49-6A-8 (1984) (Repl. Vol. 1999).

removal to be in the children's best interests. The children subsequently were placed with another foster family. Following the children's removal from the Williamses' home, Try-Again Homes, Inc., terminated its sponsorship of the Williamses as foster care providers, effective April 5, 1999, citing "the major breach of confidentiality demonstrated by the letter [the Williamses] disseminated to people who are not covered by Try-Again Homes and/or Department of Health and Human Resources release of information."

As a result of the children's removal from their home, the Williamses filed a Motion to Intervene in the children's abuse and neglect proceedings and a motion requesting the circuit court to return the children to their foster care. By order entered May 11, 1999, the circuit court denied intervention and declined to consider whether the children should be returned to the Williamses' care. In so ruling, the circuit court noted that > a court has the discretion to allow foster parents who have physical custody of a child to intervene in abuse and neglect proceedings. See In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996). However, in the present case, the Williams [sic] no longer have physical custody of the children.

> In their Motion, the Williams [sic] allege that the DHHR "improperly and unlawfully removed" the children from their home. This alleged improper removal, and the request to file a motion to have the three children returned to their foster care would be more appropriately addressed through an extraordinary remedy such as a writ of mandamus.[19] Therefore, this Court will not address whether the DHHR > should return the children to the foster care of the Williams [sic] at this time.

[19]To date, the Williamses have not attempted to obtain their requested relief through an extraordinary remedy in either the circuit court or this Court.

> [T]his Court does not find that the Williams [sic] have a right to intervene . . . .

(Footnote added).[20] From this circuit court decision, the Williamses appeal to this Court.[21]

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Prior to addressing the merits of the Williamses' assignments of error, we must consider the general standard for evaluating the propriety of a circuit court's ruling.

> In reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, we apply a two-prong deferential standard of review. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to a de novo review.

[20]Despite its rejection of the Williamses' motion to intervene, the court recognized "the role the Williams [sic] have played in the children's life and f[ound] that input from the Williams [sic] would be valuable in determining the best interest of the T[.] children." Accordingly, the court held a limited evidentiary hearing on June 10, 1999, at which only the Williamses were permitted to testify and present exhibits, but not additional witnesses, regarding the children's best interests.

[21]Since the Williamses filed their petition for appeal in this Court, on July 19, 1999, the DHHR, during a July 23, 1999, hearing, advised the circuit court that it would not amend the neglect petition to include sexual abuse allegations due to insufficient evidence thereof. Subsequently, by order entered October 8, 1999, the circuit court terminated Frank and Lizzie's parental rights vis-a-vis Michael, Scottie, and Tonya. A farewell visit remains to be scheduled.

Syl. pt. 2, Walker v. West Virginia Ethics Comm'n, 201 W. Va. 108, 492 S.E.2d 167 (1997). As more precise standards govern the specific issues presented for our determination, we will incorporate these additional methods of review in our discussion of those issues.

III.

DISCUSSION

On appeal to this Court, the Williamses raise two assignments of error: (1) the circuit court erred in denying their motion to intervene and (2) the circuit court improperly refused to consider their motion for custody. The DHHR, joined by the children's guardian ad litem, rejects the Williamses' contentions and urges this Court to uphold the circuit court's rulings.

A. Motion to Intervene

The Williamses first assign as error the circuit court's denial of their motion to intervene. In the case of In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996), we set forth guidelines regarding foster parents' participation in abuse and neglect proceedings:

> The foster parents' involvement in abuse and neglect proceedings should be separate and distinct from the fact-finding portion of the termination proceeding and should be structured for the purpose of providing the circuit court with all pertinent information regarding the child. The level and type of participation in such cases is left to the sound discretion of the circuit court with due consideration of the length of time the child has been cared for by the foster parents and the relationship that has developed. To the extent that this holding > is inconsistent with Bowens v. Maynard, 174 W. Va. 184, 324 S.E.2d 145 (1984), that decision is hereby modified.

Syl. pt. 1, id. (emphasis added). From this language, it is apparent that our review of the circuit court's decision regarding the Williamses' intervention motion is for an abuse of discretion. "Typically, a grant of discretion to a lower court commands this Court to extend substantial deference to such discretionary decisions." State v. Allen, ___ W. Va. ___, ___, ___ S.E.2d ___, ___, slip op. at 20 (No. 25980 Nov. 17, 1999). In other words, "'[u]nder the abuse of discretion standard, we will not disturb a circuit court's decision unless the circuit court makes a clear error of judgment or exceeds the bounds of permissible choices in the circumstances.'" Hensley v. West Virginia Dep't of Health & Human Resources, 203 W. Va. 456, 461, 508 S.E.2d 616, 621 (1998) (quoting Gribben v. Kirk, 195 W. Va. 488, 500, 466 S.E.2d 147, 159 (1995)).

Reviewing the circuit court's decision, we note, at the outset, that the Williamses were not actually the foster parents of Michael, Scottie, and Tonya at the time they sought intervention. Rather, they stood in the position of the children's former foster parents. Under a strict application of our holding in Jonathan G., which dealt exclusively with the child's then current foster parents, the Williamses are not entitled to intervene in the children's abuse and neglect proceedings. See Syl. pt. 1, 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893. Nevertheless, we must consider the matter further. As this emerging new body of law has dealt previously only with the intervention rights of current foster parents, the question of whether a former foster parent has standing to intervene in the abuse and neglect proceeding concerning their former foster child(ren) is a matter of first impression in this Court. See Syl. pt. 1, In re Harley C., 203 W. Va. 594, 509 S.E.2d 875 (1998) ("Foster parents who are granted standing to intervene in abuse and neglect proceedings by the circuit court are parties to the action who have the right to appeal adverse circuit court decisions."); Syl. pt. 1, Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893.

The intervention rights we previously have afforded to current foster parents are limited, both by the circuit court's discretion to grant or deny such intervention and by the primary purpose for such intervention, that is to "provid[e] the circuit court with all pertinent information regarding the child." Syl. pt. 1, in part, Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893. When assessing the right of individuals to participate in abuse and neglect proceedings, we necessarily must be guided by our oft-repeated mantra that child abuse and neglect proceedings are, without fail, to be resolved as expeditiously as possible in order to safeguard the welfare and best interests of the fragile infant parties to such proceedings. "'Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security.' Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991)." Syl. pt. 3, Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893.

Although "we have repeatedly admonished lawyers and the circuit courts regarding the critical need for prompt resolution of child abuse and neglect proceedings," Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. at 733, 482 S.E.2d at 910, this cautionary is not solely a rule adopted by this Court. Rather, this directive is also a mandate imposed by the Legislature:

> Any petition filed and any proceeding held under the provisions of this article shall, to the extent practicable, be given priority over any other civil action before the court, except proceedings under article two-a [§ 48-2A-1 et seq.], chapter forty-eight of this code and actions in which trial is in progress.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(d) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 1999).

> "The clear import of the statute [West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible." Syl. Pt. 5, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

Syl. pt. 6, In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893.

This need for rapid finality in abuse and neglect proceedings is attributable to the overriding concern for the subject child's welfare. "'[A] child deserves resolution and permanency in his or her life . . . .'" Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. at 726, 482 S.E.2d at 903 (quoting State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 260, 470 S.E.2d 205, 214 (1996)). Moreover, "the best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children." Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W. Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) (citation omitted). Accordingly, in the interest of expediting the resolution and conclusion of abuse and neglect proceedings, we are hesitant to expand the realm of intervenors to individuals who are no longer guardians or custodians of the children at issue for fear that "'[u]njustified procedural delays'" undoubtedly would attend the ever-increasing roster of interested participants. See Syl. pt. 3, in part, Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893; Syl. pt. 1, in part, Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365.

Furthermore, while it is true that former foster parents may have an interest in participating in cases involving children who once were entrusted to their care, we must not forget that, in the present context, the rights of adults are subordinate to those of the involved children. "'"Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).' Syllabus Point 3, Matter of Taylor B., 201 W. Va. 60, 491 S.E.2d 607 (1997)." Syl. pt. 3, In re Harley C., 203 W. Va. 594, 509 S.E.2d 875. In other words, "[c]ases involving children must be decided not just in the context of competing sets of adults' rights, but also with a regard for the rights of the child(ren)." Syl. pt. 7, In re Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995). It is for these reasons, then, that we hold that former foster parents do not have standing to intervene in abuse and neglect proceedings involving their former foster child(ren). Based upon our decision, we further conclude that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion by refusing the Williamses' intervention motion.

In addition to our recognition of the preeminent rights of the infant child(ren) subject to abuse and neglect proceedings and our acknowledgment of the detrimental delays that would result from the extension of intervention to former foster parents, we wish to identify the very limited role that former foster parents may have in assisting a circuit court in determining the child(ren)'s best interests. As we noted in Jonathan G., the purpose behind allowing foster parents to intervene is to provide the court with information concerning the child(ren) with whose care they have been charged. Syl. pt. 1, in part, 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893. Former foster parents, as the former guardians, custodians, and/or caretakers of the subject child(ren), similarly have knowledge of the child(ren) that could be beneficial to a court considering the child(ren)'s best interests and ultimate fate. While complete intervention is not the proper role for former foster parents to participate in abuse and neglect proceedings, we do believe their input would, in many cases, be instructive and facilitate the court's decision. Therefore, we hold that a circuit court may, in its sound discretion, permit former foster parents to present evidence regarding their former foster child(ren) to assist the court in assessing the best interests of such child(ren) subject to an abuse and neglect proceeding. Based upon the record evidence in the instant appeal, we note, with approval, the circuit court's decision to permit the Williamses to testify and present evidence regarding Michael, Scottie, and Tonya, as they were in a position, as the children's former foster parents, to provide pertinent first-hand information for the court's consideration.

At this juncture, we wish also to applaud the Williamses' continued efforts to vigilantly protect what they perceive to be the best interests of the children previously entrusted to their care. Their dedication and devotion to their former young charges is readily apparent from their appearance before this Court. As we will explain further in Section III.B., infra, we are without sufficient information to determine whether the DHHR's removal decision was in error or whether the best interests of the children dictate their return to the Williamses' care. In any event, we do want to emphasize that, while the Williamses do not have a right of intervention in the underlying abuse and neglect proceedings, they may not be completely devoid of remedies should they desire to pursue this matter further. Such alternative remedies at their disposal may include the extraordinary remedies of mandamus, as alluded to in the circuit court's order, and habeas corpus. See Syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. Allstate Ins. Co. v. Union Pub. Serv. Dist., 151 W. Va. 207, 151 S.E.2d 102 (1966) ("Mandamus is a proper remedy to require the performance of a nondiscretionary duty by various governmental agencies or bodies."); Syl. pt. 2, West Virginia State Dep't of Pub. Assistance v. Miller, 142 W. Va. 855, 98 S.E.2d 783 (1957) ("The writ of habeas corpus is a proper remedy to determine the custody of a child, but it will not be issued in a pending suit, of which the court has jurisdiction, involving the temporary custody of such child; nor will a writ of prohibition lie against the judge of the court which has so taken jurisdiction."). As both of these proceedings would be external to the underlying abuse and neglect proceedings, there exists a lesser likelihood of unnecessary and disruptive procedural delay. See Syl. pt. 3, Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893; Syl. pt. 1, Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365.

B. Motion for Custody

The Williamses' second assignment of error centers around the circuit court's refusal to consider their motion for custody through which they sought the return of the children to their care. In its most basic form, this argument is essentially a challenge to the DHHR's decision to remove the children from their foster placement with Mr. and Mrs. Williams. A thorough review of the limited appellate record presented for our consideration herein fails to reveal any information regarding the DHHR's precise rationale for removing the children from the Williamses' foster care and lacks the circuit court's assessment as to the propriety of such removal or the children's subsequent placement with another foster family. Coupled with the insufficient record is the fact that the circuit court declined to consider the Williamses' custody motion and, thus, did not determine whether the children should or should not be returned to their foster care.

We frequently have stated that parties are duty-bound to preserve evidence in the record to ensure that this Court may conduct a complete review of the challenged lower court proceedings. "In a long line of unbroken precedent, this Court has held that the responsibility and burden of designating the record is on the parties and that appellate review must be limited to those issues which appear in the record presented to this Court." State v. Honaker, 193 W. Va. 51, 56, 454 S.E.2d 96, 101 (1994) (footnotes omitted) (citation omitted). Thus, where > an appellant [has] spurn[ed] his or her duty and drape[d] an > inadequate or incomplete record around this Court's neck, this Court, in its discretion, either has scrutinized the merits of the case insofar as the record permits or has dismissed the appeal if the absence of a complete record thwarts intelligent review.

State v. Miller, 194 W. Va. 3, 14, 459 S.E.2d 114, 125 (1995) (citations omitted).

Furthermore, a constant refrain of this Court is that we will not consider, for the first time on appeal, a matter that has not been determined by the lower court from which the appeal has been taken. "[T]he Supreme Court of Appeals is limited in its authority to resolve assignments of nonjurisdictional errors to a consideration of those matters passed upon by the court below and fairly arising upon the portions of the record designated for appellate review." Syl. pt. 6, in part, Parker v. Knowlton Constr. Co., Inc., 158 W. Va. 314, 210 S.E.2d 918 (1975). Therefore, "'"[i]n the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, this Court will not decide nonjurisdictional questions which were not considered and decided by the court from which the appeal has been taken." Syllabus Point 1, Mowery v. Hitt, 155 W. Va. 103[, 181 S.E.2d 334] (1971).' Syl. pt. 1, Shackleford v. Catlett, 161 W. Va. 568, 244 S.E.2d 327 (1978)." Syl. pt. 3, Voelker v. Frederick Bus. Properties Co., 195 W. Va. 246, 465 S.E.2d 246 (1995). See also Syl. pt. 2, Sands v. Security Trust Co., 143 W. Va. 522, 102 S.E.2d 733 (1958) (same).

Absent an adequate record detailing the DHHR's specific reasons for removing the children from the Williamses' home and the lack of a determination of this issue by the circuit court, we are precluded from reviewing the precise merits of this assignment of error.

Once again, however, we wish to commend the vigilance with which the Williamses sought to protect the perceived best interests of their former foster children, Michael, Scottie, and Tonya. We also appreciate the quintessential catch-22 in which Mr. and Mrs. Williams found themselves when they believed that Tonya's allegations of sexual abuse had not been adequately addressed by the appropriate governmental officials. It is unfathomable that any parent, biological, foster, adoptive, or otherwise, would not be terrified by the prospect that his or her child might be placed into a situation posing a risk of imminent danger and that such parent would not do everything in his or her power to protect his or her child. Nonetheless, we caution individuals entrusted with the care and/or custody of children involved in abuse and neglect proceedings of the utmost confidentiality attending these matters and the statutory prohibition of breaching such confidences. See W. Va. Code § 49-7-1 (1997) (Supp. 1997).[22]

[22]The version of this statutory provision applicable to the events underlying this appeal commands:

> (a) Except as otherwise provided in this chapter, all records and information concerning a child or juvenile which are maintained by a state department, agency, court or law-enforcement agency shall be kept confidential and shall not be released or disclosed to anyone, including any federal or state agency.

IV.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, we find that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in denying the Williamses' motion to intervene in the underlying abuse and neglect proceedings, as they were not the current foster parents but rather the former foster parents of the infant children involved in such proceedings. Accordingly, we hereby affirm the May 11, 1999, order of the Circuit Court of Mercer County.

Per Curiam:

Tina S. ("Tina"), the intervenor below and the appellant before this Court, appeals a final order of the Circuit Court of Mingo County entered on May 27, 2004, terminating the intervenor status of Tina and thus denying her request to adopt Michael S. Jr. ("Michael Jr.").

We affirm the circuit court's ruling terminating Tina's intervenor status; and we agree with the circuit court that it is in the best interest of the child for the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") to immediately begin a search for another adoptive placement option for Michael Jr.

I.

This case arises from a referral received on October 25, 2003, by the DHHR about the living conditions, hygiene, and mental health of Michael Jr., a five year old child. The referral alleged that the homes of his biological parents, Brenda E. and Michael Sr. ("Brenda" and "Michael Sr."), were in deplorable condition; that both parents and child suffered from poor hygiene; that Michael Jr. was not potty trained at age five; and that both parents were substance abusers.

After the DHHR investigated[1] the referral, the DHHR filed a child abuse and neglect petition on December 15, 2003, pursuant to W.Va. Code, 49-6-3 [2005] against Brenda and Michael Sr., seeking immediate custody of Michael Jr.

At a December 15 hearing, the circuit judge found sufficient evidence to justify immediate removal of Michael Jr. from the custody of his biological parents. Michael Jr. was directly remanded into the DHHR's custody based on a finding that he was in imminent danger due to aggravated circumstances. Michael Jr. was also appointed a guardian ad litem to represent and protect his best interest.

On December 17, 2003, a preliminary hearing was convened and the circuit judge held that Michael Jr. should remain in the legal and physical custody of the DHHR.[2] The appellant, Tina, who is a friend of Brenda, was given intervenor status at this hearing because she expressed an interest in adopting Michael Jr.

At the hearing Tina was told that she would be required to fill out the necessary paperwork, complete a home study, and undergo a psychological evaluation.

[1]The investigator not only found deplorable living conditions, but was also told by Michael Sr., that he had been previously convicted in Ohio of several counts of gross sexual imposition against minor children.

[2]The judge also found, inter alia, that: (1) Michael S. and Brenda E. lived in two separate homes; (2) Brenda E.'s home had large holes in the bathroom and kitchen floors and you could see the ground; (3) Michael Sr., the father, did not have potable water in his home and his source of electricity was an extension cord run from Brenda E.'s home; (4) both homes were unkept and dirty; (5) each home had puppy feces on the floor; (6) [Michael Jr.] lived in the home with Michael Sr. and slept in bed with him; (7) Michael Sr., had been convicted of several counts of gross sexual imposition against children under the age of thirteen; and (8) Brenda E. was aware of prior sexual convictions.

An adjudicatory hearing was held on January 20, 2004. At that hearing the circuit court found that Michael Jr. was a neglected child in accordance with W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [2005]. Tina attended this hearing and was informed of the date for her psychological evaluation.

At a February 23, 2004 dispositional hearing, Brenda and Michael Sr. requested a post-adjudicatory improvement period. The circuit court granted a sixty-day improvement period for Brenda, but denied Michael Sr.'s request. Another dispositional hearing was scheduled for April 21, 2004, at 3:30 p.m.

On April 16, 2004, Tina transported Brenda to a supervised visit with Michael Jr. The DHHR caseworker was present at the visit, and reported that there was little interaction between Tina and Michael Jr., and the interaction that did take place showed no signs of an emotional bond between the two.

On April 20, 2004, the day before the scheduled April 21 dispositional hearing, the circuit court changed the time for the April 21 hearing from 3:30 p.m. to 8:30 a.m. Brenda was present for the April 21, 2004 hearing, but Tina did not attend the hearing. Due to the limited record, it is unclear whether Tina informed Brenda of the time change, or if Brenda informed Tina. But it is clear that Tina knew of the hearing and failed to attend. At the hearing, Brenda was granted an extension on her improvement period.

The court held a final dispositional hearing on May 27, 2004. Tina did not attend this hearing in person, but was represented by counsel. Evidence was presented by the DHHR caseworker to the affect that no emotional bond existed between Michael Jr. and Tina; that Tina did not complete a home study or psychological evaluation;[3] and that Tina had not had any contact with Michael Jr. in more than a month. Tina also failed to attend a multi-disciplinary treatment team ("MDT") meeting where DHHR workers who were working on the Michael Jr. case discussed what was in the best interest of Michael Jr.

The circuit court's order from the May 27 hearing reflected that Brenda voluntarily relinquished her parental rights to Michael Sr. The order also terminated the parental rights of Michael Sr. because of his neglect of Michael Jr. and his non-participation with the hearings and services offered. The order also states that, due to Tina's non-cooperation with the proceedings and her failure to attend visitations or hearings, placement of Michael Jr. with Tina would not be in the best interest of the child. In conclusion the order stated that Michael Jr. should immediately be placed for adoption.

II.

"In reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, we apply a two-prong deferential standard of review. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to a de novo review." Syllabus Point 2, Walker v. West Virginia Ethics Commission, 201 W.Va. 108, 492 S.E.2d 167 (1997).

[3]It was later determined that the evaluation was never performed, based on a letter from the doctor who was to perform the evaluation, because Tina had canceled the appointment and never rescheduled.

Also, under the abuse of discretion standard, we will not disturb a circuit court's decision unless the circuit court makes a clear error of judgment or exceeds the bounds of permissible choices in the circumstances. Hensley v. West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources, 203 W.Va. 456, 461, 508 S.E.2d 616, 621 (1998).

In cases dealing with children this Court has repeatedly stated that the best interest of the child is the polar star upon which decisions should be based. In re Erica C., 214 W.Va. 375, 589 S.E.2d 517 (2003). Determining what is in the child's best interest is especially important when the child has been abused and neglected by his or her own parents and is currently in limbo as to a permanent home. "Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability, and security." Syllabus Point 2, In re Michael Ray T., 206 W.Va. 434, 525 S.E.2d 315 (1999). With the standard of the best interest of the child guiding this decision, we turn to the issue in the instant case: whether the circuit court erred in ruling against placing Michael Jr. in the adoptive custody of Tina, and in dismissing her as an invervenor.

Tina argues that her dismissal as an intervenor and possible adoptive parent of Michael Jr. was improper because she was not given any notice of a time change for a dispositional hearing, and that the lack of notice caused her to miss the April 21 hearing.

Thus, Tina argues, she was prevented from presenting "her side of the story" as to why she would be an appropriate candidate to adopt Michael Jr.

However, the DHHR points to the fact that the biological mother, Brenda, testified that she spoke with Tina and that Tina did know of the time change for the dispositional hearing. The DHHR also presented evidence showing that it notified Tina of the change in time. Finally, the DHHR points to all of the previous hearings, meetings, and visitations in the case where Tina could have shown a consistent and caring interest in Michael Jr., but did not.

While the limited record from below does not show that formal written notice was given to Tina of the time change, the circuit court found that she was informed of the time change by Brenda. Formal written notice of a time change for a proceeding may be necessary in some instances. However, in the instant case it is clear that Tina had actual notice as to when the dispositional hearing was going to occur, and she did not attend the hearing.

The lack of formal written notice in this instance should not be overlooked, but it is not outcome determinative. "Cases involving children must be decided not just in the context of competing sets of adults' rights, but also with a regard for the rights of the child(ren)." Syllabus Point 3, In re Michael Ray T., 206 W.Va. 434, 525 S.E.2d 315 (1999). Michael Jr. needs immediate permanency, consistency, and stability to counteract the lack of care and learning of his infant childhood.

Furthermore, Tina's absence from court proceedings, because of an alleged lack of notice or other reasons cannot be taken as meaning that she had a lack of opportunity to have her position considered by the court.

Tina canceled her psychological evaluation, and never scheduled a home study. She did not attend an MDT in which placement options for Michael Jr. were discussed. Tina transported Brenda to visitations with Michael Jr., but Tina herself only visited once with Michael Jr. - then only for a short period of time. During this short visit, the DHHR caseworker noticed no emotional bond between Tina and Michael Jr. Tina never requested additional meetings with Michael Jr., and took no steps to further the possibility of becoming his adoptive parent. The court stated that "[d]ue to Tina S.'s non-cooperation with these proceedings and failure to attend the visitations with the child and the hearings in this matter, placement of the child with Tina S. would not be in the best interests of the child."

From the record before the court, there is more than sufficient evidence to affirm the circuit court's decision to dismiss Tina as intervenor and possible adoptive parent of Michael Jr.

III.

In conclusion, we find that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in dismissing the intervenor, Tina S., from consideration as the potential adoptive parent for Michael Jr., because she was non-cooperative with the proceedings and failed to attend visitations and hearings. Any further delay in this case would be unjust to Michael Jr. and would be against his best interest. Accordingly, it is in the best interest of Michael Jr. that he be placed for permanent adoption according to DHHR policy and procedure. The order of the Circuit Court of Mingo County is affirmed.

Affirmed.

The testimony is inadmissible if the evidence was gathered strictly for investigative or forensic purposes." Syl. Pt. 9, *State v. Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by Rodney L. F. (hereinafter "Appellant") from an order of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County reversing a decision of the Family Court of Raleigh County in this child custody matter.[1] The Appellant contends that the lower court erred in concluding that the family court improperly considered inadmissible hearsay and expert witness opinion evidence in rendering its decision to grant the Appellant's petition for a modification of child custody. The Appellant further contends that even if the circuit court had been correct in its conclusion, the matter should have been remanded to the family court for a determination regarding whether sufficient evidence remained to grant the modification and whether the family court would permit the child to testify in light of the circuit court's ruling. Upon thorough review of the briefs, arguments, record, and applicable precedent, this Court reverses the decision of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County and remands this matter with directions that the November 18, 2005, order of the family court be reinstated.

I. Factual and Procedural History

The Appellant and Misty G. (hereinafter "Appellee") were divorced on August 21, 2003. The parties had one child, L.N.F., born on May 25, 1999. Pursuant to the divorce decree, primary custody of the child was granted to the Appellant. The parties exercised custodial time with their daughter without incident until November 20, 2003, at which time the Appellant filed a petition for modification and emergency relief, alleging that the child had been sexually abused by the Appellee's boyfriend, Thomas G.[2] The family court temporarily suspended the exercise of custodial rights by the Appellee until such time as a hearing could be held by the court and appointed Stacy Lynn Daniel-Fragile to serve as guardian ad litem for the child.

[1]We follow our traditional practice in cases involving sensitive facts and use initials to identify the last names of the parties. See In re Jeffrey R. L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

On January 16, 2004, the family court entered an order granting emergency relief and ordering the Department of Health and Human Resources, Child Protective Services, to investigate and determine whether supervised visitation could be arranged. The family court further ordered as follows: "The child is hereby referred for a sexual abuse assessment by a suitably licensed sexual abuse counselor, Susan McQuaide, and the Department of Health and Human Resources is ordered to assist [the Appellant] ensuring that the child is suitably evaluated by the counselor identified by the Court herein."

On May 4, 2005, and September 8, 2005, the family court conducted hearings on the Appellant's petition. The guardian ad litem submitted a report indicating her conclusion that both the Appellee and Mr. G. had been deceitful concerning Mr. G.'s access to the child during the time in which the abuse allegedly occurred. Evidence at the family court hearing also included testimony by the Appellant indicating that the child had begun experiencing vaginal soreness and irritation upon returning from visits at the Appellee's home. The Appellant indicated that the child had also begun acting out in sexually inappropriate manners.[3]

Ms. McQuaide testified that she had counseled the child, that the child had identified Mr. G. as the perpetrator of the abuse, and that the child had explicitly described the elements of the sexual abuse. Based upon the evidence presented in the hearing, the family court found that the Appellee had demonstrated a complete unwillingness to protect the child from abuse by Mr. G. The family court specifically noted that the Appellee had married Mr. G. at a time when she was uncertain of the truth of the allegations of abuse; that the Appellee had not been truthful regarding Mr. G.'s access to her daughter; that the Appellee denied that there were wooded areas around her home where the abuse allegedly occurred; and that other family members had confirmed that such wooded areas did exist. The family court granted the Appellant's petition for modification and ordered that all future visitation between the child and the Appellee should occur under the supervision of the Women's Resource Center Supervised Visitation Program in Beckley, West Virginia.

[3]The sexually inappropriate actions included attempting to take nude photographs of a child friend, inappropriate sexual touching of a child friend, and demonstration of sexual knowledge beyond that of a young child.

Upon the Appellee's appeal, the circuit court reversed the family court, finding that the family court had improperly considered expert opinion evidence from the child's counselor, Ms. McQuaide, and had applied an improper standard of proof in deciding the Appellant's petition. Specifically, the lower court found that the family court impermissibly permitted Ms. McQuaide to testify regarding whether Mr. G. had abused the child and improperly admitted Ms. McQuaide's testimony, as well as that of other family members, regarding statements the child had allegedly made.[4]

The lower court restored the schedule of visitation initially ordered upon the parties' divorce. The lower court did not remand the matter to the family court for a determination of whether the evidence properly admitted would have been sufficient to

[4]The circuit court, however, did find that Ms. McQuaide was qualified as an expert in the counseling of sexual abuse victims. The circuit court order explains as follows:

> The record supports the conclusion that Ms. McQuaide has sufficient credentials within the field of counseling sexual offenders and sexual abuse victims. The Family Court was correct in recognizing Ms. McQuaide as an expert on the basis of her knowledge, skill, education and training in the field of counseling of sexual abuse victims.
> It appears, however, that the expert opinions offered by Ms. McQuaide were not within her field of counseling. She was permitted to offer an opinion that the Petitioner's husband had committed the acts of abuse. Her opinion on that point is not within her field of expertise, and it was error to admit it into evidence.

sustain the family court's modification of custody arrangements. The Appellant maintains that a remand would also have permitted the family court to reconsider its decision not to allow direct testimony from the child regarding the abuse, a decision initially made based upon the availability of the child's counselor to introduce evidence of the child's statements concerning the abuse.

On May 12, 2006, the lower court entered an order granting the Appellant's request for a stay of the lower court decision pending appeal to this Court.

II. Standard of Review

In syllabus point one of Staton v. Staton, 218 W.Va. 201, 624 S.E.2d 548 (2005), this Court explained as follows:

> "In reviewing a final order entered by a circuit judge upon a review of, or upon a refusal to review, a final order of a family court judge, we review the findings of fact made by the family court judge under the clearly erroneous standard, and the application of law to the facts under an abuse of discretion standard. We review questions of law de novo." Syllabus, Carr v. Hancock, 216 W.Va. 474, 607 S.E.2d 803 (2004).

In evaluating standards of proof, this Court also recognizes that the matter must be assessed within the context of a civil proceeding, rather than a criminal one. In Sharon B.W. v. George B.W., 203 W.Va. 300, 507 S.E.2d 401 (1998), this Court addressed the evidentiary standards to be employed in determining whether a change in custory was necessary where a mother's boyfriend had allegedly sexually abused a child. This Court clearly articulated that the preponderance of the evidence was the appropriate standard to be utilized. 203 W.Va. at 303, 507 S.E.2d at 404. With these standards of review as guidance, we examine the arguments in this appeal.

III. Discussion

The Appellant presents two assignments of error. First, the Appellant maintains that the lower court erred in finding that the family court had improperly relied upon inadmissible hearsay and expert witness testimony in rendering its decision. Second, the Appellant contends that even if such conclusion had been correct, the lower court should have remanded the matter to the family court for a determination of whether sufficient evidence remained to justify the grant of custody modification and whether the family court would reconsider its decision regarding presentation of testimony from the child. This Court's examination of the Appellant's contentions will focus upon three distinct issues of testimony admissibility: Ms. McQuaide's testimony regarding statements made to her by the child during the course of treatment; Ms. McQuaide's opinion regarding the identity of the perpetrator; and family member testimony regarding statements made by the child.

A crucial component of every facet of this evaluation is the definition of hearsay as provided by Rule 801 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence. Hearsay is defined therein as follows: "a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted." While hearsay is generally not admissible, it may be admissible if it is contained within one of the recognized exceptions. In syllabus point one of State v. Maynard, 183 W.Va. 1, 393 S.E.2d 221 (1990), this Court explained as follows:

> Generally, out-of-court statements made by someone other than the declarant while testifying are not admissible unless: 1) the statement is not being offered for the truth of the matter asserted, but for some other purpose such as motive, intent, state-of-mind, identification or reasonableness of the party's action; 2) the statement is not hearsay under the rules; or 3) the statement is hearsay but falls within an exception provided for in the rules.

A. Testimony by Ms. McQuaide Regarding Statements of the Child

Pursuant to Rule 803(4) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence, "[t]he following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:"

> (4) Statements for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment. – Statements made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment and describing medical history, or past or present symptoms, pain, or sensations, or the inception or general character of the cause or external source thereof insofar as reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment.

See also Syl. Pt. 4, State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W.Va. 641, 398 S.E.2d 123 (1990) (restating that rule). In syllabus point five of Edward Charles L., this Court explained as follows:

> The two-part test set for admitting hearsay statements pursuant to W.Va.R.Evid. 803(4) is (1) the declarant's motive in making the statements must be consistent with the purposes of promoting treatment, and (2) the content of the statement must be such as is reasonably relied upon by a physician in treatment or diagnosis.

The medical treatment exception to the hearsay rule, as it applies to psychological treatment of alleged victims of child abuse, has received considerable attention in recent years. The unique circumstances involved in such cases have prompted many states to extend the medical treatment exception to situations in which the alleged victim makes statements to a treatment provider regarding the identity of the abuser and information about the abuse. Such discussions are perceived as being pertinent to the treatment being undertaken. See Eakes v. State, 665 So.2d 852 (Miss. 1995) (statement to physician as to identity of abuser of child sexual abuse victim admissible under medical treatment exception); State v. Vosika, 731 P.2d 449 (Or. App. 1987) (allowed testimony of physician who reasonably relied on child sexual abuse victim's identification of her abuser as a family member in treating); Goldade v. State, 674 P.2d 721 (Wyo. 1983), cert. denied, 467 U.S.

1253 (1984) (statements by victim to nurse and a physician identifying defendant as abuser were admissible).[5]

Courts have observed that "'testimony pertaining to the identity of the defendant and the nature of the sexual assault [are] wholly relevant and pertinent to proper diagnosis and treatment of the resulting physical and psychological injuries of sexual assault. . . .'" State v. Cruz, 792 A.2d 823, 831 (Conn. 2002) (quoting State v. Kelly, 770 A.2d 908, 928 (Conn. 2001)). Statements presented under the medical treatment exception which identify the perpetrator of the sexual abuse are deemed allowable because "medical treatment" in sexual abuse cases entails emotional and psychological injuries and the necessity to protect the victim from the abuser. United States v. George, 960 F.2d 97, 99-100 (9th Cir.1992).[6]

[5]The fact that the treating entity is not a physician has not been a consistent determining factor in these analyses. See Gohring v. State, 967 S.W.2d 459, 461 (Tex. App. 1998) (allowing play therapist to testify child was abused by her father); Moyer v. State, 948 S.W.2d 525, 527-28 (Tex. App.1997) (concluding statements made by patient to paramedic were admissible); Macias v. State, 776 S.W.2d 255, 258-59 (Tex. App.1989) (statements made to psychologist admissible because they were made for purpose of medical diagnosis and treatment); Torres v. State, 807 S.W.2d 884, 886-87 (Tex. App.1991) (finding emergency room nurse could testify as to victim's statement even though nurse was also collecting evidence).

[6]See also State v. Gregory, 338 S.E.2d 110, 112 (N.C. App. 1985) (permitting testimony identifying perpetrator of sexual offenses, reasoning the physician "not only needed to know who the perpetrator was in order to plan for the psychological treatment of the victim, but also to comply with the North Carolina child abuse reporting and treatment statutes.").

Circumstances very similar to those encountered in the present case were addressed in the criminal context in State v. Pettrey, 209 W.Va. 449, 549 S.E.2d 323 (2001), cert. denied, 534 U.S. 1142 (2002). In syllabus point nine of Pettrey, this Court explained as follows:

> When a social worker, counselor, or psychologist is trained in play therapy and thereafter treats a child abuse victim with play therapy, the therapist's testimony is admissible at trial under the medical diagnosis or treatment exception to the hearsay rule, West Virginia Rule of Evidence 803(4), if the declarant's motive in making the statement is consistent with the purposes of promoting treatment and the content of the statement is reasonably relied upon by the therapist for treatment. The testimony is inadmissible if the evidence was gathered strictly for investigative or forensic purposes.

209 W.Va. at 452, 549 S.E.2d at 326 (emphasis supplied); s*ee also State v. Shrewsbury*, 213 W.Va. 327, 329-30, 582 S.E.2d 774, 776-77 (2003). Applying that standard to the circumstances of the present case, Ms. McQuaide's testimony relating the child's statements would be admissible if the child's motive in making the statement was consistent with the purposes of promoting treatment and the content was relied upon by Ms. McQuaide. The testimony would be inadmissible if it was gathered strictly for investigative or forensic purposes.

This Court has thoroughly reviewed Ms. McQuaide's testimony, as contained in the video-taped transcript from the family court hearing. The transcript contains extensive discussion regarding the distinctions between forensic (investigative) and clinical (treatment) elements. Ms. McQuaide unequivocally stated that she worked in a dual capacity, initially evaluating the situation in a forensic manner in order to gather information necessary for evaluation and treatment and subsequently treating the child over the course of numerous counseling sessions. Thus, the information accumulated by Ms. McQuaide was not "gathered strictly for investigative or forensic purposes." Pettrey, 209 W.Va. at 452, 549 S.E.2d at 326. The child revealed intimate issues regarding the sexual abuse to her counselor, Ms. McQuaide, in the process of participating in ongoing treatment. The content of the child's statements was reasonably relied upon by Ms. McQuaide for treatment. Consequently, this Court finds that the requirements of Pettrey for the introduction of Ms. McQuaide's testimony regarding statements made to her by the child during counseling were satisfied.

The circuit court order acknowledged that Pettrey would permit the testimony "if the motive in making the statement is consistent with the purposes of treatment. . . ." However, the circuit court found that Pettrey would not permit introduction of this testimony because "the use made of the child's out-of-court statements . . . was to find that the child was sexually abused by the Petitioner's husband." The court concluded that it was therefore "clear that this evidence was considered not for purposes of treatment, but to support the finding of fact that the Petitioner's husband committed the sexual abuse that was alleged. This is an 'investigative or forensic' purpose forbidden by Pettrey."

We reverse the circuit court's finding that such testimony was inadmissible. The Pettrey standard requires an examination of the child's motive in originally making the statement. On the contrary, the circuit court examined the matter in terms of the use ultimately made of the child's statement.[7] By so examining the statement, the circuit court erroneously concluded that the testimony was inadmissible.

B. Ms. McQuaide's Opinion Regarding the Identity of the Perpetrator; Family Member Testimony Regarding Statements of the Child

This Court affirms the decisions of the lower court with regard to the inadmissibility of Ms. McQuaide's opinion that Mr. G. committed the abuse and the inadmissibility of the child's family members' testimony regarding statements of the child. The circuit court found that Ms. McQuaide[8] offered opinions beyond the field of counseling when she was permitted to offer her personal opinion that Mr. G. had perpetrated the abuse. Similarly, with reference to family members, the circuit court ruled that testimony by the child's family members regarding statements made by the child constituted inadmissible hearsay.

[7]As argued by the Appellant, the "Circuit Court incorrectly stated that the admissibility of the statements made by the child during sexual abuse counseling turned on the purpose for which the statements were offered into evidence, rather than the purpose for which the child was seeing the counselor in the first place."

[8]The circuit court found that the record supported the conclusion of the family court that Ms. McQuaide had sufficient credentials to be recognized as an expert on the basis of her knowledge, skill, education, and training in the field of counseling sexual abuse victims.

While we affirm the decisions of the circuit court that such testimony is inadmissible, we find that the family court's error in admitting such testimony was harmless and did not affect the ultimate outcome of this child custody modification matter. We observe that none of the family court's seventeen findings refers to opinion evidence offered by Ms. McQuaide regarding her personal conclusions about the identity of the perpetrator. Nor does the family court appear to rely upon family member testimony regarding the child's statements. The family court's ultimate alteration of custody is based upon the child's statements as properly revealed through her counselor, Ms. McQuaide; testimony regarding the child's physical condition; testimony regarding the child's knowledge and acting out of sexual activity; and testimony from the child's guardian ad litem.

Based upon our review of the evidence and the reasoning of both the family court and the circuit court, we conclude that the family court's error in admitting Ms. McQuaide's opinion that Mr. G. committed the offenses and in admitting the family members' hearsay testimony regarding statements of the child did not result in substantial injustice or prejudice to substantive rights. Therefore, we consider such error harmless. Rule 61 of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure provides:

> No error in either the admission or the exclusion of evidence and no error or defect in any ruling or order in anything done or omitted by the court or by any of the parties is ground for granting a new trial or for setting aside a verdict or for vacating, modifying or otherwise disturbing a judgment or order, unless refusal to take such action appears to the court > inconsistent with substantial justice. The court at every stage of the proceeding must disregard any error or defect in the proceeding which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties.

Rule 103(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence also provides that "[e]rror may not be predicated upon a ruling which admits or excludes evidence unless a substantial right of the party is affected. . . ."

As this Court articulated in State v. Bradshaw, 193 W.Va. 519, 457 S.E.2d 456 (1995), cert. denied, Bradshaw v. West Virginia, 516 U.S. 872, "[t]he harmless error inquiry involves an assessment of the likelihood that the error affected the outcome of the trial." 193 W.Va. at 539, 457 S.E.2d at 476. Our conclusion that the admission of the evidence at issue was harmless is bolstered by the fact that this case was tried before the bench, rather than a jury. "Unlike a jury, a trial judge in a bench trial is presumed to know the law and to follow it and 'this presumption may only be rebutted when the record affirmatively shows otherwise.'" People v. Thorne, 817 N.E.2d 1163, 1177 (Ill. App. 2004) (quoting People v. Mandic, 759 N.E.2d 138, 141 (Ill. App. 2001)).[9] [9]Many courts have specified that there is a presumption that a judge, in reaching a verdict in a non-jury trial, has disregarded any improperly admitted evidence. See State v. Clay, 909 S.W.2d 711, 716 (Mo. App. 1995); State v. Rank, 849 S.W.2d 230, 232-33 (Mo. App. 1993). In People v. Kriho, 996 P.2d 158 (Colo. App. 1999), the court explained that "[t]here is a presumption that all incompetent evidence is disregarded by the court in reaching its conclusions, and the judgment will not be disturbed unless it is clear that the court could not have reached the result but for the incompetent evidence." 996 P.2d at 172; (continued...)

IV. Conclusion

The jurisprudence of this state has invariably adhered to the policy that the best interests of the child must be the guiding force in any custody determination. The Legislature succinctly stated:

> The Legislature finds and declares that it is the public policy of this state to assure that the best interest of children is the court's primary concern in allocating custodial and decision-making responsibilities between parents who do not live together. In furtherance of this policy, the Legislature declares that a child's best interest will be served by assuring that minor children have frequent and continuing contact with parents who have shown the ability to act in the best interest of their children, to educate parents on their rights and responsibilities and the effect their separation may have on children, to encourage mediation of disputes, and to encourage parents to share in the rights and responsibilities of rearing their children after the parents have separated or divorced.

W.Va. Code § 48-9-101(b) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004). In advancement of this philosophy, this Court has explained that "[i]n visitation as well as custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child." Syl. Pt. 5, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996). In Keith Allen A. v. Jennifer J.A., 201 W.Va. 736, 500 S.E.2d 552 (1997), this Court reiterated: "'In the difficult balance which must be fashioned between the rights of the parent and the welfare of the child, we have consistently emphasized that the see also State v. Gutierrez, 618 P.2d 315, 317 (Haw. App. 1980) ("the normal rule is that if there is sufficient competent evidence to support the judgment or finding below, there is a presumption that any incompetent evidence was disregarded and the issue determined from a consideration of competent evidence only.").

paramount and controlling factor must be the child's welfare.'" 201 W.Va. at 744, 500 S.E.2d at 560 (quoting In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 629, 408 S.E.2d 365, 381 (1991)).[10]

With specific regard to the protection offered through the mechanism of supervised visitation, this Court has articulated the following at syllabus point three of Carter.

> Because of the extraordinary nature of supervised visitation, such visitation should be ordered when necessary to protect the best interests of the children. In determining the best interests of the children when there are allegations of sexual or child abuse, the circuit court should weigh the risk of harm of supervised visitation or the deprivation of any visitation to the parent who allegedly committed the abuse if the allegations are false against the risk of harm of unsupervised visitation to the child if the allegations are true.

196 W.Va. at 241, 470 S.E.2d at 195. Recognizing that the "best interests of the child are paramount," this Court explained its ultimate rationale very concisely in In re Jason S., 219 W.Va. 485, 637 S.E.2d 583 (2006), by stating simply that "[i]f the allegations of sexual abuse are true, the risk of harm of allowing unsupervised visitation is much greater than any harm caused by limiting . . . visitation rights." 219 W.Va. at 226, 637 S.E.2d at 590.

[10]See also Syl. Pt. 3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) ("Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal . . . in all family law matters . . . must be the health and welfare of the children."); David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W.Va. 57, 60, 385 S.E.2d 912, 916 (1989) (The "child's welfare is the paramount and controlling factor in all custody matters.").

Upon thorough review of this matter, this Court finds that the circuit court erred in reversing the holding of the family court. The family court correctly admitted the testimony of Ms. McQuaide regarding the statements made by the child during treatment. In evaluating the admissible evidence, this Court finds that the preponderance of the evidence supports the family court's conclusion that the child suffered sexual abuse perpetrated by Mr. G., now her mother's husband. Thus, the alteration in custody and supervised visitation ordered by the family court was necessary and justified by the evidence properly presented.

Based on the foregoing, the decision of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County is hereby reversed, and this matter is remanded with directions that the November 18, 2005, order of the family court be reinstated.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Where an offer of evidence is made under Rule 404(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence, the trial court, pursuant to Rule 104(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence, is to determine its admissibility. Before admitting the evidence, the trial court should conduct an in camera hearing as stated in State v. Dolin, 176 W. Va. 688, 347 S.E.2d 208 (1986). After hearing the evidence and arguments of counsel, the trial court must be satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence that the acts or conduct occurred and that the defendant committed the acts. If the trial court does not find by a preponderance of the evidence that the acts or conduct was committed or that the defendant was the actor, the evidence should be excluded under Rule 404(b). If a sufficient showing has been made, the trial court must then determine the relevancy of the evidence under Rules 401 and 402 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence and conduct the balancing required under Rule 403 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence. If the trial court is then satisfied that the Rule 404(b) evidence is admissible, it should instruct the jury on the limited purpose for which such evidence has been admitted. A limiting instruction should be given at the time the evidence is offered, and we recommend that it be repeated in the trial court's general charge to the jury at the conclusion of the evidence." Syllabus point 2, State v. McGinnis, 193 W. Va. 147, 455 S.E.2d 516 (1994).

2. "When offering evidence under Rule 404(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence, the prosecution is required to identify the specific purpose for which the evidence is being offered and the jury must be instructed to limit its consideration of the evidence to only that purpose. It is not sufficient for the prosecution or the trial court merely to cite or mention the litany of possible uses listed in Rule 404(b). The specific and precise purpose for which the evidence is offered must clearly be shown from the record and that purpose alone must be told to the jury in the trial court's instruction." Syllabus point 1, State v. McGinnis, 193 W. Va. 147, 455 S.E.2d 516 (1994).

3. Rule 404(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence requires the prosecution in a criminal case to disclose evidence of other crimes, wrongs or acts prior to trial if such disclosure has been requested by the accused; however, upon reasonable notice such evidence may be disclosed for the first time during trial upon a showing of good cause for failure to provide the requested pretrial notice.

4. The fact that a criminal charge against a defendant is dismissed or that he/she is acquitted of the same does not prohibit use of the incident under Rule 404(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence.

5. "Several basic rules exist as to cross-examination of a witness. The first is that the scope of cross-examination is coextensive with, and limited by, the material evidence given on direct examination. The second is that a witness may also be cross-examined about matters affecting his credibility. The term 'credibility' includes the interest and bias of the witness', inconsistent statements made by the witness and to a certain extent the witness' character. The third rule is that the trial judge has discretion as to the extent of cross-examination." Syllabus point 4, State v. Richey, 171 W. Va. 342, 298 S.E.2d 879 (1982).

6. "Rule 401 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence requires the trial court to determine the relevancy of the exhibit on the basis of whether the photograph is probative as to a fact of consequence in the case. The trial court then must consider whether the probative value of the exhibit is substantially outweighed by the counterfactors listed in Rule 403 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence. As to the balancing under Rule 403, the trial court enjoys broad discretion. The Rule 403 balancing test is essentially a matter of trial conduct, and the trial court's discretion will not be overturned absent a showing of clear abuse." Syllabus point 10, State v. Derr, 192 W. Va. 165, 451 S.E.2d 731 (1994).

Davis, Chief Justice:

Jeremiah David Mongold (hereinafter referred to as "Mr. Mongold") appeals an order of the Circuit Court of Hampshire County convicting him of the crime of death of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian by child abuse. The circuit court sentenced Mr. Mongold to a definite term of imprisonment of forty years. Here, Mr. Mongold has made the following assignments of error: (1) the admission of evidence of a prior child abuse incident, (2) the admission of evidence concerning the reason for his loss of employment, and (3) the admission of autopsy photos of the victim. After a thorough review of the record, briefs and the applicable laws, we affirm the conviction and sentence of Mr. Mongold.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Mr. Mongold resided in Shanks, West Virginia, with his wife, Shiloh Aumock, and her two children, five-year-old Logan and two-year-old Hannah.[1] According to the testimony of Mr. Mongold, on the morning of May 16, 2004, he got out of bed and provided breakfast for Logan and Hannah.[2] After breakfast, Mr. Mongold began playing with the children. One of the games they played was called "airplane." This game required Mr. Mongold to lie on his back and place one of the children on his raised legs and, while holding the child's hands, twirl the child in the air. Mr. Mongold played airplane with Logan first. Then he began playing with Hannah. He played with Hannah for about four minutes. According to Mr. Mongold, after he played airplane with Hannah, he attempted to pick her up and noticed that she was limp and felt like jello. Mr. Mongold immediately called 911 for help.

[1]Hannah and Logan were Mr. Mongold's stepchildren.

[2]The record indicates that Shiloh Aumock was at work at the time in question.

In response to the 911 call, two emergency medical technicians (hereinafter referred to as "EMTs") arrived at the home and found Hannah lying on the kitchen floor. The EMTs observed that Hannah was barely breathing, her skin was turning blue, and two bruises were over her right eye. Within minutes of observing Hannah's condition, the EMTs placed her in the ambulance and began transportation to a local hospital. However, after a further examination of Hannah in the ambulance, the EMTs determined that her condition warranted helicopter transportation to a better equipped hospital in Maryland. Consequently, the ambulance proceeded to a local fire station to connect with the helicopter. While en route to the fire station, arrangements were also made by the EMTs for a paramedic to rendevous with the ambulance. The paramedic reached the ambulance and began examining Hannah while still en route to the fire station. The paramedic determined that Hannah's symptoms suggested that she had a head injury.

Once the ambulance arrived at the fire station, Hannah was placed into a helicopter. She was flown to Cumberland Memorial Hospital, in Cumberland, Maryland. While at the hospital, it was determined that Hannah suffered from brain swelling and that she had blood on the surface of her skull. As a result of the severity of Hannah's head injuries, she was transported to Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, Maryland.

At Johns Hopkins Hospital, tests revealed that Hannah suffered from either asphyxiation/strangulation or severe head trauma. Despite efforts to resolve her brain injuries, Hannah died two days later. Subsequent to her death, an autopsy was performed on Hannah. The autopsy revealed that Hannah had sustained four blunt impacts to her head and that those injuries caused her death.

On September 7, 2004, a grand jury returned a one-count indictment against Mr. Mongold, charging him with causing Hannah's death by a parent, guardian or custodian by child abuse. The case was tried before a jury in March of 2005. During the trial, Mr. Mongold testified on his own behalf. Mr. Mongold's defense was that Hannah's injuries may have been caused when the family dog knocked her down on May 15, or when she fell from the deck of the home on the same day. Alternatively, Mr. Mongold suggested that the injuries to Hannah occurred while he played "airplane" with her on May 16. The State's evidence indicated that the injuries sustained by Hannah could not have been caused by being knocked down by a dog, falling from the deck of the home, or while playing the game of "airplane." The jury rejected Mr. Mongold's defense and convicted him. Subsequent to the conviction, the trial court sentenced Mr. Mongold to a definite term of imprisonment of forty years. All post-trial motions were denied. Mr. Mongold then filed this appeal.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Three issues are presented in this appeal that generally involve the admission of evidence to which Mr. Mongold objected. We have held as a general rule that "[a] trial court's evidentiary rulings, as well as its application of the Rules of Evidence, are subject to review under an abuse of discretion standard." Syl. pt. 4, State v. Rodoussakis, 204 W. Va. 58, 511 S.E.2d 469 (1998). See also State v. Guthrie, 194 W. Va. 657, 680, 461 S.E.2d 163, 186 (1995) ("[M]ost rulings of a trial court regarding the admission of evidence are reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard. . . . [A]n appellate court reviews de novo the legal analysis underlying a trial court's decision."). We will provide additional review standards as they apply to each specific issue presented.

DISCUSSION

A. Admission of Evidence of a Prior Child Abuse Incident

The first issue raised by Mr. Mongold involves the State's cross-examination of him relating to a prior child abuse incident. The State was permitted to introduce the evidence under Rule 404(b)[3] of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence.[4] In State v. LaRock,

[3]Rule 404(b) states the following:

> Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he or she acted in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by 196 W. Va. 294, 470 S.E.2d 613 (1996), this Court explained the standard of review for a Rule 404(b) issue as follows:

> The standard of review for a trial court's admission of evidence pursuant to Rule 404(b) involves a three-step analysis. First, we review for clear error the trial court's factual determination that there is sufficient evidence to show the other acts occurred. Second, we review de novo whether the trial court correctly found the evidence was admissible for a legitimate purpose. Third, we review for an abuse of discretion the trial court's conclusion that the "other acts" evidence is more probative than prejudicial under Rule 403.

196 W. Va. at 310-11, 470 S.E.2d at 629-30 (footnote omitted).

In Syllabus point two of State v. McGinnis, 193 W. Va. 147, 455 S.E.2d 516 (1994), this Court outlined the procedure that trial courts must follow in determining whether to admit Rule 404(b) evidence:

> Where an offer of evidence is made under Rule 404(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence, the trial court, pursuant to Rule 104(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence, is to determine its admissibility. Before admitting the evidence, the trial court should conduct an in camera hearing as stated in State v. Dolin, 176 W. Va. 688, 347 S.E.2d 208 (1986). After hearing the evidence and arguments of counsel, the trial court must be satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence that the acts or > the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial.

[4]The State initially sought to introduce the evidence pursuant to Rule 404(a)(1). The trial court found that the evidence was inadmissible under that rule.

> conduct occurred and that the defendant committed the acts. If the trial court does not find by a preponderance of the evidence that the acts or conduct was committed or that the defendant was the actor, the evidence should be excluded under Rule 404(b). If a sufficient showing has been made, the trial court must then determine the relevancy of the evidence under Rules 401 and 402 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence and conduct the balancing required under Rule 403 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence. If the trial court is then satisfied that the Rule 404(b) evidence is admissible, it should instruct the jury on the limited purpose for which such evidence has been admitted. A limiting instruction should be given at the time the evidence is offered, and we recommend that it be repeated in the trial court's general charge to the jury at the conclusion of the evidence.

Finally, in Syllabus point one of McGinnis we addressed the usage of Rule 404(b) evidence as follows:

> When offering evidence under Rule 404(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence, the prosecution is required to identify the specific purpose for which the evidence is being offered and the jury must be instructed to limit its consideration of the evidence to only that purpose. It is not sufficient for the prosecution or the trial court merely to cite or mention the litany of possible uses listed in Rule 404(b). The specific and precise purpose for which the evidence is offered must clearly be shown from the record and that purpose alone must be told to the jury in the trial court's instruction.

193 W. Va. 147, 455 S.E.2d 516. In our review of this case we are satisfied that the trial court complied with the requirements of McGinnis.

During Mr. Mongold's case-in-chief, he presented witnesses who testified as to his overall good relationship with children and that he was not a violent person.

Additionally, during direct examination of Mr. Mongold and through the testimony of other witnesses, evidence was presented which suggested that Hannah's injuries could have been caused accidentally while, among other things, she was playing the game of "airplane." In an effort to rebut Mr. Mongold's evidence regarding his theories of how Hannah's injuries could have occurred accidentally, the State sought to introduce evidence of an incident involving a five-year-old child that occurred on May 8, 2002. On the date in question, Mr. Mongold "held the child up against the wall by the throat, causing the child to bleed and become unconscious for four or five seconds."

The trial court held an in camera hearing to decide whether the State would be allowed to question Mr. Mongold about the prior child abuse incident. During the in camera proceeding, the trial court took testimony from the child's mother. The mother testified that she and Mr. Mongold had gotten into an argument and that he shoved her through a closet door.[5] The child attempted to assist his mother. Mr. Mongold then grabbed the child by the throat and pinned him against a wall. The mother intervened and wrestled with Mr. Mongold. During the altercation, the child was pinned between Mr. Mongold's legs. As a result of pressure being applied to the child's head by Mr. Mongold's legs, "blood vessels in one of [the child's] eyes were broken, he had a small amount of blood inside his ear and he . . . urinated [on] himself."[6] The trial court also considered evidence showing that Mr. Mongold had been criminally charged with respect to that incident and that he eventually pled guilty to charges of domestic battery against the mother and the child.[7] After consideration of the arguments from both parties, the trial court ruled that the State had shown by a preponderance of the evidence that the prior incident did occur. The trial court concluded that the evidence was relevant "to show that this was not an accident and that it was intentional," as argued by the State. See United States v. Sanders, 343 F.3d 511, 518 (5th Cir. 2003) ("[I]t has been established that the government offered the evidence to prove intent and refute [the defendant's] claim of mistake or accident. These purposes are permissible under [Rule] 404(b)."). It was also found by the trial court "that the probative value [of the evidence] would, in fact, outweigh the prejudicial effect[.]"

After the in camera hearing, the State was permitted to cross-examine Mr. Mongold about the prior child abuse incident.[8] The trial court gave a limiting instruction on how the jury should receive the evidence. Additionally, during the charge to the jury, the trial court again instructed the jury that evidence of Mr. Mongold's past "is not admitted as proof of [his] guilt on the present charge . . . . This evidence is admitted . . . only for the purpose of determining whether the . . . State . . . has proven and established intent in absence of accident."

[6]The trial court did not allow the mother of the child testify about the incident to the jury.

[8]The jury was not informed of the criminal conviction that resulted from that incident.

Very clearly, the record demonstrates that the trial court complied with McGinnis by finding that the prior child abuse incident was admissible to show intent and a lack of accident. See State v. Scott, 206 W. Va. 158, 166, 522 S.E.2d 626, 634 (1999) (allowing Rule 404(b) evidence to show lack of accident); State v. Bonham, 184 W. Va. 555, 559, 401 S.E.2d 901, 905 (1990) (allowing Rule 404(b) evidence to show intent). Even so, Mr. Mongold presents two arguments as to why evidence of the prior child abuse incident should not have been introduced: (1) the lack of pretrial notice and (2) his acquittal of the prior felony child abuse charge. We now address both arguments.

(1) Lack of pretrial notice. Mr. Mongold contends that the prior child abuse incident should not have been introduced because the State failed to provide pretrial notice of its intent to use such evidence. Mr. Mongold states that, during a pretrial hearing, "the court remarked '. . . so suffice to say that there are no 404(b) issues[.]' The prosecuting attorney replied: 'None known to me, your honor.'" Here, Mr. Mongold contends that had he known the State intended to use Rule 404(b) evidence, he may have conducted his trial differently. In contrast, the State argues that it did not know that the prior child abuse incident would be relevant until Mr. Mongold presented extensive evidence showing that Hannah's injuries were accidental.

Rule 404(b) provides that " upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial." Consequently, and under this provision, we hold, Rule 404(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence requires the prosecution in a criminal case to disclose evidence of other crimes, wrongs or acts prior to trial if such disclosure has been requested by the accused; however, upon reasonable notice such evidence may be disclosed for the first time during trial upon a showing of good cause for failure to provide the requested pretrial notice.

At the outset we note that Rule 404(b) "place[s] an initial duty on the defense to request the prosecution to furnish 'other crimes' evidence." United States v. Barnes, 49 F.3d 1144, 1148 (6th Cir. 1995). When no such pretrial request is made, the State is "not obligated to provide pretrial notice." United States v. Aguilar, 59 Fed. Appx. 326, 328 (10th Cir. 2003). See also State v. Zacks, 204 W. Va. 504, 509, 513 S.E.2d 911, 916 (1998) (prosecutor allowed to introduce Rule 404(b) evidence without pretrial notice because defendant failed to make request). An examination of Mr. Mongold's discovery motion reveals that he made the following two relevant requests:

> (1) A copy of [his] prior criminal record, if any, as is within the possession, custody or control of the State, or the existence of which is known, or by the exercise of due diligence may become known, to the attorney for the State.

> (2) Any evidence of uncharged crimes, wrongs or acts allegedly committed by [him] which the State intends to introduce.

To the extent that the above two requests constitute Rule 404(b) requests, Mr. Mongold has not argued that the State failed to provide the requested information. Instead, Mr. Mongold contends that the pretrial notice requirement was violated because the State indicated prior to trial that there would be no Rule 404(b) issues at trial. To support this argument, Mr. Mongold cites to our decision in State v. Grimm, 165 W. Va. 547, 270 S.E.2d 173 (1980). Mr. Mongold argues that, under Grimm, "non-disclosure by the prosecution is fatal to its case where such non-disclosure is prejudicial." Put simply, Mr. Mongold misinterprets Grimm.

In Grimm this Court addressed the issue of the State's failure to turn over a document that was requested during discovery. The State did not produce the document, but the State nevertheless introduced it during the trial. We found the non-disclosure to be erroneous. We held in Syllabus point two of Grimm:

> When a trial court grants a pre-trial discovery motion requiring the prosecution to disclose evidence in its possession, non-disclosure by the prosecution is fatal to its case where such non-disclosure is prejudicial. The non-disclosure is prejudicial where the defense is surprised on a material issue and where the failure to make the disclosure hampers the preparation and presentation of the defendant's case.

165 W. Va. 547, 270 S.E.2d 173.

The pretrial notice of other crimes evidence required by Rule 404(b), at issue herein, is distinguishable from the prosecution's failure in Grimm to produce a requested document. In the instant proceeding, there is no allegation that the State failed to turn over any document to Mr. Mongold. Further, Grimm does not address the issue of a statement by the State that it did not know of any Rule 404(b) issues that would be litigated. Therefore, Grimm does not support Mr. Mongold's position.[9]

The trial court ruled that the State was not precluded from using evidence of the prior child abuse merely because the State initially believed that no Rule 404(b) evidence would be used. The trial court correctly found that, under Rule 404(b), such evidence was admissible during the trial if good cause was shown. See United States v. Scholl, 166 F.3d 964, 976 (9th Cir. 1999) ("Although Rule 404(b) requires pretrial disclosure of such evidence, that requirement may be excused 'for good cause shown.'"). The trial court determined that good cause was shown. It was only after Mr. Mongold presented extensive evidence suggesting that Hannah's death could have occurred accidentally while playing the game of "airplane" "that this even became an issue."

To the extent that the State's initial belief that no Rule 404(b) issues would be litigated constituted noncompliance with the rule's pretrial notice requirement, we do not believe the trial court abused its discretion in finding that the State provided good cause for failing to provide pretrial notice. See United States v. Lopez-Gutierrez, 83 F.3d 1235, 1241 (10th Cir. 1996) ("[W]here Rule 404(b) evidence is offered during trial, as it was in the instant case, the district court may excuse pretrial notice and admit such evidence on good cause shown."); United States v. Wei, 862 F. Supp. 1129, 1134 (S.D.N.Y. 1994) ("Evidence sought to be admitted under that rule for which . . . pre-trial notice was not given shall be admitted only if good cause is shown to excuse the failure to provide such notice."). The record is clear in showing that Mr. Mongold was made aware of the prior child abuse incident through documents supplied during discovery and during the pretrial hearing. The mere fact that the State initially believed that no Rule 404(b) issues existed should not be the basis for excluding the evidence. See United States v. Morrison, No. 96-4956, 1998 WL 17049 (4th Cir. Jan. 20, 1998) (permitting government to introduce Rule 404(b) evidence that it initially stated would not be used at trial); United States v. Holmes, 111 F. 3d 463, 468 (6th Cir. 1997) (permitting Rule 404(b) evidence even though "the defense asked the government whether it planned to introduce any evidence under Rule 404(b), and the government responded that it had no plans to do so").

[9]Mr. Mongold also cited to the decision in State v. Miller, 178 W. Va. 618, 363 S.E.2d 504 (1987). However, Miller does not apply to the case sub judice because it addressed the issue of a prosecutor's failure to provide the defendant with information pertaining to the substance of incriminating oral statements he made to fellow inmates.

The fact that Rule 404(b) permits notice to occur for the first time at trial, upon a showing of good cause, suggests that the rule contemplates situations arising where the State legitimately is unaware of the need for such evidence until after the trial begins. "[T]here is no requirement that the State must anticipate a need to disclose such evidence."

Dixon v. State, 712 N.E.2d 1086, 1092 (Ind. Ct. App. 1999). See also United States v. Makki, No. 06-20324, 2007 WL 781821 (E.D. Mich. Mar. 13, 2007) (after denying defendant's request for notice of Rule 404(b) evidence because government stated it would not introduce such evidence, trial court warned, "the Government is hereby cautioned that it will need 'good cause' to be able to introduce 404(b) evidence at trial if Defendant is not provided reasonable notice of the general nature of any such evidence at least two weeks in advance of trial"). This is particularly true under the facts of this case. Mr. Mongold put on apparently unanticipated extensive evidence regarding his good relationship with children, and evidence, including expert testimony, suggesting that Hannah's death could have been caused accidentally while playing the game of "airplane." Under these unique circumstances, the trial court properly found good cause for excusing the State's failure to provide pretrial notice and in making an initial statement that no Rule 404(b) evidence would be introduced.[10] See United States v. Smith, 383 F.3d 700, 707 (8th Cir. 2004) (good cause shown for failing to provide notice of Rule 404(b) evidence until day of trial); United States v. Scholl, 166 F.3d 964, 976 (9th Cir. 1999) (same); United States v. Lopez-Gutierrez, 83 F.3d 1235, 1241 (10th Cir. 1996) (same); United States v. Archibald, 212 Fed. Appx. 788, 795 (11th

[10]Even if this Court had concluded that the trial court abused its discretion in finding good cause had been shown, we would have found that the failure to provide pretrial notice under the facts of this case was harmless error. See United States v. Watson, 409 F.3d 458, 465 (D.C. Cir. 2005) ("Even assuming arguendo that the prosecution failed to bear its Rule 404(b) notice obligation, this Court holds that [the defendant] failed to show prejudice from the error."); People v. Hawkins, 628 N.W.2d 105, 114 (Mich. Ct. App. 2001) (holding that failure to provide pretrial notice of Rule 404(b) evidence deemed harmless error).

Cir. 2006) (same); Myrick v. State, 787 So. 2d 713, 716 (Ala. Crim. App. 2000) (same).

(2) Acquittal of the prior felony child abuse charge. Next, Mr. Mongold argues that evidence of the prior child abuse incident should not have been introduced because he pled guilty to domestic battery and not the original felony child abuse charge. Mr. Mongold equates the dismissal of the felony child abuse charge to an acquittal. To support his argument, Mr. Mongold cites Grady v. Corbin, 495 U.S. 508, 110 S. Ct. 2084, 109 L. Ed. 2d 548 (1990). Grady holds that

> [t]he Double Jeopardy Clause bars a subsequent prosecution if, to establish an essential element of an offense charged in that prosecution, the government will prove conduct that constitutes an offense for which the defendant has already been prosecuted.

495 U.S. at 510, 110 S. Ct. at 2087, 109 L. Ed. 2d at 557. Grady does not support Mr. Mongold's position for two reasons. First, and foremost, Grady was expressly overruled by the United States Supreme Court in United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688, 113 S. Ct. 2849, 125 L. Ed. 2d 556 (1993). Dixon held:

> We have concluded . . . that Grady must be overruled. Unlike Blockburger analysis, whose definition of what prevents two crimes from being the "same offence," U.S. Const., Amdt. 5, has deep historical roots and has been accepted in numerous precedents of this Court, Grady lacks constitutional roots. The "same-conduct" rule it announced is wholly inconsistent with earlier Supreme Court precedent and with the clear common-law understanding of double jeopardy.

Dixon, 509 U.S. at 704, 113 S. Ct. at 2860, 125 L. Ed. 2d at 573.[11]

The second reason that Grady does not support Mr. Mongold's position is that Grady had nothing to do with the introduction of Rule 404(b) evidence. In Grady the defendant had pled guilty in a New York state court to the misdemeanor offenses of driving while intoxicated and failing to keep to the right of the median. After the guilty plea was accepted, the defendant was charged by indictment with, inter alia, reckless manslaughter, criminally negligent homicide, and third-degree reckless assault, all of which were based on the same incident which had given rise to the misdemeanor charges. The defendant moved to dismiss the indictment on double jeopardy grounds. The New York trial court denied the motion. The defendant thereafter sought a writ of prohibition from a mid-level appellate court. That court denied the writ. The defendant appealed to New York's highest court. The New York court found a double jeopardy violation and reversed. The prosecutor thereafter appealed to the United States Supreme Court. The United State Supreme Court affirmed the decision of New York's highest court.

In the instant proceeding, the State prosecuted Mr. Mongold for the death of Hannah in 2004, not for the injury to a different child in 2002. Therefore, the issue of Grady's double jeopardy principle simply has no application to Mr. Mongold's prosecution [11]We wish to point out that counsel has a duty to inform this Court that a case he/she seeks to rely upon is no longer good law.

nor to the use of a prior child abuse incident for purposes of Rule 404(b).

Assuming, as argued by Mr. Mongold, that the dismissal of the felony child abuse charge, in exchange for a plea to domestic battery, constituted an acquittal of the felony charge, evidence of the underlying child abuse incident may be used for purposes of Rule 404(b). That issue was addressed by the United States Supreme Court in Dowling v. United States, 493 U.S. 342, 110 S. Ct. 668, 107 L. Ed. 2d 708 (1990). In Dowling, the defendant was prosecuted by the federal government for robbing a Virgin Island bank. During the trial, the government introduced evidence, under Rule 404(b) of the Federal Rules of Evidence,[12] of the defendant's involvement in a burglary and attempted robbery in a home. The trial court permitted the evidence even though the defendant had been tried and acquitted of all charges stemming from the burglary. A jury convicted the defendant of the bank robbery charge, and the conviction was upheld by a federal appellate court. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to decide whether double jeopardy principles prohibited use of Rule 404(b) to introduce evidence involving the acquitted burglary charge. The United States Supreme Court ruled that double jeopardy principles did not bar use of the evidence:

> For present purposes, we assume for the sake of argument that Dowling's acquittal established that there was a reasonable doubt as to whether Dowling was the masked man who entered [the victim's] home . . . two weeks after the First [12]The West Virginia and Federal rules are almost identical.

> Pennsylvania Bank robbery. But to introduce evidence on this point at the bank robbery trial, the Government did not have to demonstrate that Dowling was the man who entered the home beyond a reasonable doubt: the Government sought to introduce [the evidence] under Rule 404(b), and, as mentioned earlier, . . . [i]n the Rule 404(b) context, similar act evidence is relevant only if the jury can reasonably conclude that the act occurred and that the defendant was the actor. Because a jury might reasonably conclude that Dowling was the masked man who entered [the victim's] home, even if it did not believe beyond a reasonable doubt that Dowling committed the crimes charged at the first trial, the collateral-estoppel component of the Double Jeopardy Clause is inapposite.
> Our decision is consistent with other cases where we have held that an acquittal in a criminal case does not preclude the Government from relitigating an issue when it is presented in a subsequent action governed by a lower standard of proof.

Dowling, 493 U.S. at 348-49, 110 S.Ct. at 672, 107 L. Ed. 2d at 717-18 (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).[13]

Consistent with Dowling, we now hold that the fact that a criminal charge against a defendant is dismissed or that he/she is acquitted of the same does not prohibit use of the incident under Rule 404(b) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence. Consequently, the fact that the felony child abuse charge against Mr. Mongold was dismissed did not prohibit use of the incident pursuant to Rule 404(b).

B. Evidence Concerning Mr. Mongold's Loss of Employment

[13]The Supreme Court also rejected a due process challenge to use of the evidence.

The second issue raised by Mr. Mongold involves the State's cross-examination of his wife and his father regarding the reason for his loss of employment. Mr. Mongold contends that the trial court committed error in allowing the State to cross-examine his wife and father about the circumstances of his loss of employment. This Court has held that, "[i]n determining whether the scope of cross-examination has been violated, broad discretion is given to the trial court, and we will not disturb that ruling absent a clear abuse of discretion." State v. Potter, 197 W. Va. 734, 749, 478 S.E.2d 742, 757 (1996). See also Syl. pt. 4, State v. Carduff, 142 W. Va. 18, 93 S.E.2d 502 (1956) ("The extent of the cross-examination of a witness is a matter within the sound discretion of the trial court; and in the exercise of such discretion, in excluding or permitting questions on cross-examination, its action is not reviewable except in the case of manifest abuse or injustice."). We have also observed that

> [s]everal basic rules exist as to cross-examination of a witness. The first is that the scope of cross-examination is coextensive with, and limited by, the material evidence given on direct examination. The second is that a witness may also be cross-examined about matters affecting his credibility. The term "credibility" includes the interest and bias of the witness, inconsistent statements made by the witness and to a certain extent the witness' character. The third rule is that the trial judge has discretion as to the extent of cross-examination.

Syl. pt. 4, State v. Richey, 171 W. Va. 342, 298 S.E.2d 879 (1982). See also W. Va. R. Evid. 611(b)(2) ("Non-Party Witnesses. Cross-examination should be limited to the subject matter of the direct examination and matters affecting the credibility of the non-party witness. The court may, in the exercise of discretion, permit inquiry into additional matters as if on direct examination.”).

(1) Cross-examination of Mr. Mongold’s father. Mr. Mongold’s employment status was first raised by Mr. Mongold during the direct examination of his father:

> Q. Okay. All right. And you were at the home on the weekends, and I assume you work during the week too, right?
>
> A. Yes. Jeremiah [Mr. Mongold] was employed with me.
>
> Q. Where do you work?
>
> A. Lantz Construction Company in Winchester, project superintendent. We do commercial buildings.

The State followed up on the issue of Mr. Mongold’s employment during its cross-examination of his father:[14]

> Q. Does he still work with you at Lantz?
>
> A. No, no, he does not due to the fact of what he’s been going through, missing time. Our work got slow in the winter and — and he had to miss so much time, that they let him off.
>
> Q. Did he get laid off or did he get terminated?
>
> A.Well, I’m not sure which. I mean, I don’t know. You would have to ask Jeremiah about that.

Mr. Mongold continued the issue of his employment during redirect examination of his father:

[14]Mr. Mongold objected to the questioning on the grounds of relevancy.

> Q. . . . Jeremiah wasn't terminated, let go for misconduct, was he?
>
> A. Not on the job site. They had a Christmas party and something happened there. I was not there.
>
> Q. You don't know what it was?
>
> A. No.
>
> Q. And you say he missed a lot of work?
>
> A. Yes.
>
> Q.What was that a result of?
>
> A. Because of the hearing, hearings and everything mostly due to the incident that happened to Hannah.

The State followed up on the issue of the Christmas party incident during its recross-examination of Mr. Mongold's father:

> Q. So he was not terminated for any misconduct at work?
>
> A. Not that I'm aware of.
>
> Q. He was terminated for some misconduct at the company Christmas party?
>
> A. I didn't get into it a whole lot. I understand that there was a Christmas party; and there was some other people that was involved and there was some drinking going on, and that's all I know about it.

So, to the extent that Mr. Mongold alleges that the trial court committed error in allowing the State to question his father about his employment status, we find no merit to the contention. The record clearly demonstrates that Mr. Mongold was the first to raise the issue of his employment status during the direct examination of his father. "[T]his Court has recognized that the scope of cross-examination is coextensive with the evidence given on direct examination; that is, a witness may be cross-examined on matters which are raised on direct examination." State v. Justice, 191 W. Va. 261, 269, 445 S.E.2d 202, 210 (1994). See also Syl. pt. 2, in part, State v. Bowman, 155 W. Va. 562, 184 S.E.2d 314 (1971) ("An appellant or plaintiff in error will not be permitted to complain of error in the admission of evidence which he offered or elicited[.]").

(2) Cross-examination of Mr. Mongold's wife. The issue of Mr. Mongold's employment status was again raised by him during the direct examination of his wife:[15]

> Q. Okay. All right. Jeremiah, when you all moved in together and even before that, he was employed?
>
> A. Yes.
>
> Q. Where did he work?
>
> A. Lantz Construction out of Winchester.
> Q. And generally, what days of the week and what hours

[15]Prior to questioning Mr. Mongold's wife about his employment, the State, during a bench conference on another issue, informed the trial court that it would ask her about his loss of employment. Mr. Mongold argued that the matter was irrelevant. The trial court held that such questioning could occur because Mr. Mongold opened the door to the issue when he questioned his father about the matter. Although we have determined that a different reason justified the questioning, this is of no moment. See Murphy v. Smallridge, 196 W. Va. 35, 36-37, 468 S.E.2d 167, 168-69 (1996) ("An appellate court is not limited to the legal grounds relied upon by the circuit court, but it may affirm or reverse a decision on any independently sufficient ground that has adequate support.").

of the week would he work?

A. Monday through Friday, I don't know, normal hours, six something to three, sometimes a little later than three.

The State followed up on the issue of Mr. Mongold's employment during its cross-examination of his wife:

Q. Okay. Do you know anything about Mr. Mongold losing his job there at Lantz Construction?

A. Yes, sir, I do.

Q. Do you know why that was?

A. Yes, sir, I do.

Q. And why was that?

A. Jeremiah and I had gotten into an argument at a company dinner and he was being nasty to me, and his friends, they observed him being nasty. And they all got into a confrontation and got into a fight which resulted in the end, Jeremiah punching a hole into the wall. And I guess that is the initial reason why they actually fired him rather than pressing charges.

Mr. Mongold contends that it was error for the trial court to permit the State to elicit testimony from his wife concerning the reason he lost his job. We disagree.

It has been recognized that "'[w]hen the accused calls [his] spouse to testify, the prosecution can cross-examine as to those matters covered, or matters directly related to those matters covered, on direct examination.'" State v. Bohon, 211 W. Va. 277, 282 n.3, 565 S.E.2d 399, 404 n.3 (2002) (quoting 1 Franklin D. Cleckley, Handbook on Evidence for West Virginia Lawyers § 5-4(D)(2)(b), at 5-84 (4th ed. 2000)). The record clearly shows that Mr. Mongold asked his wife on direct examination about his employment, including the days and hours that he worked. The issue of his termination from employment was directly related to this line of questioning. Consequently we find no error in the State's cross-examination of Mr. Mongold's wife.[16]

C. Admission of Autopsy Photos of the Victim

The final issue raised by Mr. Mongold concerns the admission of five photographs of Hannah. Two of the photographs depict Hannah's entire body lying on a morgue table, face up and face down. The remaining three photographs are autopsy images revealing parts of Hannah's exposed skull. Mr. Mongold argued that the photographs were gruesome and should not have been admitted into evidence. We disagree.

We begin by observing that "[t]he general rule is that pictures or photographs

[16]Mr. Mongold contends in this appeal that evidence of the basis for his termination was subject to analysis under Rule 404(b) prior to its admission. We disagree. First, there is nothing in the record which indicates that the State knew what Mr. Mongold's wife would say in response to the question about his employment termination. Second, the only objection to the questioning made by Mr. Mongold was that of relevancy. To the extent that Mr. Mongold believed that the response to the question would implicate Rule 404(b), he should have made an objection on that basis and afforded the trial court an opportunity to determine whether Rule 404(b) applied. "[s]ince an objection only preserves the specific grounds named, if an objection naming an untenable ground is overruled, the ruling will be affirmed on appeal even though a good but unnamed ground existed for exclusion of the evidence." 1 Cleckley, Handbook on Evidence § 1-7(C)(2), at 1-94 (footnote omitted).

that are relevant to any issue in a case are admissible." Roberts v. Stevens Clinic Hosp., Inc., 176 W. Va. 492, 497, 345 S.E.2d 791, 796 (1986). In the case of State v. Derr, 192 W. Va. 165, 451 S.E.2d 731 (1994), Justice Cleckley outlined factors that must be considered in assessing the admissibility of photographs. In Syllabus point 8 of Derr we stated "[t]he admissibility of photographs over a gruesome objection must be determined on a case-by-case basis pursuant to Rules 401 through 403 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence." 192 W. Va. 165, 451 S.E. 2d 731. In Syllabus point 10, the Derr opinion carved out the test for the admissibility of photographs:

> Rule 401 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence requires the trial court to determine the relevancy of the exhibit on the basis of whether the photograph is probative as to a fact of consequence in the case. The trial court then must consider whether the probative value of the exhibit is substantially outweighed by the counterfactors listed in Rule 403 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence. As to the balancing under Rule 403, the trial court enjoys broad discretion. The Rule 403 balancing test is essentially a matter of trial conduct, and the trial court's discretion will not be overturned absent a showing of clear abuse.

Id.

In the instant case, the trial court followed the requirements of Derr in admitting the five photographs. The trial court determined that the photographs were relevant in showing the location of Hannah's injuries and in assisting the State's medical expert in describing those injuries to the jury. After finding the photographs to be relevant, the trial court weighed their probative value against their prejudicial nature. In so doing, the trial court found that the photographs were in black and white and did not show blood. The trial court also found that the autopsy photographs would be cropped so as to minimize showing the full skull. With these considerations in view the trial court held that

> [t]he prosecutor will have witnesses testify about the condition of the child and her injuries. Since the testimony will directly relate to the photographs and may be of a technical nature and because the charge is child abuse by custodian resulting in death of a child which requires proof of an intentional and malicious infliction of physical pain and impairment of physical condition other than by accidental means causing death, the court finds that the probative value outweighs the prejudicial effect on [the] photographs[.]

Although we find that the autopsy photographs may be characterized as gruesome, we do not believe that those photographs were unduly prejudicial. As we noted in Derr, "[g]ruesome photographs simply do not have the prejudicial impact on jurors as once believed by most courts. 'The average juror is well able to stomach the unpleasantness of exposure to the facts of a murder without being unduly influenced. . . . [G]ruesome or inflammatory pictures exists more in the imagination of judges and lawyers than in reality.'" Derr, 192 W. Va. at 177 n.12, 451 S.E.2d at 743 n.12 (quoting People v. Long, 38 Cal. App. 3d 680, 689, 113 Cal. Rptr. 530, 537 (1974)). We have reviewed all of the photographs, paying particular attention to the autopsy photographs, and do not find that their prejudicial impact outweighed their probative value. Consequently, we do not find that the trial court abused its discretion by admitting the photographs.

IV.

CONCLUSION

The trial court's order convicting and sentencing Mr. Mongold for the crime of death of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian by child abuse is affirmed.

Affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

Starcher, J., concurring:

I concur with the majority opinion. I write separately to address the issue of the admissibility of Rule 404(b) evidence.

In State v. Scott, 206 W.Va. 158, 168, 522 S.E.2d 626, 636 (1999), I stated in my dissent that Rule 404(b) evidence has "become a runaway train in criminal cases." I continue to adhere to this opinion. In far too many cases, prosecutors gain an unfair advantage by telling the jury about a defendant's "other bad acts," thereby tainting the jury's consideration of the evidence relating to the actual offense being tried. For example, once a jury hears that a defendant has been convicted of a similar crime in the past, the jury is far more likely to believe that the defendant is guilty of the charged offense. State v. Fox, 207 W.Va. 239, 241, 531 S.E.2d 64, 66 (1998) (Starcher, J. dissenting opinion). Such prejudice is almost inherent in "other bad acts" evidence, and this Court has, far too often, allowed the prosecutors to get away with this unfair practice.

However, the instant case provides a good example of the rare instance when Rule 404(b) "other bad acts" evidence should properly be admitted.[1]

[1]The text of West Virginia Rules of Evidence, Rule 404(b), follows:

> (b) Other Crimes, Wrongs, or acts.– Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he or she acted in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan,

In the instant case, the appellant argued that the court erred in admitting testimony about a previous domestic abuse incident involving the appellant, and in admitting testimony about a violent incident at a Christmas party.

However, the evidence of the prior domestic abuse incident involving a child rebutted the appellant's claim of accident or mistake. The appellant claimed that any injury to the child victim in the instant case was accidental and inadvertent. Yet, in the previous incident, the appellant had injured another child, either intentionally or due to a reckless disregard for the child's safety.

Moreover, the appellant offered evidence tending to show that he was a person with a good reputation and a good character. The appellant called neighbors who testified that they were comfortable with leaving the appellant alone with their children. The appellant's counsel specifically asked one witness: "Do you feel comfortable with [the appellant] Jeremiah being around your children?" The prosecutor, therefore, quite reasonably presented evidence of the previous incident to show that the appellant was not, in fact, a man who could be trusted around children.

West Virginia Rules of Evidence, Rule 405(a), states that once the defense has presented evidence of the defendant's character, the prosecution is allowed to inquire into > knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution in a criminal case shall provide pretrial notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the court excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial.

specific incidents of conduct.[2] Since the appellant "opened the door" to such evidence, the trial court properly admitted the evidence of the prior domestic abuse incident.

The trial court also did not err in admitting evidence about an incident that occurred at a Christmas party, because the appellant again "opened the door" to this evidence.

The appellant's counsel asked the appellant's father about the appellant's employment, in an effort to show that the appellant had a stable living situation. On cross-examination, the prosecutor asked the appellant's father whether the appellant still maintained the employment in question. Learning that the appellant no longer had this employment, the prosecutor asked why. The appellant's father said that there had been an incident, but that he did not know the details. During the subsequent testimony of the appellant's wife, the appellant's counsel again brought up the issue of his employment – again to show the stability of the appellant's living situation. On cross-examination, the prosecutor asked about the incident at the Christmas party that led to the appellant's losing his job.

Normally, the evidence about the incident at the Christmas party would have been inadmissible. However, because the appellant opened the door to this testimony on

[2]West Virginia Rules of Evidence, Rule 405(a), states:

> (a) Reputation or opinion.– In all cases in which evidence of character or a trait of character of a person is admissible, proof may be made by testimony as to reputation or by testimony in the form of an opinion. On cross-examination, inquiry is allowable into relevant specific instances of conduct.

direct examination by asking his own witnesses about the appellant's employment, the evidence about the Christmas party incident, which refuted the appellant's evidence of his stability, was admissible.

Rule 404(b) evidence is subject to the "probative-versus-prejudicial" balancing test. See Syllabus Point 9, State v. Derr, 192 W.Va. 165, 451 S.E.2d 731 (1994).[3] Of course, the Rule 404(b) evidence in the instant case was highly prejudicial. However, the defendant invited the admission of such evidence when he tried to portray himself as a peaceful person who could be trusted around children.

I believe that the trial court properly weighed the prejudicial versus probative factors, and came to the correct decision to admit the evidence.

For these reasons, I concur with the Court's judgment and decision in affirming the appellant's conviction.[4]

[3]Although Rules 401 and 402 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence strongly encourage the admission of as much evidence as possible, Rule 403 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence restricts this liberal policy by requiring a balancing of interests to determine whether logically relevant is legally relevant evidence. Specifically, Rule 403 provides that although relevant evidence may nevertheless be excluded when the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion, or undue delay is disproportionate to the value of the evidence.

[4]I also agree that the trial court did not err in admitting the autopsy photographs. The medical examiner used the photographs to aid her in her testimony. The photographs were taken in black and white, to avoid some of their gruesome nature. The trial court made a special effort to ensure that the photographs were cropped to reduce any prejudicial effect that they may have had on the jury. The court even excluded one of the photographs, finding that it would be too prejudicial. The court did not err in concluding that the photographs were necessary to the medical examiner's testimony, and showed the victim's injuries in a way that a diagram or a mere description could not.

The Opinion of the Court was delivered PER CURIAM.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard." Syl. Pt. 1, McCormick v. Allstate Ins. Co., 197 W. Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996).

2. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

3. "In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

4. "In cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact." Syl. Pt. 4, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991).

5. "[T]he primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

6. "A psychological parent is a person who, on a continuing day-to-day basis, through interaction, companionship, interplay, and mutuality, fulfills a child's psychological and physical needs for a parent and provides for the child's emotional and financial support. The psychological parent may be a biological, adoptive, or foster parent, or any other person. The resulting relationship between the psychological parent and the child must be of substantial, not temporary, duration and must have begun with the consent and encouragement of the child's legal parent or guardian. To the extent that this holding is inconsistent with our prior decision of In re Brandon L.E., 183 W. Va. 113, 394 S.E.2d 515 (1990), that case is expressly modified." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Clifford K., 217 W. Va. 625, 619 S.E.2d 138 (2005).

Per Curiam:

This case is before the Court upon the consolidated appeals of the Appellant J.G.[1] (also referred to as "Appellant Father"), who is the biological father of M.P., a minor child, and the Appellant Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR"). In each of the two cases the parties are appealing the May 21, 2010, final disposition order entered by the Circuit Court of Mingo County, West Virginia, wherein the circuit court denied the Appellant Father custody of M.P. and granted custody of four minor children, including M.P., to the maternal grandparents, D.P. and V.P. (also referred to collectively as "Appellee Grandparents" and individually as either the "Appellee Grandmother" or the "Appellee Grandfather").[2] The assignment of errors for both of the Appellants, are: 1) whether the circuit court erred in denying the Appellant Father custody of his child M.P., where there were no allegations of abuse or neglect against the Appellant Father; and 2) whether the circuit court erred in granting physical custody of the four minor children to the Appellee Grandparents pursuant to a post-adjudicatory improvement period where conditions of neglect existed in the home. Based upon a review of the record, the parties' respective briefs,

[2]The children's mother, T.P. (referred to as the "children's mother") had her parental rights terminated by the circuit court in the same May 21, 2010, order that is the subject of the instant appeal. The Court refused T.P.'s petition for appeal on November 17, 2010.

including a brief submitted by the guardian ad litem, and oral arguments, the Court reverses the circuit court's decision and remands the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

On August 27, 2009, a petition for abuse and neglect was filed in the Circuit Court of Mingo County regarding N.A., now eleven, I.A., now eight, C.P., now seven, and M.P., now three. The petition was filed against T.P. ("the children's mother"), who is the biological mother of the children, and the Appellee Grandparents, all of whom were alleged to have care and custody of the children as the children and their mother were residing in the home of the Appellee Grandparents at the time the petition was filed. The petition also listed M.A., the biological father of N.A, I.A. and C.P., as well as Joshua G.,[3] who was initially identified as the father of M.P. and who was also identified as the children's mother's boyfriend.

The petition was based upon allegations of domestic violence between the children's mother and the Appellee Grandfather. The acts of domestic violence occurred in the presence of the children. There were also allegations in the petition of numerous prior [3]Because Joshua G., who was ultimately found not to be M.P.'s biological father, has the same initials as the Appellant Father, the Court will refer to Joshua G. by his first name and last initial.

referrals to the Appellant DHHR for the children's mother's drug abuse dating back to 2004. Additionally, there was the death of another child in 2007, an infant named P.P., who was in the children's mother's care when he died. The death occurred in the Appellee Grandparents' home and the Appellee Grandfather was at home when the death was reported. There was a criminal investigation into this death; however, an autopsy revealed that the cause of death of the child was undetermined. The medical examiner noted that the head and facial injuries suffered by the child were not consistent with the description of the incident given by the children's mother. The medical examiner further observed evidence of anal stretching that was inconsistent with the children's mother's explanation of the child suffering from constipation. There was not enough evidence to substantiate a finding of abuse and neglect arising out of the child's death.[4]

At the August 31, 2009, preliminary hearing and despite the allegation of domestic violence against the Appellee Grandfather, the circuit court only found probable cause that abuse and neglect of the four children occurred by the children's mother. The circuit court ordered that the children remain in the legal custody of the Appellant DHHR, but granted physical custody of the four children to the Appellee Grandparents. The circuit court further directed the Appellee Grandparents not to allow their daughter to see the children or contact the children outside the scheduled supervised visitation.

[4]There were also allegations regarding M.A., the biological father of I.A., N.A., and C.P., as well as Joshua G., the boyfriend of the children's mother. Those allegations, however, are not relevant to resolving the instant appeal.

Subsequently, at an adjudicatory hearing on September 29, 2009, the circuit court found clear and convincing evidence that the children's mother had neglected her children. The circuit court ordered that the Appellant DHHR retain legal custody of the children, while physical custody was to remain with the Appellee Grandparents, so long as the children's mother did not live in the home and did not have any contact with the children.

In November 2009, the Appellant DHHR prepared a court summary reflecting that the maternal grandparents were in compliance with the circuit court's order. In a December 2009 court summary, however, the Appellant DHHR stated that the Appellee Grandparents had violated the circuit court's order regarding visitation of the children by the children's mother at their home. It was also noted in the summary that while the Appellee Grandparents had been compliant with the Appellant DHHR's services, the Appellee Grandmother had major medical problems and the Appellee Grandfather had been undergoing radiation treatments for cancer, all of which prompted the Appellant DHHR's worker to suggest that the Appellee Grandparents seek help with the daily caregiving of the children. Finally, the Appellee Grandparents had not been fully compliant with their home study.

On December 29, 2009, the Appellant DHHR moved for immediate physical custody of the children due to repeated violations of the court order by the Appellee Grandparents regarding visitation of the children by the children's mother in violation of the circuit court's order. In a January 6, 2010, hearing, the Appellee Grandparents failed to appear. Based upon evidence presented at the hearing, the circuit court found that the Appellee Grandparents had been allowing constant contact between the children and their mother in violation of the court's orders. As a result, the children were removed from the Appellee Grandparents' home and placed in a foster home.[5]

On February 22, 2010, the children's mother finally disclosed that the Appellant Father could be the biological father of M.P. The circuit court ordered DNA testing of the Appellant and directed that the Appellant DHHR file an amended petition that included him in the action. The Appellee Grandparents requested that the children be returned to their physical custody and the DHHR objected. The circuit court set a separate evidentiary hearing regarding the Appellee Grandparents' request.

[5]At a hearing that occurred on January 27, 2010, M.A. voluntarily relinquished his parental rights to his children, N.A., I.A. and C.P. It was also brought to the circuit court's attention that Joshua G. was questioning whether he was M.P.'s biological father, despite his name appearing on the child's birth certificate. Joshua G. moved to the court for a DNA test, which motion was joined by the child's mother. The DNA testing revealed that Joshua G. was not M.P.'s biological father. Joshua G. moved to voluntarily relinquish his parental rights regarding M.P. at the hearing on February 22, 2010. At the February 25, 2010, hearing the circuit court granted Joshua G.'s motion.

The evidentiary hearing was conducted on February 25, 2010. The circuit court heard testimony from the medical examiner regarding the death of P.P. in the home of the Appellee Grandparents. The medical examiner explained that the location of bruising found on the child and the presence of anal stretching were inconsistent with explanations offered by the children's mother. The children's mother had explained that the child had become wedged between the bed and the wall while co-sleeping with her and that the anal stretching was due to constipation. Despite the medical examiner's concerns, the cause of death was listed as undetermined.

Melissa Muenich of the DHHR testified that the Appellee Grandparents had repeatedly cancelled appointments for her to conduct aspects of the home study, which still had not been completed. She testified about going to the Appellee Grandparents' home for a scheduled visit, hearing the youngest child crying, and knocking on the door. No one responded to allow her to enter the home. Ms. Muenich described several attempts to contact the Appellee Grandparents regarding completion of the home study. Ms. Muenich further testified that on her first visit to the Appellee Grandparents' home, she had heard the Appellee Grandfather threaten the children with a belt. Also, a background check on the Appellee Grandfather revealed a 2005 conviction for battery and a 2009 conviction for domestic battery. Ms. Muenich testified that she had again scheduled the completion of the home study for February 26, 2010.

Ronald May, a Family Options Worker, testified that he saw the children's mother arguing with the Appellee Grandfather in the Appellee Grandparents' home during one of his scheduled visits to offer parenting classes to the Appellee Grandparents.

M.A, the biological father of N.A., I. A. and C. P., testified that when he spoke to the children's mother on the day of the hearing, she told him that she was still residing with the Appellee Grandparents, which was in violation of the circuit court's orders. M.A. recounted that when the children's mother had overdosed on drugs and was in the hospital, he and the Appellee Grandfather had gotten into a physical altercation in the presence of one of the children. The altercation resulted in a battery charge being filed against the Appellee Grandfather.

Vickie Fields, a Child Protective Services ("CPS") worker, testified that the three oldest children soiled their underwear regularly. The CPS worker testified that one child had disclosed to the foster parents that someone had "messed with him." This resulted in an appointment with Joan Phillips, M.D. The child did not disclose anything to Dr. Phillips and there was no additional evidence offered to substantiate the claim. Ms. Fields further testified that she was present and witnessed when the children were interviewed in connection with the alleged sexual abuse claim. During the interview, I.A. told the interviewer that he had been "whipped with a belt" and C.P. disclosed that he had been "beaten with a broomstick[,]" while also telling the interviewer that N.A. "was whipped more than anybody else," because "he poops on himself and he gets whipped and has to stand in the corner." Ms. Fields testified that the psychological testing ordered to be performed on the Appellee Grandparents had not been completed yet, due to the Appellee Grandfather's cancer treatment. Ms. Fields further testified that she did not believe that the Appellee Grandparents could protect the children from the children's mother given their history, which included telephone calls made by the children's mother to the Appellant DHHR from the Appellee Grandparents' home. Ms. Fields testified that she had discussed with the Appellee Grandparents the importance of keeping the children's mother away from their home.

At the conclusion of this hearing, the circuit court found that there was no concrete evidence of sexual abuse presented during the hearing outside the allegations made by the oldest child to the foster father. The Court ordered the children to remain in the physical and legal custody of the Appellant DHHR pending the final dispositional hearing.

The dispositional hearing was conducted on March 15, 2010. The circuit court first heard from the attorney for the Appellant DHHR that the Appellant Father had been identified as the biological father of M.P. The Appellant DHHR informed the circuit court that it had no allegations against J.G. and moved that he be dismissed from the action and granted intervenor status. The circuit court granted the Appellant DHHR's motion.

Next, the circuit court heard evidence regarding the children's mother, and considered the Appellee Grandparents' request to have physical custody of the children returned to them. Ms. Fields, the CPS worker, testified that the children's mother was totally financially dependent upon the Appellee Grandparents and relied heavily upon them for transportation. Ms. Fields continued her recommendation that the Appellee Grandparents' home was not an appropriate placement. She testified that she did not feel that the Appellee Grandparents would comply with the circuit court's orders based upon a history of violating those orders regarding keeping the children's mother away from the children.

Ms. Fields further testified that the Appellant Father, M.P.'s biological father, had no knowledge that M.P. was his child until he was contacted by the Appellant DHHR. The Appellant Father had been cooperative with the Appellant DHHR. Further, Ms. Fields testified that both the Appellant Father and his current wife were approved foster care parents. According to the testimony, the Appellant Father and his wife currently had one foster child in their home, which was approved for two children, and the foster child was well adjusted with no problems being reported in the home. The Appellant Father also had another biological child who was in the custody of the biological mother, but with whom the Appellant Father had contact. Additionally, after learning that he was M.P.'s biological father, the Appellant Father indicated that he desired to have custody of the child. Both the Appellant DHHR and the guardian ad litem recommended that the Appellant Father be given custody of M.P. Further, there was testimony that Appellant Father and his current wife were supportive of sibling visitation, which was recommended by both the Appellant DHHR and the guardian ad litem.

The Appellee Grandmother also testified. She confirmed that she suffered from high blood pressure, diabetes, knee problems, heart problems and kidney problems. She also stated that she helped the Appellee Grandfather with cancer treatments. The Appellee Grandmother testified that she desired to have custody of her grandchildren. When questioned about the reports that the Appellee Grandfather whipped N.A. for soiling in his pants, she stated that "I'm going to tell you, them two little boys [referring to her grandchildren] lie." The Appellee Grandfather did not testify at the hearing.

By Order entered May 21, 2010, the circuit court made the following factual findings regarding the Appellee Grandparents:

> 23. The Respondents, . . . [the Appellee Grandparents], have played an active role in the subject children's lives for most of each of the children's lives, has [sic] provided financial and emotional support for each of the children, and have acted as a mother and father figure to the subject children. The Court FINDS that the Respondents . . . have been and are for all intents and purposes psychological parents of the subject children.
> 24. The Court FINDS that the Respondents . . . have neglected the subject children, engaged in domestic violence, failed to protect the subject children, and has [sic] participated in at risk behaviors that have endangered the subject children.

The circuit court, however, went on to find that it "believes it is in the best interests of the children to grant the Respondents . . . one last opportunity to resolve their remaining issues." Thus, the circuit court granted a post-dispositional improvement period for a period of ninety days and declined to terminate the Appellee Grandparents' rights. The circuit court set forth certain conditions and directed that the Appellee Grandparents were to have weekend visitations with the children in their home for four consecutive weeks and that their daughter, the children's mother, was not to be present in the home when the children were present. If, after those visitations had occurred, there were no violations of the conditions of the improvement period, physical custody was to be transferred to the Appellee Grandparents.[6]

[6] According to the court summary, this transfer of physical custody from the foster care parents to the Appellee Grandparents occurred in July of 2010.

Concerning the Appellant Father, the circuit court found in its May 21, 2010, order that he was the biological father of M.P. and had been cooperative with services in the matter. The circuit court further found that both the Appellant Father and his current wife had an approved foster care home and that the Appellant Father had another biological child that he visits. The court also found that the Appellant Father's home was large enough for two children.

Despite the foregoing factual findings, which failed to include any allegations or evidence of abuse, neglect, or unfitness to parent, the circuit court determined that the Appellant Father was entitled only to visitation with M.P. The circuit court ordered regularly-scheduled visitation between the Appellant Father and M.P. The circuit court, however, decided that "it was in the best interests of the children to remain together with their psychological parents and not to be separated."

Also contained in the record, but apparently not considered by the circuit court in its May 21, 2010, order, for reasons not apparent in the record, were the psychological reports concerning the Appellee Grandparents, as well as the completed home study. The psychological reports were both dated April 19, 2010, and the home study was completed on May 3, 2010. According to the psychological evaluation of the Appellee Grandfather, there were significant domestic violence episodes between the Appellee Grandfather and the children's mother which occurred in the presence of the children. The psychologist's recommendations indicated that the Appellee Grandfather reported "significant impairment with psychological and medical functioning which would interfere with his ability to parent his grandchildren." The report further noted "[p]ersonality maladjustment and significant anger problems are primary concerns and place his grandchildren at risk for abuse and neglect." Significantly, the Appellee Grandfather "shows no remorse or desire to alter his behaviors. . . ."

Similarly, regarding the Appellee Grandmother, the psychologist found that "[s]he is overwhelmed with depression, anxiety and dependency issues and this complicates her ability to effectively make decisions for her family, provide a safe environment for the grandchildren and be emotionally available for the children." Not only did the Appellee Grandmother report being the victim of abuse in the past, but she also acknowledged that she allowed domestic violence between her daughter and the Appellee Grandfather in front of the children without intervention by her. Based upon these evaluations, the psychologist did not recommend placement of the children with the Appellee Grandparents.

Additionally, the home study was completed on or about May 6, 2010. The Appellee Grandparents' home was not approved for placement of the children by the DHHR. In the home study, Ms. Muenich explained the reasoning for the failed approval which included: 1) the Appellee Grandfather's prior convictions for battery and domestic violence; the Appellee Grandfather had a child maltreatment finding from July 2009;[7] 2) the home did not meet the DHHR standards of providing each child with their own bed as the evidence as that the children were all sharing a bed and that the Appellee Grandfather was sleeping in this bed with them, even though the Appellee Grandfather had his own bed; 3) the home was also noted as having badly soiled carpets and furniture, as well as a dirty odor; 4) the Appellee Grandparents' failure to return a form entitled "Application" despite being asked repeatedly for it; 5) the failure to provide medical reports regarding their physical health; and 6) the Appellee Grandfather's failure to sign a consent to obtain his mental heath treatment records at the Veteran's Administration.[8]

[7]While there is no more discussion of this maltreatment finding in the completed home study, presumably it was as a result of the domestic violence charge which occurred in the presence of one of the children.

[8]Subsequent to the May 21, 2010, order that is the subject of the instant appeal, in a monthly court summary prepared by DHHR and dated June 7, 2010, the three oldest children reported at therapy and counseling sessions that they had seen their mother, T.P., on the weekend visitation with the Appellee Grandparents. Also, an order entered June 29, 2010, reveals that the Appellant DHHR moved the circuit court for "an Order requiring the Sheriff of Mingo County to accompany any social workers visiting the home of the . . . [Appellee Grandparents]" for purposes of providing supervision of the children for drop in visits to the Appellee Grandparents' home. The circuit court denied the DHHR's motion, but admonished the Appellee Grandparents regarding their behavior and their need to cooperate with the DHHR. In another Order From Judicial Review, that was entered on September 1, 2010, following an August 23, 2010, hearing, the Court noted that the Appellant Father had advised the Court that the Appellee Grandparents "had failed to comply with the Court's prior Order regarding visitation." Additionally, the order reveals that the guardian ad litem, Diana Carter Wiedel, advised the circuit court that the Appellee Grandparents had not been complying with the circuit court's prior order regarding services for the children as the

The applicable standard of review of the circuit court's order is the two-pronged standard set forth in syllabus point one of McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Co., 197 W. Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996), which provides as follows:

> When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard.

Id. at 417, 475 S.E.2d at 509, Syl. Pt. 1; see also Syllabus, In re Brandon Lee B., 211 W. Va. 587, 567 S.E.2d 597 (2001), cert. denied, 536 U.S. 942 (2002); Syl. Pt. 2, In re Beth Ann B., 204 W. Va. 424, 513 S.E.2d 472 (1998); Syl. Pt. 1, State v. Michael M., 202 W. Va. 350, 504 S.E.2d 177 (1998). Further guidance regarding the standard of review is found in In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), wherein the Court held that > differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Id. at 225-26, 470 S.E.2d at 179-80, Syl. Pt. 1. Keeping the foregoing standards and principles in mind, the Court turns to a discussion of the issues at hand.

III. Discussion of Law

A. Biological Father's Rights

The first issue before the Court is whether the circuit court erred in denying the Appellant Father custody of his biological child M.P., where there were no allegations of abuse or neglect against the Appellant Father. Both the Appellant DHHR and the Appellant Father argue that the circuit court failed to consider that as the biological father, the Appellant Father has a fundamental right to custody of his son where there are no allegations of abuse and neglect against him.[9] While not a model of clarity and with virtually no reasoning, it appears that the Appellee Grandparents, in their appellate brief, argued that the father failed to follow through on his duty to care for and support his child and thus the circuit court did not err in awarding them custody of M.P. The Appellee Grandparents advance this argument despite the fact that the biological father had no knowledge that he was M.P.'s father until the March 2010 hearing.

[9]The Appellee Grandparents maintain that the DHHR has no standing to raise any argument in favor of the Appellant Father. The Court readily dispenses with this argument finding that it is not supported either by statute, West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-1 to -12 (2009), or case law.

In syllabus point one of In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973), this Court held:

> In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions.

Id. at 225, 207 S.E.2d at 130-131, Syl. Pt. 1. While this right is not absolute it is "limited or terminated by the State, as [p]arens patriae, if the parent is proved unfit to be entrusted with child care." Id. at 225, 207 S.E.2d at 131, in part, Syl. Pt. 5. Thus, the Court further stated in Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W. Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989), that > [a]lthough the welfare of the child is of immeasurable importance, another important principle which must be considered is that of a natural parent's right to raise his or her own child. "The right of a parent to the custody of his or her child is based on natural law and arises because the child is his or hers to care for and rear, . . ." State ex rel. Harmon v. Utterback, 144 W. Va. 419, 426, 108 S.E.2d 521, 526 (1959). Although the polar star concept is adhered to by this Court in child custody cases, we have "refused to apply it in cases where the parents have not abandoned the child or have in no manner been proved to be unfit to have the care and custody of such child." Hammack v. Wise, 158 W. Va. 343, 347, 211 S.E.2d 118, 121 (1975). This concept "will not be invoked to deprive an unoffending parent of his natural right to the custody of his child." Hammack, 158 W. Va. at 347, 211 S.E.2d at 121.

Honaker, 182 W. Va. at 451, 388 S.E.2d at 324.

In the instant case, it is undisputed that J.G. is the biological father of M. P. Further, the record is devoid of any allegations of abuse and neglect committed by J.G.[10] To

---

[10]In her November 3, 2010, letter to this Court, the children's guardian ad litem, Ms. Wiedel, states that the Appellant Father "has failed to fully exercise the visitation awarded to him since the dispositional hearing." The guardian ad litem goes on to state that

> [a]t the dispositional hearing, I agreed with the Court's decision not to terminate his parental rights to the child, M[.], but at the present time, I believe that he has not [sic] intention of exercising those rights. Therefore, I believe it would be in the child's best interest to terminate those rights so that the child may be adopted with his brothers.

This statement was predicated upon testimony elicited by the Appellee Grandparents at a post-dispositional evidentiary hearing in which the former foster parent testified that the Appellant Father failed to exercise his visitation as permitted. There, however, is no specific information in Ms. Wiedel's letter setting forth any factual details regarding how the Appellant Father failed to exercise his visitation with his child. Further, Ms. Wiedel failed to attach the hearing transcript containing the testimony of the former foster parent regarding the Appellant Father's visitation with his child, so that hearing transcript is not included in the record on appeal. Significantly, no petition has been brought against the Appellant Father seeking termination of his parental rights and there was no evidence before the circuit court warranting termination of the Appellant Father's parental rights to M.P.

In her summary response, the guardian ad litem, rather than arguing for termination of J.G.'s parental rights, simply asserts that the circuit court did not err in its determination that it was in the best interests of all of the children involved to keep them together and not to separate them.

Since the entry of the May 21, 2010, order, it can be gleaned from the record, as well as from the oral arguments before the Court, that the reason that the Appellant Father may not have been keeping scheduled visitation with M.P may be due to the Appellant Father's fear of the Appellee Grandfather. For instance, at an August 2010 hearing, the Appellant Father informed the circuit court that the Appellee Grandparents were not allowing him the visitation ordered by the circuit court. There was also a request by the Appellant DHHR, reflected in an order entered June 29, 2010, for "an Order requiring the Sheriff of Mingo County to accompany any social workers visiting the home of the . . . [Appellee Grandparents]" for purposes of providing supervision of the children for drop in visits to the Appellee Grandparents' home. Finally, during oral argument before this Court, counsel for the contrary, the Appellant Father and his wife have been approved as foster care parents. Succinctly stated, there is nothing in the record which supports a finding that the Appellant Father is not a suitable biological parent who has the right to custody of his natural child, M.P. Thus, the circuit court erred in not granting the Appellant Father custody of his child.

It is equally important that the Court also consider whether it is in the best interests of M.P. to a continued relationship with his siblings. Honaker, 182 W. Va. at 452, 388 S.E.2d at 325 ("The best interests of the child concept with regard to visitation emerges from the reality that '[t]he modern child is considered a person, not a sub-person over whom the parent has an absolute and irrevocable possessory right. The child has rights. . . .'"). This right is grounded in the best interests of the child as well as "'the need for stability in the child's life . . . . [T]ermination of visitation with individuals to whom the child was close would contribute to instability rather than provide stability.'" Id. at 452, 388 S.E.2d at 326 (quoting Note, Visitation Beyond the Traditional Limitations, 60 Ind.L.J. 191, 221-22 (1984)). To that end, in James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), the Court held in syllabus point four that the Appellant Father and the guardian ad litem stated that there was a considerable amount of fear felt by the guardian ad litem, the Appellant Father and his wife, and the DHHR workers in having to deal with the Appellee Grandfather.

> [i]n cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact.

Id. at 649, 408 S.E.2d at 401.

In the instant matter, both the Appellant DHHR and the guardian ad litem recommended that it would be in the best interests of M.P. to have continued visitation with his siblings. M.P. has grown up with his siblings, having never been separated from them. Under these circumstances where siblings have been together their entire lives, there is a strong presumption that it is in the best interests of the children that they maintain their sibling relationship through continued visitation if possible. Consequently, on remand, the Court directs the circuit court to consider the continued association of M.P. with his siblings under the presumption that the continued association of M.P. with his siblings is in all the children's best interests. If the circuit court determines that continued visitation between M.P. and his siblings is in the best interest of the children, the Court should develop an appropriate sibling visitation plan that will provide for meaningful continued contact between M.P. and his siblings so the siblings are not denied a continued relationship.

B. Post-Adjudicatory Improvement Period

The next issue is whether the circuit court erred in granting physical custody of the four minor children to the Appellee Grandparents pursuant to a post-adjudicatory improvement period where conditions of neglect existed in the home. The Appellant DHHR argues that the circuit court erred in granting any post-adjudicatory improvement period because the Appellee Grandparents failed to demonstrate that there is a reasonable likelihood that they can substantially correct the conditions of neglect in the near future. In contrast, the Appellee Grandparents argue that the circuit court did not err in granting them a post-dispositional improvement period because they were the psychological parents of the children.[11]

As with all abuse and neglect proceedings, "the best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children." Michael K.T. v. Tina

[11]While the Appellee Grandparents argue on appeal that they are entitled to the grandparent preference as set forth in West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a) and discussed by the Court in In re Elizabeth F., 225 W. Va. 780, 696 S.E.2d 296 (2010), a review of the circuit court's order reveals that the circuit court's determination to grant the post-adjudicatory improvement period was based upon its determination that the Appellee Grandparents were the children's psychological parents and not based upon the grandparent preference. As the grandparent preference was not raised or considered below, it is not considered by the Court in the instant appeal.

However, this Court has recently held that the grandparent preference is not dispositive, nor does it override the child's best interests. Kristopher O. v. Mazzone, 227 W. Va. 184, 193, 706 S.E.2d 381, 390 (2011)("In In re Elizabeth F., this Court explained that 'an integral part of the implementation of the grandparent preference, as with all decisions concerning minor children, is the best interests of the child.'"). Further, the grandparent preference relates to the "adoption of a child in situations wherein the parental rights have been terminated." Id.

L.T., 182 W. Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) (citation omitted). This Court has repeatedly stated that "the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

Moreover, this Court recognized the concept of a psychological parent in In re Clifford K., 217 W. Va. 625, 619 S.E.2d 138 (2005). In Clifford K, the Court held in syllabus point three that

> [a] psychological parent is a person who, on a continuing day-to-day basis, through interaction, companionship, interplay, and mutuality, fulfills a child's psychological and physical needs for a parent and provides for the child's emotional and financial support. The psychological parent may be a biological, adoptive, or foster parent, or any other person. The resulting relationship between the psychological parent and the child must be of substantial, not temporary, duration and must have begun with the consent and encouragement of the child's legal parent or guardian. To the extent that this holding is inconsistent with our prior decision of In re Brandon L.E., 183 W. Va. 113, 394 S.E.2d 515 (1990),[12] that case is expressly modified.

[12]This Court had previously held in In re Brandon L.E., that

> [i]f a child has resided with an individual other than a parent for a significant period of time such that the non-parent with whom the child resides serves as the child's psychological parent, during a period when the natural parent had the right to maintain continuing substantial contact with the child and failed to do so, the equitable rights of the child must be considered in connection with any decision that would alter the child's custody. To protect the equitable rights of a child in this situation, the child's environment should not be disturbed without a clear showing of significant benefit to him, notwithstanding the parent's assertion of a legal right to the child.

217 W. Va. at 630, 619 S.E.2d at 143, Syl. Pt. 3 (Footnote added).

Simply because a person is found to be a child's psychological parent, however, does not translate into the psychological parent getting custody of the child. Rather, this Court has only gone so far as to hold that the status of "psychological parent" entitles the individual to intervene in a custody proceeding, "when such intervention is likely to serve the best interests of the child(ren) whose custody is under adjudication." Id. at Syl. Pt. 4, in part. Thus, custody determinations regarding a child or children are still controlled by what is in the best interests of the child(ren).

In the case sub judice, the record is replete with the Appellee Grandparents' continued and repeated violations of orders entered by the circuit court regarding visitation by the children's mother with the subject children throughout the proceedings. Despite the circuit court's terminating the children's mother's rights, the Appellee Grandparents have continued to allow visitation between the children and their mother in direct violation of the circuit court's order that is the subject of the instant appeal. Further, there is also evidence in the record that the Appellee Grandparents have violated that order by not allowing the Appellant Father to visit his child and by failing to comply with psychological appointments scheduled for the children. Additionally, the record contains a failed home study of the Appellee Grandparents' home, as well as the psychologist's opinions after evaluating both of the Appellee Grandparents that their home was not a proper placement for the children. These documents were submitted to the circuit court prior to the entry of the May 21, 2010, order; however, the circuit court failed to address the documents in its order.

Given this Court's continued adherence to the well-established precedent that placement of children with their grandparents must be in the best interests of the children, the circuit court completely overlooked this polar star in reaching its decision. The circuit court gave little consideration to the fact that an infant had died in the Appellee Grandparents' home with the Appellee Grandfather present and with no real explanation by him as to how the death occurred. Moreover, the children reported that the Appellee Grandfather whipped them with belts and broomsticks, with the only explanation offered by the Appellee Grandmother being that the children lie. The children were sharing a bed with their Appellee Grandfather, even though he had his own bedroom. Lastly, the Appellee Grandparents nonchalantly were being allowed by the circuit court to violate its orders, especially regarding visitation with the children's mother, with absolutely no explanation or consequences. The circuit court erred in granting a post-termination improvement period that allowed transfer of the physical custody of the children back to the Appellee Grandparents.

When custody of children is changed, gradual transition periods should be used whenever possible. See Syl. Pt. 3, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991) ("It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives."). In the instant case, such a gradual transition seems well-warranted. However, given the repeated wilful violation of the circuit court's orders by the Appellee Grandparents, as well as the fear that the guardian ad litem, the Appellant DHHR's workers, and the Appellant Father and his wife have of the Appellee Grandfather, as revealed to the Court during oral argument and as illustrated by the record, this may not be a case in which a gradual transition period is suitable in light of serious questions about the safety and welfare of the children involved.

Upon remand, the lower court should set a hearing forthwith, bringing all the parties and their counsel in for a full hearing on the most effective means of transitioning the children while still protecting their safety. The lower court should make very clear that its orders will be followed without recalcitrance, interference, or hostility, and that if a transition period is established, the Appellee Grandfather and all other parties must work cooperatively or risk serious sanction. In addition, the circuit court, on remand, may consider whether the children should have continued visitation with their grandparents given the evidence that there is a strong psychological bond between the children and the Appellee Grandparents. See Syl. Pt. 11, In re Jonathan G., 198 W. Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996) ("A child has a right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond, including foster parents, provided that a determination is made that such continued contact is in the best interests of the child."). It is imperative, however, that the circuit court focus on whether such continued contact is in the best interests of the children involved in light of the Appellee Grandparents' pattern and practice of violating court orders, as well as the Appellee Grandfather's apparent use of fear and intimidation. At a minimum, the circuit court, if examining any issues of visitation between the Appellee Grandparents and the children, should give due consideration to supervised visitation at a neutral location in the event that the circuit court determines that such visitation is warranted.

Also, it is critical in this case for the Appellant DHHR to immediately develop permanency plans for all the children, I.A, N.A., and C.P. While there is some indication in the record that the children's last foster care parents may be a viable permanent placement as the foster care parents continued to visit with the children until the Appellee Grandparents stopped the visitation, counsel for the DHHR, during oral argument, was unable to state that that foster care home, indeed, was a permanent placement for the children. Recently in State ex rel. West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources v. Pancake, 224 W. Va. 39, 680 S.E.2d 54 (2009), the Court reiterated the following fundament principle concerning the securing of a permanent placement for children:

> The early, most formative years of a child's life are crucial to his or her development. In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 623, 408 S.E.2d 365, 375 (1991). We have repeatedly emphasized that "children have a right to resolution of their life situations, to a basic level of nurturance, protection, and security, and to a permanent placement." State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W. Va. 251, 257, 470 S.E.2d 205, 211 (1996).

Pancake, 224 W. Va. at 43, 680 S.E.2d at 58.

The children should not be moved from place to place with no permanency plan and every effort should be made to ensure continued contact between the siblings. Further, the children should be provided with counseling services by the DHHR, and the circuit court should enter an order so directing.

The lower court faces a Herculean task of requiring wisdom, compassion, and the strength to protect the children to the greatest degree possible from physical and emotional harm, and to create stability and safety.

IV. Conclusion

Based upon the foregoing, the May 21, 2010, final disposition order entered by the Circuit Court of Mingo County is hereby reversed and this case is remanded for further expedited proceedings consistent with this opinion. The mandate of this Court shall issue contemporaneously herewith.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

NANCY VIOLA R.

v.

RANDOLPH W. and Grady W.

No. 17144

April 9, 1987

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. " 'A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has permanently transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts.' Syllabus, State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W.Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d [798] (1969)." Syl. pt. 2, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W.Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975).

2. A conviction of first degree murder of a child's mother by his father and the father's prolonged incarceration in a penal institution for that conviction are significant factors to be considered in ascertaining the father's fitness and in determining whether the father's parental rights should be terminated.

3. Where parental rights of a father have been terminated because of his conviction of the first degree murder of the child's mother, and other acts of violence to her and threats of violence to the child, permanent guardianship may be given to the West Virginia Department of Human Services. W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [1984].

Norman Googel, Welch, Joanne Schulman, Van Nuys, Cal., for appellant.

Abishi C. Cunningham, Welch, for appellee.

Carolyn F. Corwin, Alan Tawshunsky, Covington & Burling, Washington, D.C., Barbara Fleischauer, Morgantown, for amicus curiae.

McHUGH, Justice:

This case is before this Court upon the appeal of Nancy R. from the Circuit Court of McDowell County. See footnote 1 Mrs. R. had sought custody of her nephew, Randolph W. II, then age 4. Custody, however, was awarded to the child's paternal uncle, Grady W. The child's father, Randolph W. I, who had been indicted for the first degree murder of the child's mother, had sought to appoint Grady W. as the child's guardian. Mrs. R.

also appeals from the denial of her motion to reconsider the court's previous order of custody to Grady W. because of the subsequent conviction of Randolph W. for the first degree murder of Alesha W., the child's mother. Randolph W. was sentenced to life in prison with a recommendation of mercy. This Court has before it the petition for appeal, all matters of record and briefs. See footnote 2

At the time of his wife's death on December 14, 1984, Randolph W. had one child, Randolph W. II, who was three years old at the time of his mother's death. See footnote 3

Throughout her six-year marriage, Alesha W. had been the victim of repeated acts of violence and abuse by her husband. She and the child sought refuge on many occasions with members of her family, including the appellant, Nancy R. Two of Alesha's friends testified that Randolph had, on at least two separate occasions, threatened to kill Alesha, the child and himself. On at least two occasions, Randolph had stabbed Alesha, causing her to receive stitches in her arm, finger and breast. When Alesha and their child left Randolph after these assaults, Grady W., the party who has been awarded custody of the child, never contacted or visited Alesha or the child. Prior to her death, Alesha and the child had been separated from Randolph for about four months.

After Alesha's death, the child resided with the appellant, Nancy R., and her three children. Since Alesha's death in 1984, Nancy R. has been the child's primary caretaker and helped him cope with the loss of his mother.

Grady W. has attempted twice to visit the child at the appellant's home during that period. Shortly before Christmas in 1984, he requested that Randolph W. II be allowed to spend Christmas week with his family. Believing it was too soon after the death of the child's mother and that he was still adjusting, the appellant did not permit him to go with Grady; however, she never refused to allow Grady to visit the child. Grady W. made no further attempts to visit the child until April 3, 1985, after Randolph W. had attempted to appoint him as the child's guardian, at which time he went to the appellant's home intending to take custody of the child. Upon the appellant's refusal to let Grady W. take the child, he and Randolph W. sought to obtain custody by filing a habeas corpus petition.

As a result, the appellant filed this custody proceeding. The trial court ruled that both the appellant and Randolph W. were fit, but that Randolph, as the father of the child, was entitled to designate Grady W. as guardian of the child. The child has remained with Nancy R. during the appeal process.

In the criminal case against Randolph W., the jury heard the testimony of several eyewitnesses to the crime. After this testimony had been presented, Randolph W.

entered a plea of guilty to first degree murder of his wife. As a result of that conviction, Nancy R. sought a reconsideration of the order granting custody of the child to Grady W.

II

Because of the trial court's finding that Randolph W. was a fit parent, we must decide whether or not he was a fit parent and whether or not the evidence is sufficient to support that finding. See footnote 4

This Court has enunciated the standard by which the fitness of a parent is to be judged in several decisions:

> 'A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, and, unless the parent is an unfit pers on because of m isconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment or other derelic tion of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreem ent or otherwis e has permanently transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child w ill be recognized and enforced by the courts.' Syllabus, State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W.Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d [798] (1969).

Syl. pt. 2, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W.Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975). Accord, syl. pt. 2, Collins v. Collins, 171 W.Va. 126, 297 S.E.2d 901 (1982); syl. pt. 1, Leach v. Bright, 165 W.Va. 636, 270 S.E.2d 793 (1980); syllabus, Whiteman v. Robinson, 145 W.Va. 685, 116 S.E.2d 691 (1960).

Under the State's child welfare laws, a parent may lose custody of a child to the State Department of Human Services upon a finding that the child has been abused or neglected and upon a finding that the parent is unwilling or unable to provide adequately for the child's needs. W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a)(5) [1984]. See footnote 5 Furthermore, abuse and neglect proceedings may ultimately result in termination of parental rights pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6- 5(a)(6) [1984] "[u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future[.]"

Of particular relevance in the case before us is the fact that the legislature has stated expressly that the "conditions of neglect or abuse" which constitute grounds for termination of parental rights include:

> (1) The abusing parent or parents have habitually abused or are addicted to alcohol ... to the extent that proper parenting skills have been seriously impaired....
> ....

> (5) The abusing parent or parents have repeatedly or seriously injured the child physically or emotionally, ... and the degree of family stress and the potential for further abuse and neglect are so great as to preclude the use of resources to mitigate or resolve fam ily problems or assist the abusing parent or parents in fulfilling their responsibilities to the child; ...

W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b)(1) and (5) [1984] (emphasis added).

It is clear from the evidence adduced at the custody proceeding that Randolph W. habitually abused alcohol. During this proceeding, Randolph W. admitted that his drinking habits severely interfered with his personal life. Testimony was also introduced which established that he was continually absent from his home and did not provide adequate support for his family. Thus, there was uncontroverted evidence before the trial court requiring it to find that Randolph W.'s excessive drinking hampered his familial relationships. See footnote 6

In addition to Randolph W.'s abuse of alcohol, we believe that his abuse of his wife is an important consideration in this case. During the marriage of Randolph and Alesha W., she was repeatedly abused. The trial court, however, determined that the only basis for an assertion that Randolph W. was unfit to have custody of his child was the fact that he was under indictment for the murder of his wife.

We have recognized that spousal abuse is a factor to be considered in determining parental fitness for child custody. Collins v. Collins, 171W.Va. 126, 297 S.E.2d 901 (1982). In Collins, we upheld the trial court's determination that the appellant had demonstrated violent tendencies that rendered her unfit for custody. The trial court concluded that the appellant had " 'demonstrated [a] tendency to be violent as evidenced by her willingness to threaten with and to actually shoot a deadly weapon at human beings when she was upset, but not in any way threatened.' " Id. at 902.

Other courts also regard spousal abuse as an important consideration in child custody cases. See, e.g., In re Marriage of Cline, 433 N.E.2d 51, 54 (Ind.Ct.App.1982); In re Marriage of Ballinger, 222 N.W.2d 738, 739 (Iowa 1974); Hosey v. Myers, 240 So.2d 252, 253 (Miss.1970); Schiele v. Sager, 174 Mont. 533, 540, 571 P.2d 1142, 1146 (1977).

The Supreme Court of Iowa reasoned that assaults of a spouse reveal violent tendencies which may render a parent unfit for custody of his or her child. In re Marriage of Snyder, 241 N.W.2d 733 (Iowa 1976). In Snyder, the court, citing evidence that the father had pulled a gun on his child's mother, reversed the trial judge's finding of fitness. Although there was no indication that the father had ever abused the child, the court awarded custody to the mother, holding that the father's "meanness, aggressiveness, and tendency to[ward] violence expose [the child] to more danger than [the mother's] alleged irresponsibility and moral misconduct." Id. at 734. See also McCurry v. McCurry, 223 Ga. 334, 335, 155 S.E.2d 378, 380 (1967); In Re Custody of Williams, 104 Ill.App.3d 16, 18, 59 Ill.Dec. 791, 793, 432 N.E.2d 375, 377 (1982).

Clearly, the many acts of violence by Randolph W. toward his wife, Alesha, culminating in her death, are directly relevant to the determination of his parental fitness and should have resulted in a finding of unfitness. Undoubtedly, the most convincing evidence of the appellee's unfitness is his conviction of the first degree murder of his wife, Alesha.

Following Randolph W.'s conviction and his sentence to the penitentiary for life with a recommendation of mercy, the appellant petitioned the trial court, based upon that conviction, to modify its previous order awarding custody to Grady W. During the hearing on the modification, Nancy R. requested the trial court to incorporate as part of the record in the custody proceeding, the entire transcript and court records of the criminal action, as well as the confession of Randolph W. The court, nevertheless, declined to consider evidence of Randolph W.'s conviction stating that it would not make further findings in this case based on the results of the criminal trial.

The record of Randolph W.'s conviction was specifically pleaded in the appellant's petition to modify the order. See syl. pt. 1, Carper v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 123 W.Va. 177, 13 S.E.2d 643 (1941). Furthermore, Nancy R. requested that the trial court incorporate as part of the record in the custody proceeding the record of the criminal case. Id. The trial judge recognized that the record of the criminal case would be part of the appeal to this Court. The record of the criminal case should have been admitted as evidence in the custody proceeding or it should have been judicially noticed. See generally W.Va.R.Evid. 201 See footnote 7; see also F. Cleckley, Handbook on Evidence for West Virginia Lawyers § 12.3(B) at 670 (2d ed. 1986).

This Court has recognized that a parent can be unfit for custody if he or she engages in "grossly immoral behavior under circumstances that would affect the child." Stacy v. Stacy, --- W.Va. ----, ----, 332 S.E.2d 260, 262 (1985). We have further recognized that a parent's conduct may be so outrageous when compared with " 'contemporary moral standards that reasonable [people] would find that [the conduct] warrant[s] a finding of unfitness because of the deleterious effect upon the child['s] being raised by a [parent] with such a defective character.' " Syl. pt. 3, in part, id., quoting syl. pt. 4, in part, J.B. v. A.B., 161 W.Va. 332, 242 S.E.2d 248 (1978).

After reviewing the evidence, we conclude that the trial court's finding that Randolph W. was a fit parent is clearly erroneous. A conviction of first degree murder of a child's mother by his father and the father's prolonged incarceration in a penal institution are significant factors to be considered in ascertaining the father's fitness and in determining whether the father's parental rights should be terminated.

The Supreme Court of Illinois, in a case factually similar to the one before us, terminated all parental rights of a father who was found guilty of the first degree murder of the mother of his three-year-old child. In re Abdullah, 85 Ill.2d 300, 53 Ill.Dec. 246, 423 N.E.2d 915 (1981). There the court applied an Illinois statute that required a showing of "depravity" in order to terminate parental rights. The court determined that the defendant's premeditated murder of his wife constituted a prima facie case of depravity. The court's reasoning is particularly relevant to this case:

> Three separate factors in the evidence showed defendant's depravity. First, he was convicted of m urder, the m ost serious crim inal offense there is. Few acts could be m ore inherently defi cient in the moral sense or rectitude than the intentional and unjustified killing of a fellow human being. Second, the m urder victim was the m other of the child. Defendant thus deprived his son of his m other and further heightened the psychological scarring caused by a fam ily already broken by divorce. Finally, the extended term of im prisonment im posed indicates that the murder was accompanied by exceptionally brutal a nd heinous behavior demonstrating wanton cruelty.

85 Ill.2d at 306-07, 53 Ill.Dec. at 249, 423 N.E.2d at 918. See also In re Sarah H., 106 Cal.App.3d 326, 329-30, 165 Cal.Rptr. 61, 63 (1980); In re Geoffrey G., 98 Cal.App.3d 412, 420-21, 159 Cal.Rptr. 460, 464-65 (1979). See footnote 8

W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [1984] provides in pertinent part:

> Upon a finding that there is no reasona ble likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially co rrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, [the court shall] terminate the parental ... rights and responsibilities and commit the child to the permanent guardianship of the state department....

Clearly, there is no likelihood that the conditions of abuse in this case will be corrected in the near future. It is in the best interests of the child that we terminate Randolph W.'s parental rights.

Before a court may terminate parental rights, clear and convincing evidence to support that finding must be produced. W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1984]; State v. C.N.S., --- W.Va. ----, ----, 319 S.E.2d 775, 780 (1984); State v. Carl B., --- W.Va. ----, ----, 301 S.E.2d 864, 868 (1983); syl. pt. 6, In Re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). In the case before us, the evidence adduced at the custody proceeding reaches that standard. Cf. State ex rel. West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Cheryl M. 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181, 188 (W.Va.1987). Randolph W. had a history of abusing his spouse. That abuse irreparably affected his relationship with his son. Furthermore, his conviction of murder under the circumstances of this case support a finding that his parental rights should be terminated for the welfare of Randolph W. II.

Aside from acts of abuse to the body and mind of a child, first degree murder of a child's parent is the ultimate act of savagery to that child. The emotional and psychological scarring the child has sustained as a result of his mother's death at the hands of his father is no doubt substantial. We can conceive of few circumstances in which the termination of parental rights would be more justified. See footnote 9

Where parental rights of a child's father have been terminated because of his conviction of the first degree murder of the child's mother, and other acts of violence to her and threats of violence to the child, permanent guardianship of the child may be given to the West Virginia Department of Human Services. W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [1984].

Accordingly, we commit the child to the permanent guardianship of the West Virginia Department of Human Services pursuant to W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [1984].

Although permanent guardianship is given to the Department of Human Services, we do not believe it would be sound to remove the child from the temporary custody of Nancy R. See footnote 10 The trial court below found Nancy R. fit to properly care for the child, and on the state of the record, we agree with that finding. The evidence adduced at the custody proceeding conclusively established that the appellant had been the child's primary caretaker since his mother's death over two years ago. During that time, strong emotional bonds have undoubtedly formed between the two. Nancy R. has obviously been very protective of the child's welfare. See, e.g., Lemley v. Barr, ---W.Va. ----, ----, 343 S.E.2d 101, 109 (1986); West Virginia Department of Human Services v. La Rea Ann C.L., --- W.Va. ----, ----, 332 S.E.2d 632, 636-37 (1985). We believe that the child's best interests compel a temporary custody award to Nancy R.

For the foregoing reasons, judgment of the Circuit Court of McDowell County is reversed.

Reversed.

Footnote: 1 We adhere to our past practice in styling domestic and juvenile cases which involve sensitive facts and do not utilize the last names of the parties. See State ex rel. West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (W.Va.1987); West Virginia Department of Human Services v. La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W.Va. 330, 332 S.E.2d 632 (1985).

Footnote: 2 This Court also has before it the brief of amicus curiae filed by the Women's Legal Defense Fund.
Initially, we note that counsel for the appellant urges that Randolph W.'s prolonged incarceration constitutes willful abandonment of his child. Because of our holding in this case, we need not address the abandonment issue, which has far-reaching implications for any parent or guardian who may be incarcerated in a penal institution or becomes a patient in a mental institution.

Footnote: 3 In this case, Alesha W. had designated her son as primary beneficiary and Nancy R. as contingent beneficiary of a $30,000 life insurance policy. The record is unclear as to the use of the proceeds of Alesha W.'s life insurance policy. Counsel for the appellant should ensure that these proceeds are used appropriately for the child, the policy's named beneficiary.

Footnote: 4 We note that this custody dispute is unusual in that in actuality it is not between a natural parent and a third party, but rather between two third parties, the maternal aunt, Nancy R., and the child's paternal uncle, Grady W. However, in resolving this issue, we will look to established statutory and case law regarding custody, or loss thereof, by parents.

Footnote: 5 The legislative definition of "child abuse and neglect" includes the intentional infliction by a parent, guardian or custodian of a "substantial mental or emotional injury, upon the child...." W.Va. Code, 49-1-3(a)(1) and 49-1-3(c) [1984].

Footnote: 6 Attached as an exhibit to the petition for appeal is a psychological evaluation regarding the effects of Randolph W.'s excessive drinking. Although this evaluation and corresponding testimony by the clinical psychologist who prepared it are relevant and probative to this case, neither the evaluation nor the expert testimony was admitted into evidence at the custody hearing.
The trial judge had determined that portions of the evaluation and its corresponding testimony were inadmissible pursuant to W.Va.R.Evid. 403. However, the trial court indicated that testimony regarding the appellee's excessive drinking could be admitted into evidence. Nevertheless, when the psychologist who prepared the report was called to testify in that regard, her testimony was excluded from the record.
From our reading of the record, it is unclear why this evidence was excluded. Not having objected on the record regarding this ruling by the trial judge, the appellant failed to preserve this error for appeal. See W.Va.R.Civ.P. 46; Loar v. Massey, 164 W.Va. 155, 159-60, 261 S.E.2d 83, 86-87 (1979); Konchesky v. S.J. Groves & Sons Co., 148 W.Va. 411, 415, 135 S.E.2d 299, 302 (1964); Shackleford v. Catlett, 161 W.Va. 568, 244 S.E.2d 327 (1978). Appellant, in her brief to this Court, now contends that the trial court erred in excluding such probative evidence pursuant to W.Va.R.Evid. 403. However, there is sufficient evidence in the record upon which we can make a determination of Randolph W.'s fitness.

Footnote: 7 The West Virginia Rules of Evidence became effective on February 1, 1985, and were applicable during the hearing on Nancy R.'s petition to modify the court's previous order which was held on November 19, 1985.

Footnote: 8 Other jurisdictions have determined that spousal abuse which results in the murder of a child's parent establishes a prima facie case of parental unfitness. See, e.g., Bramblet v. Cox, 461 S.W.2d 349, 350- 51 (Ky.1970); In re Welfare of Scott, 309 Minn. 458, 461-62, 244 N.W.2d 669, 671-72 (1976); Shoemake v. Davis, 216 So.2d 420, 421-22 (Miss.1968).

Footnote: 9 Because we have terminated the parental rights of Randolph W., we need not address the issue of whether he, as the child's parent, has the absolute right to designate the child's guardian.

Footnote: 10 Nancy R. may seek permanent custody of the child. We note various proceedings to accomplish this, such as the institution of proceedings for subsidized adoption pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-2-17(a) [1978], or adoption pursuant to W.Va.Code, 48-4-7 [1984].

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "This Court reviews the circuit court's final order and ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard. We review challenges to findings of fact under a clearly erroneous standard; conclusions of law are reviewed de novo." Syl. Pt. 4, Burgess v. Porterfield, 196 W.Va. 178, 469 S.E.2d 114 (1996).

2. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

3. "W.Va.Code § 49-2-14(e) (1995) provides for a 'sibling preference' wherein the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources is to place a child who is in the department's custody with the foster or adoptive parent(s) of the child's sibling or siblings, where the foster or adoptive parents seek the care and custody of the child, and the department determines (1) the fitness of the persons seeking to enter into a foster care or adoption arrangement which would unite or reunite the siblings, and (2) placement of the child with his or her siblings is in the best interests of the children. In any proceeding brought by the department to maintain separation of siblings, such separation may be ordered only if the circuit court determines that clear and convincing evidence supports the department's determination. Upon review by the circuit court of the department's determination to unite a child with his or her siblings, such determination shall be disregarded only where the circuit court finds, by clear and convincing evidence, that the persons with whom the department seeks to place the child are unfit or that placement of the child with his or her siblings is not in the best interests of one or all of the children." Syl. Pt. 4, In re Carol B., 209 W.Va. 658, 550 S.E.2d 636 (2001).

4. West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a) provides for grandparent preference in determining adoptive placement for a child where parental rights have been terminated and also incorporates a best interests analysis within that determination by including the requirement that the DHHR find that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents prior to granting custody to the grandparents. The statute contemplates that placement with grandparents is presumptively in the best interests of the child, and the preference for grandparent placement may be overcome only where the record reviewed in its entirety establishes that such placement is not in the best interests of the child.

5. By specifying in West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) that the home study must show that the grandparents "would be suitable adoptive parents," the Legislature has implicitly included the requirement for an analysis by the Department of Health and Human Resources and circuit courts of the best interests of the child, given all circumstances of the case.

6. "It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives." Syl. Pt. 3, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991).

Albright, Chief Justice:

This is an appeal by Napoleon and Linda S. (hereinafter "Appellants")[1] from an order of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County affirming a decision of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources Board of Review (hereinafter "DHHR") determining that the Appellants could not become the adoptive parents of their grandson, Tyler S. The Appellants contend that the lower court erred in failing to apply a statutory and DHHR policy preference for grandparent adoption. Based upon a thorough review of the record, briefs, and applicable precedent, this Court finds that the lower court abused its discretion in affirming the DHHR decision refusing to permit the Appellants to adopt Tyler S. We therefore reverse and remand for entry of an order requiring that Tyler be placed with the Appellants for adoption, with the additional conditions specified below.

I. Factual and Procedural History

On December 27, 2000, at the age of two months,[2] Tyler S. suffered a spiral fracture of the left femur and over twenty bruises on his body. He was placed in foster care on January 1, 2001, upon discharge from the hospital, due to the serious injuries which were later determined to have been inflicted upon him by his biological parents, Ryan and Nicole

[2]Tyler was born on October 23, 2000. He is currently four years of age.

S. In April 2001, the parental rights of the biological parents were terminated by the Circuit Court of Harrison County based upon this abuse. The Circuit Court of Harrison County found that Ryan S. had inflicted the spiral fracture to Tyler's left femur due to Ryan's frustration with Tyler while trying to give Tyler a bath. At the time of termination of parental rights, the CASA representative, Ms. Jeanne Pote, recommended that Tyler be placed for adoption with the Appellants, parents of Ryan S. and paternal grandparents of Tyler.[3] The Circuit Court of Harrison County did not address Ms. Pote's recommendation in the termination order.

Prior to the termination of parental rights, the Appellants had notified the DHHR of their desire to adopt Tyler. A social assessment and home study of the Appellants' home in Florida was completed on May 16, 2001, by the Florida Department of Children and Families. The home study concluded that the Appellants could provide a safe and loving home, despite their difficulty accepting the fact that their son would have intentionally harmed Tyler.[4] The Florida home study determined that such opinions would not interfere with the Appellants' ability to provide proper care and protection to Tyler.

[3]In her report, Ms. Pote noted that the Appellants had been "very supportive" and had "made numerous trips" to visit Tyler. Somewhat ironically, Ms. Pote later changed her opinion and became convinced through her involvement with the adoption review committee that the Appellants were not an appropriate placement for Tyler.

The adoption review committee thereafter requested psychological evaluations of the Appellants. These evaluations were conducted on January 21, 2002, by Dr. William Fremouw, a licensed psychologist. His report was favorable toward both Appellants and included observations that they would protect their grandson and would not allow Tyler to be alone with his biological father, Ryan. Specifically, Dr. Fremouw concluded that "[w]hile she [Appellant Linda S.] does not believe that her son physically abused her grandson, she is willing to accept the requirement that he have no direct contact with Tyler if she were to adopt him." The report also indicated that Ryan lives approximately 1,000 miles from his parents and would not be expected to be a frequent visitor.

By letter dated February 25, 2002, the Appellants were notified by the DHHR that they had not been selected for the permanent placement of Tyler. The adoption review committee had determined that the best interests of Tyler would not be served by placing

[4]The home study report explained as follows regarding the Appellants:

> [They] report that they love their own son very much and will not turn their back on him, but are very serious about protecting Tyler and would never let anything happen to him. They report that they do not believe that their son would intentionally hurt Tyler, but that they would abide by any court orders that they need to.

him with the Appellants since the Appellants had failed to acknowledge their son's involvement in inflicting injuries upon Tyler. The guardian ad litem, Ms. Meredith McCarthy, stated the her main concern was Tyler's protection and that the Appellants had continually refused to accept the fact that their son inflicted Tyler's injuries.

The Appellants requested a review of the decision of the DHHR, and an initial grievance hearing was held on July 10, 2002. The original decision was upheld, and the Appellants appealed to the Board of Review of the DHHR. On August 30, 2002, the Chairman of the Board of Review notified the Appellants that their appeal had been denied.

The Appellants appealed to the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, and a hearing was held on November 15, 2002. On February 9, 2004, the lower court entered an order affirming the DHHR decision. The lower court observed that "[b]ecause of the rulings made by the Circuit Court of Harrison County during the pendency of the abuse and neglect hearings, and further because of the distance they must travel from their home in Florida to West Virginia, the [Appellants] have had very little physical contact or opportunity to bond with Tyler since his birth." The Circuit Court of Kanawha County addressed the Appellants' allegations that the grandparent preference had not been properly applied but ultimately found that the DHHR and adoption review committee had not erred in finding that the best interests of the child would not be served by placing him with the Appellants. The court noted that "[t]his decision was based upon significant concerns that Petitioners could not ensure the safety of the child and the lack of a bond between Petitioners and their grandson." The Appellants appealed to this Court.

The Appellants' affidavits stated that the Appellants were aware that their son, Ryan, "admitted to the Circuit Court of Harrison County at the underlying abuse and neglect hearing that he was responsible for the injury or injuries caused to his son Tyler and that this admission was made under oath." The Appellants also stated: "That I accept our son's admission of responsibility for all of Tyler's injury or injuries." The Appellants each further explain:

> That in the event my spouse and I are given the opportunity to adopt and do adopt our grandson, Tyler, I would, under no circumstances whatsoever, allow any contact, direct or indirect, between Ryan and our adopted son, Tyler. Further, I would make certain that our son Ryan was aware that I would permit no contact.

With regard to any attempts by Ryan to contact Tyler, the Appellants both assert as follows:

> That in the event, that our son Ryan would approach us when Tyler was with either one of us at or outside our home, or if he would contact or attempt to contact Tyler when he was at school or some other activity when I was not present, that I would immediately contact law enforcement authorities and advise them of the situation and request whatever action that would be necessary to protect Tyler and keep Ryan away from him. Further, I would apply to the court for an injunction or protective order to be served against Ryan and do everything in my power to see that the injunction or protective order was fully enforced.

II. Standard of Review

"This Court reviews the circuit court's final order and ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard. We review challenges to findings of fact under a clearly erroneous standard; conclusions of law are reviewed de novo." Syl. Pt. 4, Burgess v. Porterfield, 196 W.Va. 178, 469 S.E.2d 114 (1996).

III. Discussion

The guidance for consideration of this matter is primarily provided by statute and a DHHR policy reflecting the intent of the statute. West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004) provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> (a)(1) Whenever a child welfare agency licensed to place children for adoption or the department of health and human resources has been given the permanent legal and physical custody of any child and the rights of the mother and the rights of the legal, determined, putative, outside or unknown father of the child have been terminated by order of a court of competent jurisdiction or by a legally executed relinquishment of parental rights, the child welfare agency or the department may consent to the adoption of the child pursuant to the provisions of article twenty-two [§§ 48-22-101 et seq.], chapter forty-eight of this code.
> (2) Relinquishment for an adoption to an agency or to the department is required of the same persons whose consent or relinquishment is required under the provisions of section three hundred one [§ 48-22-301], article twenty-two, chapter forty-eight of this code. The form of any relinquishment so required shall conform as nearly as practicable to the > requirements established in section three hundred three [§ 48-22-303], article twenty-two, chapter forty-eight, and all other provisions of that article providing for relinquishment for adoption shall govern the proceedings herein.

> (3) For purposes of any placement of a child for adoption by the department, the department shall first consider the suitability and willingness of any known grandparent or grandparents to adopt the child. Once any such grandparents who are interested in adopting the child have been identified, the department shall conduct a home study evaluation, including home visits and individual interviews by a licensed social worker. If the department determines, based on the home study evaluation, that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents, it shall assure that the grandparents are offered the placement of the child prior to the consideration of any other prospective adoptive parents.

W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a) (emphasis supplied).

The Adoption Services Manual utilized by the DHHR mirrors the design of that statute, providing as follows in pertinent part of Section 15510A: "If the home study indicates that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents then they must be offered the placement of the child prior to the consideration of any other prospective adoptive parents."

A. Best Interests Analysis

A fundamental mandate, recognized consistently by this Court, is that the ultimate determination of child placement must be premised upon an analysis of the best interests of the child. As this Court has repeatedly stated, "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996). "[T]he best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children." Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W.Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) (citation omitted).

West Virginia Code § 49-1-1(b) (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2004) also addresses this best interests requirement, providing in pertinent part as follows:

> In pursuit of these goals it is the intention of the Legislature to provide for removing the child from the custody of his or her parents only when the child's welfare or the safety and protection of the public cannot be adequately safeguarded without removal; and, when the child has to be removed from his or her family, to secure for the child custody, care and discipline consistent with the child's best interests and other goals herein set out. It is further the intention of the Legislature to require that any reunification, permanency or preplacement preventative services address the safety of the child.

This Court examined that statute in State v. Michael M., 202 W.Va. 350, 504 S.E.2d 177 (1998), and explained as follows:

> In order to effectuate the legislative intent expressed in W.Va.Code § 49-1-1(a) [1997], a circuit court must endeavor to secure for a child who has been removed from his or her family a permanent placement with the level of custody, care, commitment, nurturing and discipline that is consistent with the child's best interests.

202 W.Va. at 358, 504 S.E.2d at 185.

This Court has not had the opportunity to address the interplay between the statute affording grandparents a preference for the placement of a child such as Tyler and the overriding standard of the best interests of the child. In In re Carol B., 209 W. Va. 658, 550 S.E.2d 636 (2001), however, this Court encountered a similar issue regrading sibling placement. In that case, this Court specified that the best interests analysis is to be addressed in conjunction with the statutory preference for placement of a child with his or her siblings. This Court explained as follows at syllabus point four of Carol B.:

> W.Va.Code § 49-2-14(e) (1995) provides for a "sibling preference" wherein the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources is to place a child who is in the department's custody with the foster or adoptive parent(s) of the child's sibling or siblings, where the foster or adoptive parents seek the care and custody of the child, and the department determines (1) the fitness of the persons seeking to enter into a foster care or adoption arrangement which would unite or reunite the siblings, and (2) placement of the child with his or her siblings is in the best interests of the children. In any proceeding brought by the department to maintain separation of siblings, such separation may be ordered only if the circuit court determines that clear and convincing evidence supports the department's determination. Upon review by the circuit court of the department's determination to unite a child with his or her siblings, such determination shall be disregarded only where the circuit court finds, by clear and convincing evidence, that the persons with whom the department seeks to place the child are unfit or that placement of the child with his or her siblings is not in the best interests of one or all of the children.

We also explained in Carol B. that "[w]e believe that both sibling preference and best interests of the child considerations are incorporated in W.Va.Code § 49-2-14(e). In order to determine how these considerations interact, we look to the clear provisions of the statute." 209 W.Va. at 665, 550 S.E.2d at 643. In Carol B., this Court found that the statute at issue therein provided guidance, and this Court concluded as follows:

> [B]ecause the statute provides that the circuit court is not to order separation, when recommended by the DHHR, in the absence of clear and convincing evidence supporting the DHHR's determination, we believe that it follows that the circuit court is not to disregard the DHHR's recommendation that siblings should be united, unless it finds that clear and convincing evidence indicates to the contrary.

209 W. Va. at 665-66, 550 S.E.2d at 643-44.

Other jurisdictions have struggled with the manner in which relative preference should be implemented in conjunction with the best interests of the child analysis. Under the Minnesota framework for this type of examination, the preference for placement with relatives may be overcome only where the best interests of the child will be jeopardized by placement with relatives. Findings regarding the best interests of the child may support a decision to place the children with the unrelated individuals "if those findings establish either the detriment or good cause necessary to defeat the relative preference." In re Adoption of C.H., 548 N.W.2d 292, 298 (Minn. App. 1996). Thus, the preference typically mandates that adoptive placement with relatives is presumptively in a child's best interests, absent a showing of detriment to the child or other good cause to the contrary. In re Welfare of D.L., 486 N.W.2d 375, 380 (Minn.1992), cert. denied, Sharp v. Hennepin County Bureau of Social Services, 506 U.S. 1000. Courts have been swift to emphasize that the existence of a preference does not translate into a perfunctory grant of custody. In Welfare of D.L., for instance, the Supreme Court of Minnesota explained:

> Our holding does not mean that relatives' adoption petitions must be granted automatically. The terms "best interests," "good cause to the contrary" and "detriment" do not lend themselves to standardized definitions. The best interests of potential adoptees will vary from case to case, and the trial court retains broad discretion because of its opportunity to observe the parties and hear the witnesses.

Id. (citation omitted).

In the present case, the governing statute, West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a), provides guidance on the standard to be employed regarding grandparent preference. As quoted above, the statute provides that the DHHR "shall" offer placement to the grandparents "[i]f the department determines, based on the home study evaluation, that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents." W. Va. Code § 49-3-1(a)(3). Thus, in the view of this Court, West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a) provides for grandparent preference in determining adoptive placement for a child where parental rights have been terminated and also incorporates a best interests analysis within that determination by including the requirement that the DHHR find that the grandparents would be suitable adoptive parents prior to granting custody to the grandparents. The statute contemplates that placement with grandparents is presumptively in the best interests of the child, and the preference for grandparent placement may be overcome only where the record reviewed in its entirety establishes that such placement is not in the best interests of the child. By specifying in West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a)(3) that the home study must show that the grandparents "would be suitable adoptive parents," the Legislature has implicitly included the requirement for an analysis by the DHHR and circuit courts of the best interests of the child, given all circumstances of the case.

B. Significance of Statutory Grandparent Preference

The concept of placement with relatives, where appropriate, has long been included in the jurisprudence of this and other states. The Legislature of this state has clearly expressed a preference for placement with grandparents, and the policies of the DHHR properly reflect that intention.

In this Court's evaluation of the matter presently before us, we note that the DHHR initially discouraged permanency planning focused upon grandparent placement due to the perceived potential for family reunification. When such reunification became impossible, however, the DHHR provided only limited assistance to the grandparents, either maternal or paternal, in developing a plan for adoption of Tyler. Moreover, despite a positive home study and a favorable psychological evaluation, the adoption review committee chose to place Tyler with his foster parents rather than his paternal grandparents, the Appellants. While several participants in the review committee indicated that they had not been convinced, through the home study and psychological report, that the Appellants would adequately protect Tyler, the committee failed to request additional information or evaluation regarding those areas of concern. The members asserted only their trepidation concerning the Appellants' willingness to prevent Tyler from being exclusively in the presence of his father, Ryan. Thus, while perceived deficiencies in the home study and psychological evaluations were claimed, the committee failed to address those issues or attempt, in any meaningful manner, to rectify them. The grandparent preference articulated in West Virginia Code § 49-3-1(a) must be recognized as essential guidance in the determination of child placement. The DHHR failed to observe the directives of that preference or apply it in an appropriate manner in this case.[5]

[5]According to a July 31, 2002, letter written by Thomas Arnett, State Hearing Officer for the DHHR, the guardian ad litem, Ms. McCarthy, had explained during the grievance hearing that protection of Tyler was her primary concern in not selecting the Appellants to be Tyler's adoptive parents. She had apparently not personally interviewed the Appellants. This Court emphasized the need for guardians ad litem to conduct a "full and independent investigation" in syllabus point five of In Re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), explaining as follows:

> Each child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel. To further that goal, W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992] mandates that a child has a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of abuse and neglect proceedings. Furthermore, Rule XIII of the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court. Rules 1.1 and 1.3 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, respectively, require an attorney to provide competent representation to a

While this Court appreciates the heightened level of scrutiny employed by the committee in this case of extreme abuse and tender age, the evidence furnished concerning the Appellants, through the home study and psychological examinations, does not appear to provide a rational basis for the expressed fears of the committee. The Appellants specifically articulated their earnest commitment to the protection of their grandson Tyler. This was communicated not only by the Appellants themselves but was also the expressed view of the psychologist who interviewed and evaluated the Appellants, with specific emphasis upon the need for protection of young Tyler. In his evaluation of Appellant Mrs. Linda S., Dr. Fremouw found that she was emotionally stable and would follow the directives of the court regarding the limitations of contact between Tyler and his biological father. Additionally, Dr. Fremouw found that Appellant Mr. Napoleon S. "was clear that if he had custody of Tyler, Ryan would not be allowed to be alone with him." Dr. Fremouw concluded, "Overall, client, and to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client. The Guidelines for Guardians Ad Litem in Abuse and Neglect cases, which are adopted in this opinion and attached as Appendix A, are in harmony with the applicable provisions of the West Virginia Code, the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record, and the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, and provide attorneys who serve as guardians ad litem with direction as to their duties in representing the best interests of the children for whom they are appointed.

Elaborating upon the Jeffrey requirements in Carol B., this Court specified that "A full and independent investigation includes interviewing all prospective parents when a child's placement is at issue." 209 W.Va. at 668 n. 6, 550 S.E.2d at 646 n. 6.

Mr. [S.] appears clear and committed to not let Ryan have direct contact with Tyler without supervision." Further, Dr. Fremouw found that Mr. S. was "aware of the requirement that Ryan have no contact with Tyler and would enforce that." Both Appellants were also evaluated through the use of MMPI testing,[6] indicating that the Appellants were not distorting their responses to minimize or maximize problems.

While the lower tribunals did not have the benefit of the specific statements made by the Appellants in the affidavits submitted in this Court, such affidavits, as quoted above, support the ultimate conclusion that Tyler's best interests will be served and that he will be competently protected by placement with the Appellants.

C. Tyler's Bonding With Grandparents

In the underlying abuse and neglect case, the Circuit Court of Harrison County granted intervener status to both maternal and paternal grandparents on November 14, 2001. According to the record, all grandparents exercised visitation privileges with Tyler until the Circuit Court of Harrison County terminated visitation between the grandparents and Tyler on May 31, 2002. The record reflects that the absence or limitation of bonding was asserted as one factor relevant in the determination that Tyler should not be placed with the [6]MMPI is an acronym for Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory. It is a frequently utlized clinical testing mechanism typically employed to provide personality information and to assess psychological adjustment factors.

Appellants. It is unreasonable to contend that the absence of bonding should be a legitimate basis for denying the grandparents an opportunity to adopt when the court system itself eliminated any potential for bonding when it terminated visitation rights on May 31, 2002, months prior to the first grievance hearing and almost two years prior to the lower court order from which the Appellants now appeal. Given Tyler's young age, we believe that it is likely that he will bond easily with his grandparents in a relatively short period of time.

IV. Conclusion

Based upon this Court's analysis of this case, we find that the lower court abused its discretion in affirming the conclusion of the review committee and DHHR and erred in failing to permit the Appellants to adopt Tyler S. We consequently remand for the entry of an order requiring that Tyler be placed with the Appellants for adoption. We further direct the lower court to fashion an order which explicitly prohibits contact between Tyler and Ryan, in accord with the representations of the Appellants in their affidavits filed with this Court.

We further find that a gradual transition period for Tyler would be preferable to an immediate custody change. We have previously encouraged such gradual changes in the custody of children. For example, in Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989), a gradual, six-month transition of custody was approved. 182 W.Va. at 450, 388 S.E.2d at 324. Similarly, in James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), this Court required the circuit court to establish a plan for a gradual shift of custody. In syllabus point three of James M., this Court held as follows:

> It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives.

Thus, upon remand in this case, the lower court should craft a plan for the gradual transition of custody of Tyler. Given the Appellants' intention to reside permanently in Florida, we believe that the transition period should be as short as is practicable, but long enough to assuage reasonable concerns that would arise from an abrupt change of custody and permit the restarting of the bonding process with the Appellants. We respectfully suggest that Appellants should take up temporary residence here in West Virginia during the transition period.

Reversed and Remanded with Directions.

Starcher, J., concurring:

I concur with the majority opinion in this case and write separately only to emphasize that four of the five members of this Court, based upon the entire record, have determined that adoptive placement with Tyler's paternal grandparents is in Tyler's best interests. The single dissenter has questioned the credibility of the grandparents with regard to their willingness to protect Tyler from his biological father. A comprehensive review of the record, however, discloses the grandparents' uncompromising commitment to Tyler and his safety. It is evident that the grandparents have maintained a vigorous effort to adopt Tyler and have repeatedly asserted their dedication to his security and well-being. While these individuals may have initially found it extremely difficult to accept the well-documented fact that their son committed a heinous act of child abuse upon Tyler, their commitment to Tyler's safety has been unfaltering, and they have consistently maintained that they will adhere to the requirements of any order regarding contact between their son and Tyler. The majority opinion firmly states that the lower court is directed to fashion an order which explicitly prohibits contact between Tyler and his biological father.

The single dissenter also suggests that reliance upon the post-argument affidavits was inappropriate. While the acceptance of such affidavits is a practice rarely employed by this Court, we have permitted post-argument affidavits in exceptional circumstances. In this case, the potential for grandparent adoption had not been favored by the DHHR, and questions had been raised regarding the willingness of the grandparents to permit contact between their son and Tyler. Because this was a pivotal and dispositive issue in this case, affidavits regarding the grandparents' intent provided additional explanation of assistance to this Court in ascertaining the resolution which most effectively promoted Tyler's best interests. The affidavits, in fact, only reiterated the commitments the grandparents had previously articulated.

As the majority opinion noted, for instance, the home study report contained in the record explained that the grandparents are "very serious about protecting Tyler and would never let anything happen to him." Further, the home study stated that the grandparents "would abide by any court orders that they need to." Additionally, the underlying record revealed, as the majority noted, that psychological evaluations indicated that the grandparents were willing to accept the requirement that Tyler could have no contact with his biological father.

Thus, while the affidavits provided further explanation of the grandparents' intent, the position asserted by the grandparents in the affidavits with regard to the protection of Tyler was not inconsistent with the position previously asserted and fully evidenced in the record.

Child placement and custody decisions, particularly subsequent to an appalling instance of child abuse, are fraught with emotional complication and are particularly frustrating because there are no certainties or guarantees. Tyler has experienced a very difficult start to life. By placing him with loving, committed grandparents, intent on protecting him from further harm, we have attempted to insure that Tyler's future will be bright. To that end, I concur with the majority opinion.

Maynard, Justice, dissenting:

By reversing the decisions of the adoption review committee, the DHHR hearing officer, and the Circuit Court of Kanawha County, and by requiring that Tyler be placed with his paternal grandparents for adoption, the majority has unintentionally disregarded Tyler's best interests by placing him back in dangerous and life-threatening circumstances.

Two-month-old Tyler was viciously beaten and injured by his biological father, Ryan S. Specifically, Tyler suffered a broken leg (spiral fracture of the left femur) and more than twenty bruises on his body. At two months of age! It was found by the Circuit Court of Harrison County that Ryan S. inflicted the spiral fracture to Tyler's left femur after becoming frustrated with Tyler while attempting to give him a bath. Ryan and Nicole S.'s parental rights were rightly terminated because all would agree that Tyler's future safety depends upon his having absolutely no contact with Ryan S.

Yet, the majority now places Tyler back into a situation where he again could easily have contact with his abuser. I truly believe that this child is in harm's way and his personal safety is at great risk. The record is crystal clear that Appellants simply do not believe that their son, Ryan S., injured Tyler. This is indicated by the findings of both the Florida home study and Dr. Fremouw. For this very reason, the adoption review committee, made up of DHHR officials, Tyler's guardian ad litem, and a CASA representative, concluded that it was not in Tyler's best interests to be adopted by Appellants because Appellants could not ensure Tyler a safe home.

Also troublesome is the fact that the majority's decision is based, at least in part, on affidavits submitted by Appellants to this Court on appeal. Astonishingly, the affidavits were filed after oral argument in this case and after being solicited by one or more Justices of this Court. To solicit the affidavits during oral argument; to permit them to be filed post-argument without any stipulation from the opposing party[1] (talk about trial by ambush!); to consider them; and to rely on them in deciding this case is a fugitive procedure

> [T]he law is clear in West Virginia that an appellate exhibit has no evidentiary value on appeal unless it was introduced in the circuit court or it is subject to judicial notice under Rule 201 of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence. Our rule remains steadfast that the record may not be enhanced or broadened on appeal except by the methods discussed or by the stipulation of the parties. See O'Neal v. Peake Operating Co., 185 W.Va. 28, 404 S.E.2d 420 (1991) (this Court may only consider matters appearing in the trial record).

unknown to our law, one that outrageously violates our rules of evidence and appellate procedure, and one that is grossly unfair to the losing litigants. This is third-world justice and no other Supreme Court in the United States would allow such a brutally unjust procedure. However, even if these affidavits were properly submitted, it is clear to me, and it should be clear to the majority, that they have absolutely no evidentiary value.

Appellants' sudden change in thinking is too little too late. Below, Appellants were always consistent and adamant in their conviction that their son could not have intentionally injured Tyler. This firm conviction softened only after Appellants lost before the hearing examiner and the circuit court whose decisions were based, in part, on Appellant's refusal to accept their son's actions. Further, their change in thinking can only be described as lukewarm. They now "accept our son's admission of responsibility for all of Tyler's injury or injuries." Notably, they do not accept that their son is responsible for Tyler's injuries, but only that he has admitted that he is responsible. It does not take a genius to see what is going on here. Appellants simply are saying what they think this Court wants to hear in order to get what they want.

In light of the fact that Appellants do not really accept the fact that their son viciously injured their two-month-old grandson, once Appellants adopt Tyler, what possible reason do they have for keeping their son away from Tyler? Without a doubt, due to the majority opinion, Tyler will have continued contact with Ryan S., the man who fractured his left femur and battered his body with bruises merely because Tyler was a little too rambunctious in the bathtub.

It is simply reckless to accept Appellants' affidavits at face value. By placing Tyler in a position where he can easily and will likely come into contact with his abuser, the majority has unintentionally placed Tyler in a dangerous situation and ignored his best interests. Infants and children who have been physically abused, had bones broken and are bruised all over should never be placed in a home where there is any reasonable chance that the same abuser will have another opportunity to beat and maim them.

Finally, in light of my grave fear of the imminent danger and grievous bodily harm or death of this child, and because the West Virginia DHHR cannot monitor this child's welfare in Florida, I intend to send a copy of this dissenting opinion to the West Virginia DHHR and have it serve as a formal request that it contact the analogous Florida agency and request and encourage that agency to open a case file on Tyler. Hopefully the Florida agency will monitor the home to ensure that Tyler has absolutely no contact with his abuser. I realize that this is extremely unusual, but I believe that the circumstances demand it.

For the reasons set forth above, I dissent.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon the father Paul B's (hereinafter referred to as Appellant) appeal of a final dispositional order in the Circuit Court of Preston County entered May 15, 2009, which terminated the custodial rights of Paul B. to Nelson B.[1] and placed the child in the custody of the child's maternal aunt and uncle. In this appeal the appellant claims that the circuit court failed to consider a less drastic placement for the child and that it should have returned the child to his custody under supervision of the Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter referred to as the "Department".)

The Court has before it the petition for appeal, the designated record and the briefs of counsel. For the reasons set forth below, the circuit court's order is affirmed.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Nelson B. is the child of the appellant Paul B. and his deceased wife, Donna B. Nelson B. was born on August 17, 2002, and was five years of age at the time of the filing of the original abuse and neglect proceeding on May 30, 2008. The petition alleged that Nelson B. was subjected to emotional, psychological and/or physical abuse and neglect by Paul B. and was at risk of imminent danger if left in the home of his father. Specifically, the petition alleged that Paul B. had a chronic history of mental illness and alcohol abuse and had required hospitalization in the past for treatment of these conditions. The petition alleged that Paul B.'s mental illness regularly reached levels where he was not competent to direct his own actions or correctly perceive reality, placing the child at risk.

The petition detailed an incident on May 21, 2008, when Paul B. contacted emergency officials stating that his home had been broken into by a man with a knife. The minor child, Nelson B., was living with his father in this home. Paul B. advised the emergency personnel that the knife-wielding individual was threatening him. Preston County Sheriff's Department deputies responded to the call and soon discerned that Paul B. had been hallucinating and that there was no man threatening Paul B. or his family with a weapon. The Sheriff's personnel contacted the Department to take emergency custody of the child. Mental hygiene proceedings were instituted against Paul B., who in turn was admitted to a local psychiatric facility for treatment of his condition.

Because of the appellant's mental condition, both an attorney and a guardian ad litem were appointed for him. The child was likewise appointed a guardian ad litem. The Department was represented by the Preston County Prosecuting Attorney. A CASA[2] representative was likewise involved in this proceeding from its beginning.

At the preliminary hearing, the circuit found that the Department had demonstrated that the circumstances alleged in the petition amounted to imminent danger for the Nelson B. and that there was no reasonable, available or less drastic alternative to removing Nelson B. from the home of his father that would ensure the child's safety. The child was ordered into the legal and physical custody of the Department. Supervised visitation between the father and the child was authorized.

On June 17, 2008, the Department and Paul B. entered into a written stipulation regarding the adjudication of this matter. The circuit court found that Paul B. entered into the stipulated adjudication with the presence of his counsel and his guardian ad litem. Paul B. stipulated and agreed that "he has a chronic history of mental illness and has required hospitalization for these issues in the past. Further, that the Department has provided services to the Respondent Father in the past." The agreed stipulation contained a paragraph indicating that the allegations in the original petition regarding his hallucinations about a gun-carrying intruder were true, and that all of this conduct constituted neglect of the child, Nelson B. The parties agreed that it was contrary to the child's best interests to be placed in the home of Paul B.

The CASA's primary role is "to further the best interests of the child until further order of the court or until permanent placement of the child is achieved."

As part of the stipulation, Paul B. moved for, and was granted, a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period pursuant to West Virginia Code §49-6-12(b) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2009)[3]

[3]West Virginia Code §49-6-12(b) states:

> After finding that a child is an abused or neglected child pursuant to section two of this article, a court may grant a respondent an improvement period of a period not to exceed six months when:
> > (1) The respondent files a written motion requesting the improvement period;
> > (2) The respondent demonstrates, by clear and convincing evidence, that the respondent is likely to fully participate in the improvement period and the court further makes a finding, on the record, of the terms of the improvement period;
> > (3) In the order granting the improvement period, the court (A) orders that a hearing be held to review the matter within sixty days of the granting of the improvement period, or (B) orders that a hearing be held to review the matter within ninety days of the granting of the improvement period and that the department submit a report as to the respondent's progress in the improvement period within sixty days of the order granting the improvement period;
> > (4) Since the initiation of the proceeding, the respondent has not previously been granted any improvement period or the respondent demonstrates that since the initial improvement period, the respondent has experienced a substantial change in circumstances. Further, the respondent shall demonstrate that due to that change in circumstances the respondent is likely to fully participate in a further improvement period; and

As part of this post-adjudicatory improvement period and pursuant to the Family Case Plan specifically developed for this family, Paul B. was required to continue all services at Valley Mental Health Services; participate in weekly supervised visits with Nelson B., and make daily telephone calls to the child; participate in individual counseling, if deemed necessary; cooperate with in-home services; take all medications; and cooperate with the multi-disciplinary team.

The course of Paul B.'s improvement period was regularly monitored by the circuit court, the multi-disciplinary team, the Department, the CASA representative, Paul B's counsel and guardian ad litem, as well as the child's guardian ad litem. Because of a waiting list, Paul B.'s individual counseling did not commence at the start of the improvement period. Furthermore, Paul B. continued to experience periods where he sought inpatient treatment for his mental health issues. As a result of these hospitalizations, Paul B. missed visitations with the child.

> (5) The order granting the improvement period requires the department to prepare and submit to the court an individualized family case plan in accordance with the provisions of section three, article six-d of this chapter.

Part of Paul B.'s Family Case Plan focused on the need for regular employment and a steady income, as the family's sole source of income was Social Security survivor benefits occasioned from the death of Nelson B.'s mother. At times during the improvement period, Paul B. indicated his intention to seek Social Security Disability benefits in his own name. Caseworkers continued to suggest that Paul B. seek employment with a sheltered workshop. Paul B. did not follow through with these suggestions.

In its dispositional order entered on May 15, 2009, and based upon a hearing held February 19, 2009, the circuit court concluded that despite the best efforts of Paul B. and the Department, Paul B. was presently unable to adequately care for Nelson B.'s needs. The circuit court further concluded that it was not in the best interest of the child for Paul B.'s parental rights to be terminated, but that a permanent placement of Nelson B. was possible by way of a legal guardianship with the maternal aunt and uncle. Continued contact and visitation between Nelson B. and Paul B. was specifically authorized. The court's order clearly left the matter of modification open, by stating as follows:

> The Court is not terminating parental rights, and is further issuing this Order without prejudice so as to permit the Respondent Paul B. to later file a petition with this Court seeking return of custody of Nelson B. if the circumstances are appropriate for the same.

The final order further contemplated increased visitation and a greater role for Paul B. in Nelson B.'s life by ordering that:

> "[A]s the child gets older, the parties should attempt to increase the contact between the child and Respondent Paul B., and shall permit unsupervised visitation when the same becomes safe and appropriate given the child's age and mental health status of Paul B."

The lower court reviewed the permanency placement of Nelson B. on May 15, 2009. By separate order entered June 4, 2009, the circuit court ordered that Nelson B. remain in the legal and physical custody of the Department for continued placement with his maternal aunt and uncle. The order references the pemanency plan of legal guardianship with the child's maternal aunt and uncle but this order does not appear to establish the guardianship. A careful review of the appellate record indicates that on May 12, 2009, a petition for legal guardianship was filed by the maternal aunt and uncle, but no final action has been taken on that petition.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

As set forth above, Paul B. appeals the ruling affecting his parental rights to Nelson B., placing the child with his maternal aunt and uncle and continuing regular visitation with the child. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

With these standards in mind, we now consider the arguments of the parties.

III.

DISCUSSION

We begin our analysis with the understanding that our law strongly favors the rights of the parent to raise his or her children.

> " ' "A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment, or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has permanently transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody > of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts."

Syllabus, State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W. Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d [798] (1969)' ' Syl. pt. 2, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W. Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975)." Syl. Pt. 1, Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W. Va. 710, 356 S.E.2d 464 (1987).

> We have previously held:
>
> "As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W. Va.Code, 49-6-5 (1977) will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements."

Syl. pt. 1, In re R. J. M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

We have likewise held that in some instances, there is no other remedy short of termination of parental rights when there is no reasonable likelihood that the parenting deficiencies or abuse cannot be substantially corrected.

> "Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 (1977) may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood > under W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) (1977) that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected."

Syl. pt. 2, In re R. J. M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

West Virginia Code §49-6-5(a) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2009) addresses situations similar to the one faced by the court below in the case sub judice by creating a list of possible dispositions, in order of precedence. The potential dispositions include the following: dismissal of the petition; refererral of the child and family to community agencies for needed assistance; as well as return of the child to his or her own home under the supervision of the Department. When, however, it is determined that the conditions that gave rise to the removal of the child from the home cannot be remedied, West Virginia Code §49-6-5(a)(6) (2009) states:

> Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future and, when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental, custodial and guardianship rights and responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed child welfare agency. The court may award sole custody of the child to a non-abusing battered parent. If the court shall so find, then in fixing its dispositional order the court shall consider the following factors: (A) The child's need for continuity of care and caretakers; (B) the amount of time required for the child to be integrated into a stable and > permanent home environment; and (C) other factors as the court considers necessary and proper. Notwithstanding any other provision of this article, the court shall give consideration to the wishes of a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court regarding the permanent termination of parental rights. No adoption of a child shall take place until all proceedings for termination of parental rights under this article and appeals thereof are final. In determining whether or not parental rights should be terminated, the court shall consider the efforts made by the department to provide remedial and reunification services to the parent. The court order shall state: (i) That continuation in the home is not in the best interest of the child and why; (ii) why reunification is not in the best interests of the child; (iii) whether or not the department made reasonable efforts, with the child's health and safety being the paramount concern, to preserve the family, or some portion thereof, and to prevent the placement or to eliminate the need for removing the child from the child's home and to make it possible for the child to safely return home, or that the emergency situation made such efforts unreasonable or impossible; and (iv) whether or not the department made reasonable efforts to preserve and reunify the family, or some portion thereof, including a description of what efforts were made or that such efforts were unreasonable due to specific circumstances.

Further, W. Va. Code §49-6-5(b)(6) provides a definition for the phrase "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." The applicable code section states:

> (b) As used in this section, "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" shall mean that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect on their own > or with help. Such conditions shall be considered to exist in the following circumstances, which shall not be exclusive:

> . . .
>
> > (6) The abusing parent or parents have incurred emotional illness, mental illness or mental deficiency of such duration or nature as to render such parent or parents incapable of exercising proper parenting skills or sufficiently improving the adequacy of such skills

After applying the statutory language to the facts that faced the circuit court, we find that the Department exercised reasonable efforts to reunify Nelson B. with his father. Through a tailored improvement period and with the collaborative effort of many entities, the Department attempted to give Paul B. the ability to be a fit and proper parent to his young son. The course of his mental illness, however, was such that Paul B. continued through the improvement period, to suffer periods of time where he was unable to adequately provide for his young son's needs. In his appeal to this Court, Paul B. encourages us to continue to speculate as to whether he will ever be able to make a home for his child. This case is especially difficult because it is clear that Paul B. loves his son, that the child is bonded to his father and that Paul B. undertook tremendous steps and made some gains during the course of his improvement period. However, despite these efforts by Paul B., as well as the efforts of the Department to reunify this family, Paul B.'s mental illness is such that it appears impossible to safely return Nelson B. to the care of his father. During the course of this improvement period and indeed prior to the filing of the petition that led to this appeal, the Department sought to assist Paul B. with intensive, in-home parent education and other services. Despite these services, and Paul B.'s hard work to become a safe and suitable parent for his child, Paul B. could not provide a stable home, a stable income or stable transportation. He continued to suffer from the manifestations of a severe and chronic mental illness that from time-to-time required hospitalization. When these events occur, the health, safety and welfare of Nelson B. is certainly adversely impacted.

We believe that the circuit court placed the child in an appropriate permanent placement with his maternal aunt and uncle. The home where the child was placed is a familiar home to this child, inasmuch as Paul B. and Nelson B. resided there at some points in their lives together. And while this is a final placement under our statutory scheme, it appears that Paul B. has been given an extraordinary opportunity to remain active in his child's life despite the limitations on parenting caused by his mental illness, by having regular, meaningful contact with the child, including the chance to increase the time spent with the child. As the guardian ad litem opined in her brief to this Court, "this solution is clearly in the best interest of Nelson B., and is (sic) frankly is probably in the best interest of Paul B."

The circuit court could have decided this case much differently and perhaps terminated Paul B.'s parental rights. In the case of In re: Maranda T., 223 W. Va. 512, 678 S.E.2d 18 (2009), this Court affirmed the termination of the parental rights of a mother who suffered from low intellectual functioning. In Maranda T., the mother attempted to abide by the plan proposed during an improvement period, but because of her intellectual limitations was unable to get to a point of being able to care for her child. In that case, unlike the case before the court today, the mother's parental rights were terminated, with post-termination visitation between the parent and the child ordered. The mother in Maranda T. was given approximately 14 months of services before the court terminated her parental rights; in the present case, counting the Department's efforts before the formal petition was filed, Paul B. has received in excess of 21 months of services.[4] The lower court employed a lesser-restrictive alternative and left Paul B. in a position to increase his role and involvement in Nelson B.'s life.

. After carefully reviewing the evidence presented, the record and the briefs of the parties, we conclude that the circuit court did not err in determining that Paul B. was unable to adequately parent his child. Although significant efforts were put forth by Paul

[4]This Court recognizes that the facts in Maranda T. were more egregious than the present facts. For instance, the child in Maranda T. had been subjected to substance abuse and sexual abuse misconduct by one or more caretakers. Further, the fact that Maranda T. was a special needs child, coupled with the mother's intellectual limitations, the mother's failure to fully appreciate the offered services, and the mother's inability to acknowledge the abuse that had been perpetrated on her daughter, left this Court with the conclusion that the mother had an inability to protect or care for her child. Thus, under the facts of that case, termination was appropriate.

B., and these efforts continue to date,[5] he is currently unable to provide the type of home that his young son requires. As such, the circuit court correctly made the difficult decision to end the custodial parental relationship, while maintaining regular and meaningful contact between the child and his biological father. And because the circuit court declined to terminate the parental rights, if Paul B. were to show significant improvement in the conditions which gave rise to this proceeding, his role in the child's life could be modified.

We are concerned that the permanency plan formulated by the Department has yet to be concluded, depriving Nelson B. of the finality of his placement. While the child's caretakers have filed a petition for infant guardianship in the Circuit Court of Preston County, no discernable action has been taken. Thus, the child remains in the legal and physical custody of the Department, with placement in the home of fit and proper persons willing and able to solidify their relationship with the child through a legal guardianship. The child deserves the finality and permanency of a legal guardianship, and the circuit court should promptly act on the petition now that this appeal has concluded.

[5]In a pleading entitled "Update to Brief for Petition to Appeal," Paul B. advised the Court that he had obtained employment at the local sheltered workshop and had obtained housing in Kingwood Apartments. We applaud the continued efforts of the appellant to better his situation. These recent events, however, do not change the conclusion reached by this Court.

IV.

CONCLUSION

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the dispositional order of the Circuit Court of Preston County entered on May 15, 2009, is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by Amy Pritt from an order entered by the Circuit Court of Boone County on November 1, 1990, in a proceeding involving the custody of her infant grandson, John McKinley Pritt, II. The circuit court ordered that, after a transition period, the child should be removed from the actual physical custody of the appellant, and that custody be vested in the infant's mother, Melinda Ann (Bradley) Ortner. On appeal, the appellant argues that the trial court's conclusions were incorrect, and that the trial court erred in transferring custody of the child to Mrs. Ortner. Under the circumstances in this case, we find that it is in the best interests of the child that custody be vested in Amy Pritt.

We note at the outset that the record in this case is incomplete. A transcript of the evidence before the trial court was unable to be obtained despite a writ of mandamus issued by this court ordering transcription of the proceedings below. Furthermore, Mrs. Ortner has not participated in these appeal proceedings. The trial court did not enter a final order in this case for well over three years after this action was instituted. Time was further extended upon appeal in the unsuccessful effort to obtain the transcript. Despite the great length of time over which this case has been in litigation, we are limited in our review of the facts to three depositions, various psychological reports concerning John Pritt, II, home studies performed upon the parties at the request of the trial court, and the testimony before the trial court as recounted by the appellant's counsel.

John McKinley Pritt, II, was born on February 14, 1983 to John Pritt, Sr. and Melinda Ann (Bradley) Ortner. After the birth of their child, Mr. Pritt and Mrs. Ortner See footnote 1 and their child resided with the appellant, Amy Pritt, in Boone County, West Virginia. However, on October 5, 1983, Mr. Pritt died of a heart attack. Mrs. Ortner thereafter moved from the residence of Amy Pritt into a rented trailer of her own.

Mrs. Ortner married Michael Bradley on November 9, 1984. One child, Chrissy, was born of that marriage in February, 1985. Mrs. Ortner and Mr. Bradley apparently separated in May, 1987, and divorced sometime thereafter.

The evidence before this Court is unclear as to how much time John Pritt, II, spent with either Mrs. Ortner or Amy Pritt prior to the institution of these proceedings by Mrs. Ortner in August, 1987. What can be gleaned from the record is that John, II, spent a considerable amount of time under the care of his grandmother, Amy Pritt, and at one point spent several months under her care when his mother was out of state. See footnote 2

On August 31, 1987, Mrs. Ortner petitioned the Circuit Court of Boone County for a writ of habeas corpus to issue against Kathy Pritt Clendenin, daughter of Amy Pritt, ordering Mrs. Clendenin to produce John, II, at a September 9, 1987 hearing. The writ was issued. At the September 9, 1987 hearing Amy Pritt was added as a respondent. See footnote 3 She and Mrs. Clendenin responded that John, II, had been in their continuous care since August 12, 1986 at the insistence of Mrs. Ortner. Nonetheless, the trial court issued a temporary order, entered December 15, 1987, vesting the custody of John, II, in Mrs. Ortner.

The trial court issued an "Order Upon Writ for Habeas Corpus" on April 5, 1988. Said order decreed that John, II, be removed from the custody of Mrs. Ortner and temporarily placed in the custody of Amy Pritt and Mrs. Clendenin. Mrs. Ortner was granted "reasonable visitation rights . . . bearing in mind that said petitioner shall not remove or otherwise cause said child to be removed from the State of West Virginia while exercising her visitation rights." See footnote 4 The trial court's rationale for the temporary order was its finding that "[Mrs. Ortner's] situation and circumstances [are] so unstable as to find it in the child's best interests to be placed with [Amy Pritt and Mrs. Clendenin]." Apparently the trial court made this finding based upon a home study done of Mrs. Ortner's Boone County residence which questioned the stability of Mrs. Ortner's household.

The home study performed on Mrs. Ortner's home in Boone County noted that the home was a two-bedroom trailer that "looked clean and had a partially fenced yard." The report noted that John, II, and Chrissy, who were in Mrs. Ortner's custody at that time, "appeared clean, healthy and happy."

The home study performed on Amy Pritt's home stated that her residence was a "neat and well-maintained" three-bedroom ranch style home, with a yard and swing set. The report opined that "[Amy Pritt] seems sensible and mature . . . she seems emotionally and financially stable, and capable of providing a good home for a child."

The April 5, 1988 temporary order of the trial court also directed that John, II, undergo counseling services at Shawnee Hills clinic in Boone County and that a report be forthcoming concerning findings made by those counselors. There is no report from Shawnee Hills clinic in the record before this Court. See footnote 5 The record does reveal, however, that John, II, was admitted to Highland Hospital of Boone County in July, 1988, for a period of several weeks, and during that time came under the care of Dr. Stephen Kissinger, a psychiatrist, and William Hall, M.A., a psychologist.

In a September 1, 1988 deposition, Mr. Hall opined:

> I don't believe that John will ever perceive his biological mother as a mom. I don't believe that he will ever perceive her as entirely nurturing, loving, and someone to be trusted to have his best interests at heart. I would hope that there -- I think it is probably unrealistic to ever expect John and his mother to develop a so-called normal mother/son bond; I don't believe that's going to happen.

Mr. Hall further recommended that John, II, be placed in the custody of Amy Pritt and Mrs. Clendenin, based on his observation of an "obvious psychological bond" existing between those parties.

Also in a September 1, 1988 deposition, Dr. Kissinger noted that "John talked about being hurt by his mother. And when she would call the unit, we would see his behavior deteriorate, in terms of becoming more aggressive, louder." He further opined that:

> In terms of placement as we speak, based on what we know now, it appears from our experience with John that he would feel more > comfortable with Amy and Kathy rather than his mother. That's not to say that at some point in the future, given therapy or deal with the mother, with the mother and the son, that that might at some time be at least as good; that's not true at the present time.

At some point in late 1987 or early 1988, Mrs. Ortner left Boone County and returned to her native Alabama. In June, 1988, she married Mark Ortner. At the request of the trial court, the Madison County, Alabama, Department of Human Resources conducted a home study of Mrs. Ortner's new home. The report, dated August 16, 1988, stated that Mr. and Mrs. Ortner "seem willing and capable to assume responsibility for the physical or emotional needs of Mrs. Ortner's children . . ." A home study update completed October 13, 1989 recommended that John, II, be placed with Mr. and Mrs. Ortner. The former home study noted that a February, 1988 visit to Mrs. Ortner's residence, when John, II, was in her custody, "determined that there were no problems with physical care and discipline that John was receiving while in his mother's care."

The record also reveals the deposition testimony of Cornelia Turnbow, a psychotherapist from Huntsville, Alabama. Mrs. Turnbow stated that she had seen Mrs. Ortner for 39 counseling sessions over the previous year. The counseling was initiated to help Mrs. Ortner deal with the stress of the litigation concerning the custody of John, II and Chrissy Bradley. See footnote 6 Mrs. Turnbow concluded from her observations of Mrs. Ortner, and Mrs. Ortner's relationship with Chrissy Bradley and Nicole Ortner See footnote 7 that:

> From what I have observed and from what she has, you know, related to me, which is all I can base it on, I can see her as a very warm, loving mother who has a large amount of patience with these two young children and who's very concerned about their well-being, you know, and their care.

On November 1, 1990, the trial court entered its final order in this case. The trial court made, among others, the following findings of fact:

> Prior to this issue coming to Court, both parties had some physical custody of the infant child and maintained varying degrees of control over the infant child and his needs; therefore, the Court finds that neither party is the primary caretaker.
>
> [Mrs. Ortner] has not committed misconduct, neglect or immorality as to establish unfitness and has not abandoned, transferred, or otherwise surrendered custody of the infant child to [Amy Pritt].

> It is in the best interest of the infant child to be in the custody of his natural mother, [Mrs. Ortner].

The trial court ordered that custody be vested in Mrs. Ortner, following a transition period to allow John, II, to obtain counseling to prepare him for the change of custody. This appeal followed.

Importantly, it has been represented to this Court that John, II, is still in the custody of Amy Pritt. Mrs. Ortner has taken no action to physically take custody of John, II, nor has she participated in these appellate proceedings. See footnote 8

In fact, her trial counsel was forced to withdraw from this case without her consent when she moved from her former residence in Alabama and left no forwarding address. She has made no inquiry concerning the status of this case with her trial counsel, trial counsel's former law firm, or this Court.

In the syllabus of State of FLA., DHRS v. Thornton, 183 W. Va. 513, 396 S.E.2d 475 (1990), we held:

> 'If a child has resided with an individual other than a parent for a significant period of time such that the non-parent with whom the child resides serves as the child's psychological parent, . . . the equitable rights of the child must be considered in connection with any decision that would alter the child's custody. To protect the equitable rights of a child in this situation, the child's environment should not be disturbed without a clear showing of significant benefit to him. . . .' Syl. Pt. 4, in part, In the Interest of Brandon L.E. [183 W. Va. 113], 394 S.E.2d 515 (W. Va. 1990).

The evidence in the record before this Court shows that John, II has resided with his grandmother for a significant period of time. The only psychiatric and psychological evidence of record shows that Amy Pritt is the child's "psychological parent." This evidence is uncontradicted. In this situation, then, to protect John, II's equitable rights, his "environment should not be disturbed without a clear showing of significant benefit to him." Thornton, supra. (emphasis added).

There is no evidence in the record showing that John, II, would acquire a "significant benefit" by a change of custody as awarded by the trial court. Nor did the trial court make such a finding. And although we are hampered upon appellate review by a lack of a transcript below, Mrs. Ortner has made no effort whatsoever to show this Court any evidence that a change of custody would be of "significant benefit" to John, II. Without any such evidence, the change of custody ordered by the trial court must be reversed. See footnote 9

Based upon the foregoing, the November 1, 1990 order of the Circuit Court of Boone County is reversed.

Reversed.

Footnote: 1 Mr. Pritt and Mrs. Ortner did not marry.

Footnote: 2 The meager evidence before this Court suggests that John, II, spent anywhere from one-half of his life up to 95% with Amy Pritt. The trial court made no specific finding in this regard, stating only that both parties had exercised some physical custody and maintained varying degrees of control over John, II. The trial court found that neither the mother nor the grandmother was the "primary caretaker" of John, II.

Footnote: 3 Mrs. Clendenin was later dismissed as a respondent.

Footnote: 4 Counsel for appellant asserts that the visitation rights of Mrs. Ortner were "restricted or guarded" and that this is a reason for reversing the trial court. There is nothing in the trial court's order granting temporary custody in Amy Pritt that suggests the visitation rights of Mrs. Ortner were to be "restricted or guarded" in any way. Furthermore, the trial court specifically decreed that it "[made] no finding of fitness or unfitness of [Mrs. Ortner]" at that time.

Footnote: 5 Pleadings before the trial court on behalf of Mrs. Ortner assert that "[John, II] did have an initial intake interview with Shawnee Hills on April 18, 1988, and the health professionals were skeptical of [John, II's] history as related by [Amy Pritt] and Mrs. Clendenin and found [John, II] to be 'remarkably intact.'"

Footnote: 6 At the time of Mrs. Turnbow's deposition, Mrs. Ortner had been granted custody of her daughter, Chrissy Bradley.

Footnote: 7 Nicole Ortner is Mr. Ortner's child from a previous relationship. She was living with Mr. and Mrs. Ortner at the time of Mrs. Turnbow's deposition.

Footnote: 8 We note for the record that Rule 10(e) of the W. Va. R. App. P., applicable to the instant case, states:

(e) Failure to File Brief. The failure to file a brief in accordance with this rule may result in the Supreme Court imposing the following sanctions: refusal to hear the case, denying oral argument to the derelict party, dismissal of the case from the docket, or such other sanctions as the Court may deem appropriate.

Footnote: 9 Nothing in this opinion should be construed as limiting the right of the infant child's natural mother to petition the trial court at some later date for a modification of this custody decree. As we stated in Tucker v. Tucker, 176 W. Va. 80, 82-83, 341 S.E.2d 700, 702 (1986):

In Phillips v. Phillips, 24 W. Va. 591 (1884), this Court recognized the right of a noncustodial parent to have a hearing on a petition to modify the child custody award made in a former divorce decree. We reaffirm that right and hold that under the due process clause, Article III, Section 10 of the West Virginia Constitution, a parent who files a petition for a change of child custody alleging sufficient grounds to warrant such change, Acord v. Acord, [164 W. Va. 562, 264 S.E.2d 848 (1980)] is entitled to a hearing on the merits of the petition.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syllabus Point 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

2. "Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security. Consequently, in order to assure that all entities are actively pursuing the goals of the child abuse and neglect statutes, the Administrative Director of this Court is hereby directed to work with the clerks of the circuit court to develop systems to monitor the status and progress of child neglect and abuse cases in the courts." Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

3. "The clear import of the statute [West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible." Syllabus Point 5, In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

Per curiam:

In this case, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("the DHHR") seeks a writ of prohibition to halt the enforcement of a circuit court order dismissing an abuse and neglect petition. The circuit court dismissed the petition as a sanction against the DHHR for failing to timely file an expert's report with the circuit court.

As set forth below, we grant the requested writ.

I.
Facts and Background

On August 2, 2007, the DHHR filed an abuse and neglect petition against respondent Angela H. in the Circuit Court of Cabell County. The DHHR alleged in the petition that Angela H. had screened positive for amphetamine/methamphetamine, cannabinoids, and cocaine during the birth of her new son, K.M., on July 11, 2007, and that she had her parental rights to other children previously terminated in other actions. Angela H. voluntarily admitted to neglect, and the circuit court adjudicated the mother as neglectful and granted her motion for a post-adjudicatory improvement period.

The DHHR moved to terminate Angela H.'s improvement period – ostensibly because she was not complying with drug treatment programs and because of concerns about her parenting skills – and moved to terminate her parental rights to K.M. On August 6, 2008, the circuit court ordered the DHHR to perform a psychological evaluation of Angela H., and set the matter for a final disposition hearing on October 1, 2008.

However, at the October 1, 2008 hearing, counsel for the DHHR announced that it had not yet begun to conduct a psychological examination of the respondent mother, Angela H. The circuit court then continued the disposition hearing to November 19, 2008. The circuit court also ordered that the DHHR complete the psychological evaluation of Angela H., and file a report of that evaluation with the court, by November 7, 2008. The circuit court explicitly stated that, if the evaluation was not filed by that date, then "the petition will be dismissed as to the respondent mother."[1]

The DHHR filed the required psychological report on November 14, 2008. At the November 19th hearing, the circuit court noted that the report had not been timely filed, as the circuit court had explicitly ordered, and the circuit court announced that the petition was being dismissed. The circuit court expressed frustration with the DHHR's failure to

[1]The circuit court's October 23, 2008 order states, in pertinent part:

> Based upon the testimony adduced and the record herein, the Court did FIND as follows: . . .
>
> The psychological evaluation of the respondent mother has not been completed. If the psychological evaluation has not been filed on or before November 7, the petition will be dismissed as to the respondent mother. . . .
>
> It is, therefore, ORDERED as follows: . . .
>
> This matter is set for disposition as to the respondent mother on November 19, 2008 at 9:00 am; however, if the psychological evaluation of the respondent mother is not filed with the Court on or before November 7, 2008, the petition shall be dismissed as to the respondent mother.

comply with scheduling deadlines, and indicated that it was "an ongoing problem" that this Court should recognize.[2]

In a written order filed December 12, 2008, the circuit court ordered that the abuse and neglect petition against Angela H. be "dismissed for failure to file the psychological report by November 7, 2008." The circuit court also ordered that the child, K.M., be returned to his mother Angela H.'s custody.

[2]The following exchange occurred at the November 19, 2008 hearing between the circuit judge, the assistant prosecutor who represented DHHR, and the DHHR case worker:

> The Court: By order entered October 23, 2008, pursuant to our appearance here on October the 1st, 2008, I set this matter for disposition today with the proviso that if the psychological evaluation of the Respondent Mother is not filed with the Court on or before November the 7th, 2008, the petition shall be dismissed as to the Respondent Mother. The psychological [report] was not filed until November the 14th, and the Court is dismissing the petition.
>
> Prosecutor: Will the Court entertain a motion for a stay, so that we can approach the Supreme Court of –
>
> The Court: No. I'm dismissing the petition. You may appeal it.
>
> Case worker: I thought that I had the psychological evaluation brought down here, filed and distributed to everybody on Friday the 7th, and I filed one, again, with my court summary.
>
> The Court: It was filed November the 14th, 2008 at 2:34 p.m. in the circuit clerk's office. . . . This is one I want to go up, because I want the [Supreme] Court to know when we order things, we don't get them done. . . . And it's been an ongoing problem. . . . I ordered that it be filed and it was not filed timely, and I'm going to back up my order. If the Court wants to send it back, they can send it back, that's their decision to make. But this is – I'd actually like someone to take my deposition sometime so I can give them the cases and the deadlines and the time frames that we get. They contract these things with the contractual providers and it just doesn't work. It's dismissed for failure to file it by November the 7th, just like I said. It's dismissed.

The DHHR immediately petitioned[3] this Court for a writ of prohibition to stop the enforcement of the circuit court's oral and written orders dismissing the abuse and neglect petition.[4]

II.
Standard of Review

We have held that "[p]rohibition lies only to restrain inferior courts from proceedings in causes over which they have no jurisdiction, or, in which, having jurisdiction, they are exceeding their legitimate powers, and may not be used as a substitute for [a petition for appeal] or certiorari." Syllabus Point 1, Crawford v. Taylor, 138 W.Va. 207, 75 S.E.2d 370 (1953). In Syllabus Point 4 of State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W.Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996), we stated the following standard of review where, as here, a petitioner contends that a trial court has exceeded its legitimate powers:

> In determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but

---

[3]On November 25, 2008, the petition for the writ of prohibition was filed by an assistant attorney general on behalf of his client, the DHHR. Oddly, the next day, an assistant prosecutor who also represented the DHHR filed a response to the writ of prohibition. The West Virginia Rules of Appellate Procedure allow a party to file only one merits brief on a petition for a writ of prohibition, not two – and they absolutely do not allow parties to file response briefs to their own petition. And to the extent that the assistant prosecutor filed the brief on her own behalf and not the DHHR, we do not believe that trial counsel is an "affected party" with standing to file a brief in opposition to her client's position. See W.Va.R.A.P. Rule 14.

[4]We issued a rule to show cause why the petition should not be granted, and the circuit court has delayed reunification of the child with Angela H. pending the Court's decision.

> only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight.

III.
Discussion

The DHHR asserts that the circuit court exceeded its authority when it refused to conduct a hearing on the abuse and neglect petition, as required by W.Va. Code, 49-6-6 [1977], and issued an order that dismissed the petition as a sanction for the DHHR's failure to timely file a psychological report. The DHHR asserts that a direct appeal of the circuit court's order would be inadequate since the infant, K.M., would return to an alleged unsafe environment in the mother's care pending review of the order on appeal.

W.Va. Code, 49-6-6 requires a trial court to conduct a hearing on any motion made to modify a child's disposition. W.Va. Code, 49-6-6 states, in pertinent part:

> Upon motion of a child, a child's parent or custodian or the state department alleging a change of circumstances requiring a different disposition, the court shall conduct a hearing . . . Adequate and timely notice of any motion for > modification shall be given to the child's counsel, counsel for the child's parent or custodian and to the state department.

In the instant case, the circuit court refused to allow the DHHR to present evidence or witness testimony in a disposition hearing. The circuit court was clearly in error, and should have conducted a hearing to take evidence and testimony in support of the DHHR's motion seeking to alter Angela H.'s and K.M.'s disposition.

This is not to say, however, that the circuit court erred in attempting to assess sanctions. The transcript of the November 19, 2008 hearing plainly reflects the circuit court's frustration with the DHHR and its counsel arising from their repeated failures to comply with the circuit court's orders. Our concern is that the remedy of dismissing the petition, without first considering other sanctions, fails to take into consideration the best interests of the child who is the subject of the abuse and neglect petition.[5] As we stated in Syllabus Point 3 of In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996):

> Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect,

[5]We do not, by our decision today, mean to imply that dismissal of a petition is not permitted. To the contrary, dismissal of the petition is the first disposition a court is to consider when assessing any abuse and neglect petition. As W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [2006] says, in part:

> Following a determination . . . wherein the court finds a child to be abused or neglected, the department shall file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child. . . . The court shall forthwith proceed to disposition giving both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard. The court shall give precedence to dispositions in the following sequence:
>

> as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children.

The early, most formative years of a child's life are crucial to his or her development. In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 623, 408 S.E.2d 365, 375 (1991). We have repeatedly emphasized that "children have a right to resolution of their life situations, to a basic level of nurturance, protection, and security, and to a permanent placement." State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W.Va. 251, 257, 470 S.E.2d 205, 211 (1996). We therefore concluded, in Syllabus Point 1 of In re Carlita B., supra:

> Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security.

The central theme of the statutes which pertain to abuse and neglect is that "matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible." Syllabus Point 5, In re Carlita B, supra.

The record in the instant case shows that the circuit court attempted to give this abuse and neglect matter precedence, and attempted to resolve the case as expeditiously as possible. However, the DHHR and its counsel did not comply with the circuit court's directions to timely file a report with the circuit clerk. If the circuit court perceived that the delays in resolving the case resulted from action (or inaction) by the DHHR or its counsel, then any sanctions should first have been directed to the party or to the attorney at fault. But the overarching rule is that any sanctions first should take into account the health and welfare of the child.

IV.
Conclusion

The circuit court's oral and written orders dismissing the abuse and neglect petition – while understandable – were in error, and failed to take into account the health and welfare of the child and failed to accord the DHHR with the ability to present its evidence and testimony. The writ of prohibition is granted.

Benjamin, Chief Justice, concurring:

I concur completely in the majority per curiam opinion of the Court. The circuit court's orders dismissing the abuse and neglect petition were in error and the writ of prohibition was properly granted. Our guiding principle in cases such as this is the health and welfare of the child. These cases deservedly receive the highest priority of the court system's attention – a priority which applies to government in general. In re Carlita B, 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

I write separately to acknowledge the apparent frustration demonstrated by the circuit court – a frustration which resulted not from any neglect on the court's part, but rather due to the failures of the Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") to comply in a timely manner with its obligations regarding this child. It is a frustration which I fear is too frequently felt by our courts in matters related to DHHR – and it is a frustration which I sense is too often experienced first hand by the dedicated employees and administrators of DHHR who strive on a daily basis to meet DHHR's legal, and humanitarian, mandate to help families and children in West Virginia. Based upon the DHHR cases which have been before this Court in the last several years, I share this frustration. I sense others on this Court, too, share these frustrations.

As candidly admitted by counsel for DHHR in the oral argument of this case, the resources necessary for DHHR to comply fully with its statutory mandate too frequently are lacking. Based upon the evidence before this Court, I conclude that DHHR's ability to adequately comply herein with its legal obligation was caused not by any desire of a DHHR employee or administrator to do so, nor by the best efforts of DHHR employees and administrators, but rather by the continuing lack of requisite resources which DHHR receives to meet its mission. There is only so much that dedicated DHHR personnel can accomplish without adequate resources. I am deeply troubled and concerned about this continuing resource problem – a problem which I sense may be worsening and may be becoming systemic. This underlying resource problem perhaps deserves the Court's fuller attention.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although a court has jurisdiction of the subject matter in controversy and of the parties, if it clearly appears that in the conduct of the case it has exceeded its legitimate powers with respect to some pertinent question a writ of prohibition will lie to prevent such abuse of power." 2. The inadequacy of allegations contained in an abuse and neglect petition does not, in and of itself, abrogate one's standing to file such a petition pursuant to W.Va.Code § 49-6-1(a) (1992) (Repl.Vol.1996).

3. A circuit court has jurisdiction to entertain an abuse and neglect petition and to conduct proceedings in accordance therewith as provided by W.Va.Code § 49-6-1, et seq.

4. A parent's relinquishment of his/her parental rights either in anticipation of future adoption proceedings or as a part of previously initiated adoption proceedings does not constitute abandonment for abuse and neglect purposes.

DAVIS, Justice:

In this original proceeding for a writ of prohibition, the petitioners, Paul and Chris B., See footnote 1 request this Court to prohibit the respondent judge, the Honorable George W. Hill, Jr., Judge of the Circuit Court of Wood County, from enforcing his August 20, 1997, order. In that order, Judge Hill concluded that the respondents, Pete and Cynthia L. S., See footnote 2 should receive the legal and physical custody of the respondent children, Natasha Colette B., Anatoli Josef B., Alevhnia Marie B., and Olya Tess B., pending further investigation by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources. The circuit court deemed further inquiry appropriate given the S family's prior allegations that the B family had abandoned their four adoptive children by placing them in respite care with the S family and by making arrangements to re-place the children through the Texas adoption agency through which they had adopted them. We issued a rule to show cause. We now grant as moulded the writ of prohibition.

I.
FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The facts underlying this proceeding began in approximately May, 1997. At that time, Paul and Chris B., having earlier decided to adopt four children from Russia, traveled to that country to meet their soon-to-be adoptive children and to finalize the adoption arrangements. See footnote 3 Throughout the adoption process, the B family had worked with the Gladney Center, an international adoption agency located in Fort Worth, Texas, and Gladney representatives had assured them that the Russian children would have no substantial emotional problems. See footnote 4 On May 15, 1997, the Bs' adoption of the four siblings, Natasha Colette, Anatoli Josef, Alevhnia Marie, and Olya Tess, See footnote 5 was finalized in Russia. After retrieving the children from the orphanage in which they had been residing, the Bs and their four Russian children resided temporarily in Russia, first with a Russian host family and, later, in a youth hostel, to permit the new family unit to become acquainted with one another before returning to the United States. The Bs claim that once the adoption had been finalized, the orphanage informed them that Natasha had exhibited some anti-social behavior and had had occasional outbursts. While residing in Russia, the Bs experienced difficulty interacting with the children, and the children would not obey them.

Upon their return to Parkersburg, West Virginia, the Bs and their four Russian children were reunited with the Bs' other children. See footnote 6 The Bs claim that, from the beginning, the relationship between the four Russian siblings and the Bs' other children was strained, at best. In this regard, the Bs indicate that the Russian children acted violently towards themselves, each other, and the other B children, would not obey, and could not be disciplined. After meeting with a family counselor in early July, 1997, the B family learned that the Russian siblings likely suffered from "attachment displacement disorder," an emotional disturbance frequently diagnosed in children who have been adopted from orphanages in foreign countries. The counselor also opined that the Russian children may or may not ever completely recover from this disorder and that the B family had little hope of establishing a cohesive family that would include these four siblings.

At this juncture, the *B*s concluded that the Gladney Center had misrepresented the emotional and mental condition of the Russian children. See footnote 7 Determining that they could not continue to jeopardize their family stability and the safety of their other children, See footnote 8 the *B*s pursued the option of relinquishing their parental rights to the Russian siblings and re-placing them with the Gladney Center for a second adoption. The arrangements with the Gladney Center apparently have contemplated that, unlike the B family situated in Parkersburg, West Virginia, Gladney, in Texas, can secure the appropriate treatment for children with such severe attachment displacement disorder. These preparations also contemplate the continuation of the sibship unit by placing all four children in the same adoptive home.

Toward the end of July, 1997, Mr. B was scheduled to take an out-of-town weekend trip. Based in large part upon Mrs. *B*s' inability to control their newly adopted children and fearing for her own safety and that of her remaining children, the *B*s sought temporary respite care See footnote 9 for their Russian children during Mr. *B*s' absence. The B family, having contacted Burlington United Methodist Family Services, Inc., was advised to contact the *S*s to see if they could provide such care. Mr. and Mrs. S, who have provided respite care to numerous children, See footnote 10 agreed to temporarily house the *B*s' four Russian children from Thursday, July 17, 1997, to Sunday, July 20, 1997. See footnote 11

On July 17, 1997, the B family delivered their four Russian children to the S household. See footnote 12 The S family indicates that, while the children exhibited some emotional disturbance, they were not violent or in any other way disobedient during their stay. On the following Sunday, July 20, 1997, the B family requested the S family to extend the respite care, to which the *S*s agreed. The next day, Mrs. S contacted the Gladney Center and inquired whether she and her husband could adopt these children. Gladney, in turn, contacted the B family who strongly opposed the proposal, particularly because they were purchasing a house in the same subdivision where the S family lives and feared the consequences of living in such close proximity to these children. In addition, the B s disapproved permanent adoptive placement of the children in the Parkersburg, West Virginia, area because this region is not equipped with services to meet the needs of children with attachment displacement disorder. See footnote 13

On Wednesday, July 23, 1997, the B family traveled to the S household to pick up their four children, as the *B*s believed the parties had previously agreed to extend the respite care to this date. See footnote 14 En route, the *B*s called the *S*s to let them know they were on their way; a person in the S household indicated that the children were not at home because Mrs. S had taken all of the children to the library. Upon approaching the S household, the *B*s observed Mr. S driving quickly through the neighborhood with the *B*s' children in his car. Apparently, Mr. S continued his journey, without stopping, even though the *B*s attempted to flag him down. See footnote 15 The *B*s then called the Wood County Sheriff's Department, and, when the police arrived, proceeded to the S residence. At the S household, the *B*s were informed that Mr. S had taken the children out for ice cream. Approximately one hour later, the sheriff's department was informed, by the *S*s' attorney, that Mr. and Mrs. S had obtained an emergency temporary custody order covering these children. See footnote 16

On July 25, 1997, the *S*s filed a "Petition for Appointment of Guardian and for Intervention by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources" [hereinafter abuse and neglect petition], essentially requesting the Circuit Court of Wood County to appoint a guardian ad litem for the children and charging the B family with abandonment of the children constituting abuse and neglect. During the July 25, 1997, hearing of this matter, counsel for the B family contended that the S family lacked standing to charge the *B*s with abuse and neglect by abandonment, claiming that the *B*s' intentions to relinquish their parental rights and to re-place the children for adoption did not rise to the level of abandonment. Circuit Court Judge Hill, viewing the best interests of the children, decided otherwise and ordered an inquiry by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources [hereinafter DHHR]. The court also granted legal custody of the four children to the DHHR and physical custody to the S family pending resolution of the matter. However, by final order dated August 20, 1997, Judge Hill granted both legal and physical custody of the children to the S family until the DHHR had completed its report and the court had an opportunity to hold an evidentiary hearing. See footnote 17

On September 2, 1997, the *B*s petitioned this Court for a writ of prohibition to prevent Judge Hill from enforcing his order and to permit them to continue with their planned relinquishment and re-placement. We issued a rule to show cause and now proceed to determine the propriety of the requested relief. See footnote 18

II.
DISCUSSION

Before this Court, the petitioners request that we prohibit the respondent Judge Hill from enforcing his order vesting legal and physical custody of these four children with the S family pending investigation of the *S*s' charges that the *B*s' intention to relinquish their parental rights to these children and to re-place them for adoption constituted abuse and neglect by way of abandonment. Following a brief discussion of the appropriate standard of review, we address the merits of the petitioners' contentions. See footnote 19

A. Standard of Review

The right to relief through the original jurisdiction proceeding of prohibition is statutorily recognized in this State. W.Va.Code § 53-1-1 (1923) (Repl.Vol.1994) provides that "[t]he writ of prohibition shall lie as a matter of right in all cases of usurpation and abuse of power, when the inferior court has not jurisdiction of the subject matter in controversy, or, having such jurisdiction, exceeds its legitimate powers." Stated otherwise, "[a] writ of prohibition ... will only issue where the trial court has no jurisdiction or having such jurisdiction exceeds its legitimate powers. W.Va.Code, 53-1-1." Syl. pt. 2, in part, State ex rel. Peacher v. Sencindiver, 160 W.Va. 314, 233 S.E.2d 425 (1977). Accordingly, "[a]lthough a court has jurisdiction of the subject matter in controversy and of the parties, if it clearly appears that in the conduct of the case it has exceeded its legitimate powers with respect to some pertinent question a writ of prohibition will lie to prevent such abuse of power." Syl. pt. 2, State ex rel. State Road Comm'n v. Taylor, 151 W.Va. 535, 153 S.E.2d 531 (1967). See also Syl. pt. 1, White Sulphur Springs, Inc. v. Ripley, 124 W.Va. 486, 20 S.E.2d 794 (1942) ("Under Code, 53-1-1, a trial court having jurisdiction of a cause of action and of the parties thereto, may, nevertheless, be prohibited from further proceeding therein, when in so doing it exceeds its legitimate powers.").

Furthermore, while "prohibition does not lie to correct errors committed by a court which is acting within its jurisdiction, or where the existence of jurisdiction depends on controverted facts which such court is competent to determine ... 'the writ properly issues where an erroneous decision on a question of law operates as an unlawful assumption of jurisdiction.' " State ex rel. Zirk v. Muntzing, 146 W.Va. 878, 894, 122 S.E.2d 851, 860 (1961) (quoting 73 C.J.S. Prohibition § 12). See also State ex rel. Charleston Mail Ass'n v. Ranson, 200 W.Va. 5, 9, 488 S.E.2d 5, 9 (1997) (" 'The rationale behind a writ of prohibition is that by issuing certain orders the trial court has exceeded its jurisdiction, thus making prohibition appropriate.' " (quoting State ex rel. Allen v. Bedell, 193 W.Va. 32, 36, 454 S.E.2d 77, 81 (1994) (Cleckley, J., concurring))).

Traditionally, we have viewed the writ of prohibition as an extraordinary remedy to be granted in only the most extraordinary cases. See, e.g., State ex rel. West Virginia Div. of Natural Resources v. Cline, 200 W.Va. 101, 105, 488 S.E.2d 376, 380 (1997); State ex rel. Suriano v. Gaughan, 198 W.Va. 339, 345, 480 S.E.2d 548, 554 (1996); State ex rel. United States Fidelity & Guar. Co. v. Canady, 194 W.Va. 431, 436, 460 S.E.2d 677, 682 (1995); State ex rel. Doe v. Troisi, 194 W.Va. 28, 31, 459 S.E.2d 139, 142 (1995). In this regard, "[i]t is well established that prohibition does not lie to correct mere errors and cannot be allowed to usurp the functions of appeal, writ of error, or certiorari.... [Where] the lower court had jurisdiction of the ... proceedings, ... unless it so exceeded its legitimate powers as to vitiate that jurisdiction, prohibition is not the proper remedy."

Handley v. Cook, 162 W.Va. 629, 631, 252 S.E.2d 147, 148 (1979) (citations omitted). See also State ex rel. Williams v. Narick, 164 W.Va. 632, 635, 264 S.E.2d 851, 854 (1980) ("[T]his Court has specifically stated that the writ [of prohibition] does not lie to correct 'mere errors' and that it cannot serve as a substitute for appeal, writ of error or certiorari." (citations omitted)). Therefore, "[t]o justify this extraordinary remedy, the petitioner has the burden of showing that the lower court's jurisdictional usurpation was clear and indisputable and, because there is no adequate relief at law, the extraordinary writ provides the only available and adequate remedy." State ex rel. Allen v. Bedell, 193 W.Va. at 37, 454 S.E.2d at 82. Having set forth the applicable standard of review, we proceed now to a determination on the merits as to whether the petitioners satisfy these criteria for the issuance of a writ of prohibition.

B. Determination of Issues

In the proceedings presently before this Court, the petitioners contend that the circuit court did not have jurisdiction to entertain the abuse and neglect petition filed by the S family. The Bs argue that the Ss did not have standing to file the abuse and neglect or custody petitions in the circuit court, and, therefore, the circuit court did not have jurisdiction over those proceedings. W.Va.Code § 49-6- 1(a) (1992) (Repl.Vol.1996) permits a "reputable person" to file a petition alleging abuse and neglect, but this section also requires the petitioner to set forth specific facts evidencing such allegations. Mere conclusory statements that abuse or neglect has occurred will not suffice. State v. Scritchfield, 167 W.Va. 683, 280 S.E.2d 315 (1981). The Bs contend that the abuse and neglect petition filed by the S family in this case did not manifest sufficient facts to support their allegations of abandonment rising to the level of abuse and neglect. Rather, the B family suggests that, under the facts of this case, it is impossible for the conduct alleged by the Ss (the Bs' intent to relinquish the children and to re-place them for adoption) to constitute abuse and neglect by abandonment in West Virginia. See footnote 20

The Bs also dispute the circuit court's finding that their intent to relinquish their parental rights to their four children and to re-place them for adoption through the Gladney Center constitutes abandonment rising to the level of abuse and neglect. Rather, they contend that the statutory definition of abuse and neglect contained in W.Va.Code § 49-1- 3(c) (1994) (Repl.Vol.1996) neither specifically defines abandonment nor indicates that an intent to relinquish parental rights incident to an adoption proceeding constitutes abuse and neglect. If this provision were construed to apply to adoption proceedings, the Bs argue that adoption would practically cease to exist in this State because every parent contemplating a relinquishment of his/her parental rights could be charged with abuse and neglect.

The S family replies that they clearly had standing to bring the instant abuse and neglect petition pursuant to W.Va.Code § 49-6-1(a). This provision grants a "reputable person" standing to file such a petition. The Ss submit that, as respite care providers, they have had much experience in caring for children and are in a good position to recognize signs of abuse or neglect. In this regard, they also assert that respite and foster care providers having knowledge of abuse or neglect have a duty to report such mistreatment to the appropriate authorities. The S family states further that, given their knowledge of these particular children and their treatment while they resided in the B household, the Ss were proper parties to bring this petition. Moreover, the Ss reply that the circuit court has jurisdiction to entertain allegations of abandonment rising to the level of abuse and neglect because the court has jurisdiction to protect and promote the best interests of children. See In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993). Accordingly, the Ss assert that the circuit court properly exercised jurisdiction over the underlying abuse and neglect proceedings.

The Ss contend finally that abandonment has previously been held to constitute abuse and neglect. See W.Va.Code § 49-1-3(e) (defining "imminent danger" as including abandonment); In re Adoption of Mullins by Farley, 187 W.Va. 772, 421 S.E.2d 680 (1992) (per curiam). They further assert that the Bs' intention to relinquish their parental rights and to re- place the children for adoption constitutes abandonment as a parent without actual custody of his/her child has been found capable of abandoning such child. In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996); In re Christine Tiara W., 198 W.Va. 266, 479 S.E.2d 927 (1996) (per curiam). Under the circumstances of this case, the Ss maintain their allegations that the Bs' intent to relinquish their parental rights and to send their children to Texas for adoptive placement would place the children in "imminent danger" of severe psychological damage, and submit that these allegations constitute abandonment for abuse and neglect purposes.

Our resolution of the standing and jurisdiction issues necessitates an inquiry into the current law of this State as it relates to abuse and neglect proceedings. W.Va.Code § 49-6-1(a) (1992) (Repl.Vol.1996) permits the filing of a petition alleging the abuse and/or neglect of a child:

> If the state departm ent [of health and hum an resources] or a reputable person believes that a child is negl ected or abused, the departm ent or the person may present a petition setting forth th e facts to the circuit court in the county in which the child resides, or to the judge of such court in vacation. The petition shall be veri fied by the oath of some credible person having knowledge of the facts. The petition shall allege specific conduct including tim e and place, how such conduct co mes within the statutory definition of neglect or a buse with references thereto, any supportive services provided by the stat e department to rem edy the alleged circumstances and the relief sought[.]

(Emphasis added). Clearly, then, this statute permits not only the DHHR but also an individual who believes that a child is being abused or neglected to institute proceedings to investigate these allegations.

Under the facts of this case, we find that the Ss were proper parties to file an abuse and neglect petition and, therefore, had standing to do so. Generally speaking, "[s]tanding is an element of jurisdiction over the subject matter." 21A Michie's Jurisprudence Words & Phrases 380 (1987) (citing Chesapeake Bay Found. v. Gwaltney of Smithfield, Ltd., 611 F.Supp. 1542 (E.D.Va.1985)). More specifically, standing refers to one's ability to bring a lawsuit because he/she has "such a personal stake in the outcome of the controversy as to insure the concrete adverseness upon which the court depends for illumination of the questions in the case." 14A Michie's Jurisprudence Parties § 18 (1989) (citing Christman v. American Cyanamid Co., 578 F.Supp. 63 (N.D.W.Va.1983)). See also Coleman v. Sopher, 194 W.Va. 90, 95-96 n. 6, 459 S.E.2d 367, 372-73 n. 6 (1995) (explaining elements comprising standing). While the Bs contend that the petition filed by the Ss lacked the factual sufficiency required by the above-quoted statute, we hold that the inadequacy of allegations contained in an abuse and neglect petition does not, in and of itself, abrogate one's standing to file such a petition pursuant to W.Va.Code § 49-6-1(a) (1992) (Repl.Vol.1996). See footnote 21

Among the enumerated goals of the child welfare laws of this State are the "[p]rovi[sion] for [the] early identification of the problems of children and their families, and ... appropriate[responses thereto] with measures and services to prevent abuse and neglect" and the "[p]rotect[ion of] the welfare of the general public." W.Va.Code § 49-1-1(a)(8), (10) (1997) (Supp.1997). By permitting an individual who believes that abuse and/or neglect is occurring, or has occurred, to file a petition alleging such circumstances, and by requiring this person to also have sufficient knowledge of the facts underlying this belief to verify the petition, the statutory framework attempts to protect parents, custodians, guardians, and care givers from unsubstantiated charges while permitting the filing of petitions seeking to protect the health, safety, and well-being of children.

The Ss contend that, at the time they first received the four B children into their home, they had misgivings about whether the Bs had appropriately provided for the children's needs in terms of food and clothing. While caring for these children, the Ss noticed that the children seemed to be afraid of soap and learned that their "discipline" at the Bs' home may have included "washing the children's mouths out with soap" when they spoke their native Russian instead of English. The Ss also had discovered that the Bs were attempting to relinquish their parental rights and to re-place these children for adoption through the Gladney Center. Furthermore, the parties indicate that, during the initial period of respite care, they were uncertain as to whether the Gladney Center had located a permanent adoptive placement for the children in Texas. As a result, the Ss maintain that they were concerned that the sibship may be separated and that the children would be placed in different foster homes pending permanent placement. Separation of these siblings would not only have been emotionally devastating for them but also would have been contrary to this State's public policy of attempting to unite siblings in foster care placements. See W.Va.Code § 49-2-14 (1995) (Repl.Vol.1996). Therefore, given the Ss' beliefs about the children's care and treatment during their residence with the B family, and the Ss' personal familiarity with and observations of the children during their provision of respite care, we find that the Ss were proper parties and had standing to file an abuse and neglect petition in this case.

Although not as definitely ascertainable as the issue of standing, we also find that the Circuit Court of Wood County had jurisdiction over the basic abuse and neglect petition filed in this case. While not explicitly stated in the abuse and neglect statutes, we previously have recognized that circuit courts have "original jurisdiction of all cases coming within the terms of the [child welfare] act," which serves to protect "delinquent, dependent and neglected children." Locke v. County Court of Raleigh County, 111 W.Va. 156, 158, 160, 161 S.E. 6, 7 (1931) (emphasis added). Therefore, it appears that the circuit court properly exercised jurisdiction over the abuse and neglect proceeding in this case as such proceeding comes within the child welfare laws of this State. See W.Va.Code § 49-1-1, et seq.

In addition, our Constitution provides both specific grants of power to circuit courts and a general, more inclusive jurisdictional provision encompassing grants of power which are intended by the Legislature, but which have not been specifically enumerated. Article VIII, Section 6, of the West Virginia Constitution states, in part, that "[c]ircuit courts shall also have such other jurisdiction, authority or power, original or appellate or concurrent, as may be prescribed by law." See also W.Va.Code § 51-2-2 (1978) (Repl.Vol.1994) (same). In this manner, it may be inferred that if one may file a petition with the circuit court alleging abuse or neglect of a child and if hearings are to be had in the circuit court with respect to that petition, then the circuit court logically should possess the inherent jurisdiction to entertain the petition and to conduct such proceedings. See W.Va.Code § 49-6-1. Thus, under this interpretation of the circuit court's jurisdiction in abuse and neglect proceedings, the circuit court's exercise of jurisdiction was proper in this case.

Finally, the circuit court had jurisdiction to entertain the abuse and neglect proceeding under the doctrine of parens patriae. We have acknowledged that the State, in its role of parens patriae, has a duty to safeguard children:

> While parents enjoy an inherent right to the care and custody of their own children, the State in its recognized role of parens patriae is the ultimate protector of the rights of minors. The State has a substantial interest in providing for their health, safety, and welfare, and may properly step in to > do so when necessary.... This parens patriae interest in promoting the welfare of the child favors preservation, not severance, of natural family bonds.... The countervailing State interest in curtailing child abuse is also great. In cases of suspected abuse or neglect, the State has a clear interest in protecting the child and may, if necessary, separate abusive or neglectful parents from their children.

> In the Interest of Betty J.W., 179 W.Va. 605, 608, 371 S.E.2d 326, 329 (1988) (citations omitted).

Tempered with the State's parens patriae interest is the court's obligation to consider the "best interests of the child [as] paramount." In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 32, 435 S.E.2d 162, 170 (1993). See also Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 246, 470 S.E.2d 193, 200 (1996) (recognizing paramount importance of best interests of child). This judicial duty has also been characterized as a parens patriae role: "[t]his Court cannot ... ignore its parens patriae duty to protect the best interests of [the child]." State of Florida, Dep't of Health & Rehabilitative Servs. ex rel. State of West Virginia, Dep't of Human Servs., Div. of Social Servs. v. Thornton, 183 W.Va. 513, 519, 396 S.E.2d 475, 481 (1990) (per curiam) (citation omitted). During the proceedings below, the court specifically recognized, in ruling upon the allegations of abuse and neglect, that "the interest of the child is just unsurpassed by anything" and that "[t]he primary issue is always the welfare of the child." Thus, the circuit court, in its conduct of proceedings to ensure the safety and well-being of the Bs' four children, properly exercised its jurisdiction by entertaining the Ss' abuse and neglect petition. Having found various rationales for vesting jurisdiction in the circuit court to entertain abuse and neglect proceedings, we hold that a circuit court has jurisdiction to entertain an abuse and neglect petition and to conduct proceedings in accordance therewith as provided by W.Va.Code § 49-6-1, et seq.

Finally, the Bs contend that the circuit court exceeded its jurisdiction in the underlying proceedings because a parent's intent to relinquish his/her parental rights in anticipation of placing a child for adoption does not constitute abandonment for abuse and neglect purposes. In this regard, we agree with the Bs. During the hearing below, the circuit court determined that "[r]elinquishing children constitutes neglect or abandonment." Although the circuit court did have jurisdiction of the basic abuse and neglect petition filed by the Ss and of the proceedings held in accordance therewith, the court exceeded such jurisdiction when it created a new basis for finding abuse and neglect: voluntary relinquishment of parental rights incident to adoption proceedings.

In W.Va.Code § 49-1-3 (1994) (Repl.Vol.1996), the Legislature very explicitly set forth definitions for abuse and neglect. An " '[a]bused child' " is defined in W.Va.Code § 49-1-3(a) as:

> a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by:
> (1) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or a nother child in the home; or
> (2) Sexual abuse or sexual exploitation; or
> (3) The sale or attempted sale of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian in violation of section si xteen [§ 48-4-16], article four, chapter forty-eight of this code.
> In addition to its broader meaning, physical injury may include an injury to the child as a result of excessive corporal punishment.

Similarly, subsection (g) defines a " '[n]eglected child' " as a child:

> (1) ... (A) Whose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian; or

W.Va.Code § 49-1-3(g)(1). More generally, " '[c]hild abuse and neglect' " or " 'child abuse or neglect' " refers to "physical injury, mental or emotional injury, sexual abuse, sexual exploitation, sale or attempted sale or negligent treatment or maltreatment of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian who is responsible for the child's welfare, under circumstances which harm or threaten the health and welfare of the child." W.Va.Code § 49-1-3(c).

None of these definitions encompasses the conduct of the Bs in this case, that is the voluntary relinquishment of parental rights incident to placement for adoption. Thus, we hold that a parent's relinquishment of his/her parental rights either in anticipation of future adoption proceedings or as a part of previously initiated adoption proceedings does not constitute abandonment for abuse and neglect purposes. See footnote 22 Accordingly, the circuit court erred in concluding that the Bs' intention to relinquish their parental rights to their children constituted abandonment or abuse and neglect. See footnote 23

Neither does the Bs' contemplated relinquishment constitute abandonment under the pertinent statutory provisions governing adoption. In fact, such a characterization would negate the entire intent and effect of the recent legislative amendments to the adoption statutes. First and foremost, the adoption procedures of this State require, as a necessary prerequisite to placing a child for adoption, the child's parent to execute either a relinquishment of parental rights or a consent to adoption. W.Va.Code § 48- 4-3 (1997) (Supp.1997) provides exceptions to the relinquishment/consent requirement only where a parent's parental rights have previously been terminated; where the parent has abandoned his/her child as that term is defined in the adoption statutes; where the spouse of one parent is seeking to adopt that parent's child; or where the parent is found to be under a disability and is incapable of granting such relinquishment or consent. In every other instance, a relinquishment or consent is required before the adoption may proceed. See footnote 24 Therefore, because none of these exceptions exempts the Bs from the relinquishment requirement, they must execute a relinquishment of their parental rights as a prerequisite to re-placing their Russian children for adoption. Nevertheless, under the circuit court's characterization of relinquishment, the Bs could be charged with abuse and neglect simply by adhering to the statutory requirements for adoption. We simply cannot approve such an ironic result.

Furthermore, the adoption laws specifically define abandonment as that term is used in the context of adoption proceedings. As this definition pertains to the facts presently before us:

> (a) Abandonment of a child over the age of six m onths shall be presum ed when the birth parent:
> (1) Fails to financially support the ch ild within the m eans of the birth parent; and
> (2) Fails to visit or otherwise com municate with the child when he or she knows where the child resides, is physi cally and financially able to do so and is not prevented from doing so by the person or authorized agency having the care or custody of the child; Provided, That such failure to act continues uninterrupted for a period of six months immediately preceding the filing of the adoption petition.

W.Va.Code § 48-4-3c(a) (1997) (Supp.1997). Again, these criteria for abandonment do not comport with the fact pattern of the case presently before us. None of the elements of abandonment as recited above is present in the instant case. The Bs have not failed to financially support the children and, in fact, had arranged to pay the Ss for caring for the children during the initial period of respite care. Neither have the Bs failed to visit or otherwise communicate with their children for a period lasting six months. At the time the Ss filed the abuse and neglect petition, the Bs had attempted to retrieve their children from the S household, but their efforts were thwarted by the Ss' procurement of an ex parte order of temporary custody. Therefore, the circuit court's finding that the Bs' intention to relinquish their parental rights constituted abandonment is erroneous under the adoption statutes' definition of that term.

Finally, and perhaps most telling of the legislative intent underlying the statutory adoption laws of this State, is the fact that the Legislature amended virtually all of this State's pre-existing adoption law during its last legislative session. Despite these extensive amendments, though, the Legislature declined to characterize either a relinquishment or a consent, or the contemplation thereof, as either abandonment or abuse and neglect. Given the sweeping changes, it seems that had the Legislature intended such a result, it could have, and would have, effectuated such a change in conjunction with the other adoption amendments. However, it did not. Therefore, we can glean a legislative intent to permit a parent to relinquish his/her parental rights without being subject to abuse and neglect charges on the basis of abandonment.

The peculiar facts and circumstances of the instant case suggest that the only remedy available to the Bs is the writ of prohibition which they today seek. They have no other adequate remedy. If we deny the writ and permit the underlying abuse and neglect proceedings to continue to a final resolution, the children would be in judicial limbo for months, possibly even years. Further aggravating this scenario is the fact that the Bs are not seeking reunification with these children. Although the vast majority of abuse and neglect proceedings contemplate a parental improvement period in the hopes that the conditions of abuse and neglect can be eradicated, such proceedings in the instant case would be futile as the Bs ultimately desire to regain custody of the children for the sole purpose of relinquishing their parental rights and re-placing them for adoption. Therefore, given the unique circumstances of this case, we find no other remedy to be adequate, and we deem prohibition to be necessary to provide the petitioners with the requested relief.

III.
CONCLUSION

In conclusion, we cannot emphasize enough the calamitous impact that the characterization of relinquishment of parental rights for adoption purposes as abandonment or as abuse and neglect would have upon the adoption law of this State. Were we to construe such a relinquishment, or, as in this case, an intent to effectuate a future relinquishment, as abandonment, we would inevitably be opening the floodgates for abuse and neglect petitions. No more would birth mothers and other parents unable to care for their children be permitted to consider adoption as an option for fear that even the mere thought of relinquishment would permit them to be charged with abuse and neglect. And, as noted above, the recent legislative amendments to this State's adoption law would be rendered virtually meaningless with the likely curtailment of adoptions altogether. Therefore, while we can applaud the Bs' initial decision to accept these children into their home and can accept their decision that they can no longer care for these children, we simply cannot, in good conscience, find that their respect for the best interests of these children, which, of necessity, includes the relinquishment of their parental rights, constitutes either abandonment or abuse and neglect.

Thus, for the foregoing reasons, we find that the circuit court erred in concluding that the petitioners' intent to relinquish their parental rights constituted abandonment. Accordingly, we grant as moulded the petition for writ of prohibition and direct the circuit court to re-vest custody of the children in the petitioners. See footnote 25 We further instruct the petitioners and the DHHR to immediately complete preparations and to implement such final arrangements as are necessary for the prompt relinquishment and adoptive re-placement of the children through the Gladney Center in order that these children may finally have a permanent adoptive home in the United States. See footnote 26

Writ granted as moulded.

Footnote: 1 We adhere to our usual practice in family law cases involving sensitive matters and do not use the last names of the parties. See State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W.Va. 555, 559 n. 2, 490 S.E.2d 642, 646 n. 2 (1997); Elmer Jimmy S. v. Kenneth B., 199 W.Va. 263, 264 n. 1, 483 S.E.2d 846, 847 n. 1 (1997); In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 226 n. 1, 470 S.E.2d 177, 180 n. 1 (1996).

Footnote: 2 Hereinafter, for ease of reference, the parties will be referred to by their last initials (e.g., the Bs and the Ss).

Footnote: 3 Mrs. B does not speak Russian; Mr. B speaks limited Russian.

Footnote: 4 The possibility that these children may have emotional difficulties was of particular concern to the B family given the various emotional problems suffered by children who have lived in orphanages prior to their adoption.

Footntoe: 5 The children's ages are as follows: Anatoli Josef is nine years old; Natasha Colette is eight years old; Alevhnia Marie is seven years old; and Olya Tess is six years old.

Footnote: 6 The record indicates that the Bs have three other children who joined their family by adoption.

Footnote: 7 The Bs deny allegations that they are pursuing litigation against the Gladney Center as a result of this alleged misrepresentation, and state that they have not filed, and do not intend to pursue, a "wrongful adoption" suit against Gladney.

Footnote: 8 Among the bizarre behavior exhibited by the four Russian siblings, the Bs cite "pack behavior"; fighting with and biting of each other and the Bs' other children; self-abuse; soiling their clothes; and various instances of violence and rage.

Footnote: 9Typically, "respite care" envisions the short-term placement of a child outside of the child's home environment in order to permit the child's parent(s) or guardian(s) and the child a temporary reprieve from a stressful familial situation. Respite care is often sought by families who have children with severe physical, emotional, or mental difficulties as a type of "cooling off" period before the family relationship becomes irreparably damaged. Although foster care also involves the placement of a child outside of his/her home environment, "foster care" generally contemplates a more lengthy period of separation between a child and his/her family. Foster care is often employed as a temporary placement for children whose parent(s) or guardian(s) have been charged with child abuse and/or neglect or who are awaiting final adoptive placement.

Footnote: 10 It appears from the record that, at the time they accepted the four B children into their home for respite care, the Ss already had seven children in their home who had joined their family by adoption.

Footnote: 11 The S family speaks minimal Russian because they previously had housed a child of Russian descent. In addition, a Russian exchange student, who speaks both English and Russian, is currently residing with the Ss.

Footnote: 12The Ss represent that only Mrs. S met the Bs when they brought their four children to the S home for respite care as Mr. S was not at home at that time.

Footnote: 13 The Bs had, in fact, sought treatment for their four Russian children from a mental health professional in the Parkersburg area. They were denied services, however, when the professional ascertained the nature of the children's problems and determined that he could not treat them.

Footnote: 14 By contrast, the Ss claim that, although they had agreed to continue providing respite care for the Bs' four children, the parties had not agreed upon an ending date for such care.

Footnote: 15 Mrs. S claims that she originally had planned to take the four B children to the library in addition to her other children, but, at the last minute, was concerned that she could not handle all of the children by herself. Mr. S then agreed to take the four B children for ice cream. He claims that he did not stop when the Bs attempted to "flag him down" because he had never met them and did not know who they were.

Footnote: 16 An affidavit by Mrs. S attached to the emergency custody order indicates that the S family wished to "safeguard the well-being" of the four B children and intended to "file a Petition seeking [their] adoption."

Footnote: 17 The record indicates that the DHHR could not approve the S home as an appropriate foster care placement for the four B children, in part, because the number of children living in the S household exceeded the permissible number of children contemplated by the DHHR's foster care standards. As a result of the DHHR's concerns over potential liability problems under these circumstances, Judge Hill vested both legal and physical custody of the B children in the Ss.

Footnote: 18 Since our acceptance of this original jurisdiction proceeding, we have received a report by the DHHR summarizing that agency's inquiry into the parties' allegations. The report indicates that the S family has an acquaintance who is originally from Moscow and who served as an interpreter during the case worker's interview with the four B children. The children reported various instances of emotional cruelty and physical mistreatment while residing in the B household. Believing the interpreter to be biased in favor of the S family, the case worker requested a second, neutral interpreter to assist with a second interview of the children. The second interview provided some indication that the children had been coached to relate various stories of abusive treatment and inappropriate discipline to the case worker if they wanted to remain in the S household. The case worker further determined that the B family and the Gladney Center had been cooperating to ensure appropriate treatment for the children's attachment displacement disorder upon their re-placement in Texas. Gladney also appears to have found a new adoptive family for the children that would permit the four siblings to remain together. The new adoptive family seems to be very eager to accept these children into their home and appears to understand and appreciate the difficulties that may arise in caring for these emotionally challenged children. In addition, the new adoptive family has demonstrated a great appreciation for the children's ethnic heritage as they have been familiarizing themselves with Russian culture and learning to speak Russian. Further evidence indicates that the B family has received approval from the West Virginia Deputy Compact Administrator of the Interstate Compact on the Placement of Children to proceed with the proposed relinquishment and re-placement. Finally, inquiry into the appropriateness of the S family as a potential adoptive family for the four children led the case worker to believe that if the S family had requested, through the DHHR, to provide foster care for these children, the DHHR would not have permitted such an arrangement. Inquiry into the S family's history indicated several previous allegations of abuse and neglect against that family and against children residing in that home, although the record does not indicate that any of these charges is currently under investigation.

Footnote: 19 At this juncture, we note that the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources [DHHR] participated in the presentation of this original jurisdiction proceeding before this Court. In addition, Childplace, Inc., and Burlington United Methodist Family Services, Inc., appeared as Amici Curiae herein. As both the DHHR and Amici Curiae present arguments concurring with those asserted by the petitioners, we will hereinafter refer collectively to all of these parties' arguments as those advanced by the Bs.

Footnote: 20 The Bs further challenge the Ss' standing in this case claiming that the Ss had a contractual agreement whereby they agreed not to interfere with the parental rights of those parents whose children had been placed with them for respite care. Because the existence of such a contract is not clear from the record presently before this Court and because we can resolve this matter on other grounds, we decline the Bs' invitation to address further this particular argument.

Footnote: 21 We do not, at this juncture, pass upon the adequacy of the allegations of abuse and neglect contained in the Ss' petition. Instead, we note generally that while such factual allegations may not sufficiently allege abuse and neglect at the time a particular petition is filed, the petitioner may later amend his/her petition to include more specific grounds. See W. Va. R. Proc. for Child Abuse & Neglect Rule 19.

Footnote: 22 We note, though, that our holding today is in no way intended to abrogate our prior holding that a parent may not relinquish his/her parental rights while he/she is the respondent or defendant in a child abuse and neglect proceeding. See Syl. pt. 2, Alonzo v. Jacqueline F., 191 W.Va. 248, 445 S.E.2d 189 (1994) ("Where a child abuse and neglect proceeding has been filed against a parent, such parent may not confer any rights on a third party by executing a consent to adopt during the pendency of the proceeding.").

Footnote: 23 While the Ss bolster their argument that the B s' intended conduct constitutes abandonment rising to the level of abuse and neglect by referring to the "imminent danger" phraseology contained in W.Va.Code § 49-1-3(e), we cannot base our decision upon this rationale. The situations in which this phrase is utilized throughout the abuse and neglect statutes do not contemplate the fact pattern presently before this Court. See, e.g., W.Va.Code § 49-2D-3 (1989) (Repl.Vol.1996) (dispensing with pre-removal hearing requirement when child is in "imminent danger"); W.Va.Code § 49-5-8 (1997) (Supp.1997) (permitting a law enforcement official to take a child into custody under emergency circumstances where the child is in "imminent danger"); W.Va.Code § 49-6-3 (1996) (Repl.Vol.1996) (permitting award of temporary custody where child is in "imminent danger," and there exist no reasonable alternatives to removing child from his/her home). For the same reasons, we cannot adopt the Ss' argument that the Bs' intention to relinquish their parental rights amounts to mental and emotional injury of the children because such relinquishment would, necessarily, result in the uprooting of the four children from the S household and their relocation to some unknown and unfamiliar new residence. Although the Ss cite numerous case authorities for this contention, we simply cannot agree that the abuse and neglect law of this State contemplates, either as abandonment or as abuse and neglect, a parent's voluntary relinquishment of his/her child for adoption.

Footnote: 24 Although the statutory waiting period, which requires a birth parent to wait seventy-two hours after the birth of his/her child before executing a relinquishment or consent, is not directly applicable to the instant facts, the holding of the circuit court in the proceedings below potentially affects this statutory requirement, as well. See W.Va.Code § 48-4-3a (1997) (Supp.1997). Were we to permit the circuit court's characterization of an intent to relinquish parental rights as grounds for abuse and neglect to persist, this construction could conceivably permit an abuse and neglect petition to be filed against a birth parent, contemplating adoption, before the statutory waiting period has expired.

Footnote: 25 We commend the guardian ad litem for her appearance in this action and appreciate her efforts on behalf of the children involved in this case. Nonetheless, we are unable to abide by her suggestion that the best interests of the children demand their continued placement with the Ss. Not only are we troubled by the numerous allegations of abuse and neglect against the Ss, and the guardian's failure to address these charges in her recommendation, but we also are wary of the legal precedent that may result from such a holding in this case.

Footnote: 26 The speedy resolution of this matter in terms of the petitioners' relinquishment of their parental rights and the children's prompt re-placement is imperative as we typically attempt to resolve quickly those matters involving abuse and neglect and child custody. See, e.g., W.Va.Code § 49-6-2(d) (1996) (Repl.Vol.1996) (encouraging prompt resolution of child abuse and neglect proceedings); Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. at 245 n. 7, 246, 470 S.E.2d at 199 n. 7, 200 (admonishing that child custody matters should be resolved "in a timely fashion in order to minimize the trauma to innocent children"); West Virginia Dep't of Health & Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. David L., 192 W.Va. 663, 671, 453 S.E.2d 646, 654 (1994) (ordering expedited resolution of child custody issue); Syl. pts. 1 and 5, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991) (emphasizing priority of child abuse and neglect cases to safeguard the interested child's well-being).

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Human Services], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition ... by clear and convincing proof.' The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden." PER CURIAM:

Peggy F. See footnote 1 appeals from an order of the Circuit Court of Hardy County which terminated her parental rights to five of her minor children and placed a sixth child in the temporary custody of the Department of Human Services (DHS). See footnote 2 The circuit court found that Peggy F. was guilty of neglect and abuse of her children and that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be corrected in the near future. We agree and affirm the order of the circuit court.

Peggy F. is the mother of eleven children, six of whom are the focus of the current litigation. She has a history of involvement with DHS dating back to at least 1982. She has previously had her parental rights to two other children terminated.

DHS has received repeated referrals regarding the living conditions at Peggy F.'s home and the behavior of her children. Various criminal acts by the children have been reported, including assault, attacking neighbors with rocks and belts, shoplifting, and fighting. DHS workers visiting the home have found it to be filthy, without heat, and not adequately safeguarded for young children. Neighbors have reported that the children beg for food and dig through garbage. Two of the youngest children were found wandering outside in the cold in their nightclothes and wet diapers, wearing no shoes. The small children have been seen playing in the street and have been found several blocks from home without supervision. Neighbors report that the children are often left at home alone.

In April of 1988, Peggy F. voluntarily placed the six children who are the subject of this litigation in the custody of DHS in order to enter St. Joseph's Hospital for psychiatric treatment. She remained at St. Joseph's until May 11, 1988.

The children, ranging in age from one-and-one-half to fifteen years of age, were assigned to foster care and group homes, as their individual needs dictated. At the time of their placement, the children all demonstrated emotional problems. These problems variously manifested themselves in nightmares, bedwetting, overeating, thumb sucking, crying, fear of adults, fear of males, fear of hot items, and extreme resistance to authority. During their time in the custody of DHS, most of the children have shown some improvement.

On May 18, 1988, DHS filed a petition for temporary custody in the Circuit Court of Hardy County, alleging abuse and neglect of the children. See footnote 3 A hearing on the petition was held on July 7, 1988, at which time Peggy F. was granted a six-month improvement period in accordance with W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984). See footnote 4 DHS was ordered to prepare and submit a family case plan as required by W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3 (1984). See footnote 5

The family case plan was filed on August 3, 1988. The plan required: (1) psychological evaluation of Peggy F., with possible amendments to the plan to be made based upon the findings, (2) visitation with the children by Peggy F., (3) maintenance of specified housekeeping standards by Peggy F., (4) participation by Steve D. (Peggy F.'s new husband) in specified aspects of the plan, (5) resolution of Peggy F.'s shoplifting charge followed by continued compliance with the law, (6) eradication of any drugs or alcohol in Peggy F.'s home, and nonattendance by the subject children at any functions where alcohol or drugs were used, (7) submission by Peggy F. of a child-care plan for all the children during her working hours, (8) maintenance of stable employment by Peggy F. and Steve D. and submission of a monthly budget, (9) procurement of a home with adequate living space to accommodate the children, and (10) completion of a parenting skills program by Peggy F. and Steve D.

Hearings on the success of the improvement period were held on May 16 and 22, 1989. At the hearings, DHS contended that, although Peggy F. may have minimally met the requirements of the case plan, she had made no substantive changes and would not provide a suitable home for the children. DHS presented testimony of the evaluating psychologist who opined that Peggy F. had an antisocial personality and that symptoms of a similar disorder were apparent in several of the children. In addition, several social workers testified as to Peggy F.'s inability or unwillingness to properly act as a parent for her children. Peggy F. argued that she had substantially complied with the requirements of the case plan. She testified on her own behalf and offered the testimony of Steve D.

On June 6, 1989, the circuit court entered an order terminating Peggy F.'s parental rights to five of the six children. The exception was Cassaundra S., who was over the age of fourteen and did not want Peggy F.'s rights terminated. In compliance with W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) (1988), See footnote 6 the court did not terminate her mother's rights over her objection. She was to remain in the temporary custody of DHS until her eighteenth birthday.

The court found that Peggy F. was guilty of neglect and abuse of her children and that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be substantially corrected in the near future. The court believed that, although Peggy F. had made some changes to comply with the case plan, there was no change in her underlying attitude to indicate that it would be in the best interest of the children not to terminate her parental rights.

Peggy F. appeals from that order of the circuit court, asserting that the weight of the evidence does not support its findings and conclusions. We disagree. There was ample evidence offered to support the court's conclusion that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be substantially corrected in the near future.

Stephen Townsend, the evaluating psychologist, noted in his report that Peggy F. accepts treatment or help when required to do so, but reverts to her earlier behaviors shortly after the termination of any such program. He diagnosed her as having a personality disorder resulting in antisocial behavior and an inability to conform to social norms. After conducting psychological tests on the children, he found them to have extensive emotional problems. However, the younger the child, the less severe the problems. This led him to conclude that the children were taking on Peggy F.'s personality disorder. Maxine Kessell, a social worker who had worked with Peggy F. for many years, testified that Peggy F. would do well for a period, then slip back into poor parenting. She stated that she had not noted much improvement in Peggy F.'s parenting abilities over the years. The guardian ad litem who represented the children recommended against continuation of the improvement period and agreed that termination of the parental rights was in the best interest of the children.

DHS is not obligated, as Peggy F. would have us believe, to prove its case by showing that she failed to comply with the family case plan. In Syllabus Point 1 of In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981), we held:

> "W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Human Services], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition ... by clear and convincing proof.' The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden."

DHS was, therefore, entitled to prove its case by showing that, despite Peggy F.'s compliance with specific aspects of the case plan, she had failed to improve her overall attitude and approach to parenting. The circuit court did not err in finding Peggy F. to be an unfit parent.

The circuit court complied with the requirements of the statute in terminating Peggy F.'s parental rights. She requested, and was granted, a six-month improvement period, in accordance with W.Va.Code, 49-6- 2(b) (1984). See footnote 7 As we noted in Syllabus Point 3 of State ex rel. West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987):

> "Under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), when an improvement period is authorized, then the court by order shall require the Department of Human Services to prepare a family case plan pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3 (1984)."

Such a plan was prepared for Peggy F. and filed with the circuit court. The purpose of the family case plan, as set forth in W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3(a), as we emphasized in Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. at ----, 356 S.E.2d at 186, " 'is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening these problems.' " (Footnote omitted). The improvement period is granted to allow the parent an opportunity to remedy the existing problems. The case plan simply provides an approach to solving them. As is clear from the language of the statute, and as DHS argued, the ultimate goal is restoration of a stable family environment, not simply meeting the requirements of the case plan.

For the foregoing reasons, we affirm the decision of the Circuit Court of Hardy County.

Affirmed.

Footnote: 1 We follow our traditional practice in domestic relations and other cases which involve sensitive facts and do not use the last names of the parties so as not to stigmatize them or their children. See, e.g., Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W.Va. 710, 356 S.E.2d 464 (1987); West Virginia Dep't of Human Serv. v. La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W.Va. 330, 332 S.E.2d 632 (1985).

Footnote: 2 The fathers of the children, James F. and Donald S., were also named in this action at the circuit court level. James F. initially attempted to gain custody of the children, but ultimately abandoned that cause and took no part in any further proceedings in this matter. Donald S. never made any appearance. The circuit court took no action regarding the parental rights of these men, and they are, therefore, not parties to this appeal.

Footnote: 3 During her stay in the hospital, Peggy F. had been evicted from her home. Although she sought the return of her children who were then in the custody of DHS, she had no home to offer them. This apparently caused DHS to institute the neglect petition.

Footnote: 4 W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), provides:
"In any proceeding under this article, the parents or custodians may, prior to final hearing, move to be allowed an improvement period of three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based. The court shall allow one such improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof, but may require temporary custody in the state department or other agency during the improvement period. An order granting such improvement period shall require the department to prepare and submit to the court a family case plan in accordance with the provisions of section three [§ 49-6D-3], article six-D of this chapter."

Footnote: 5 W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3 (1984), provides, in pertinent part:
"(a) Within the limits of funds available, the department of human services shall develop a family case plan for every family wherein a person has been referred to the department after being allowed an improvement period under the provisions of subsection (b), section two, or subsection (c), section five [§ 49-6-2(b) or § 49-6-5(c)], article six of this chapter, and for each family referred to the department for supervision and treatment following a determination by a court that a parent, guardian or custodian in such family has abused or neglected a child.... The family case plan is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening those problems. Every family case plan prepared by the department shall contain the following: "(1) A listing of specific, measurable, realistic goals to be achieved;

"(2) An arrangement of goals into an order of priority;
"(3) A listing of the problems that will be addressed by each goal;
"(4) A specific description of how the assigned caseworker or caseworkers and the abusing parent, guardian or custodian will achieve each goal;
"(5) A description of the departmental and community resources to be used in implementing the proposed actions and services;
"(6) A list of the services which will be provided;
"(7) Time targets for the achievement of goals or portions of goals;
"(8) An assignment of tasks to the abusing or neglecting parent, guardian or custodian, to the caseworker or caseworkers, and to other participants in the planning process; and
"(9) A designation of when and how often tasks will be performed.
"(b) In cases where the family has been referred to the department by a court under the provisions of this chapter, and further action before the court is pending, the family case plan described in subsection (a) of this section shall be furnished to the court within thirty days after the entry of the order referring the case to the department, and shall be available to counsel for the parent, guardian or custodian and counsel for the child or children."

Footnote: 6 W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) (1988), provides, in pertinent part:
"Notwithstanding any other provisions of this article, the permanent parental rights shall not be terminated if a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court, objects to such termination."

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia

In re R. J. M.

No. 14612

March 25, 1980 and May 9, 1980.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 (1977) will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.

2. Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 (1977) may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) (1977) that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.

C. Blaine Myers, Parkersburg, for R. J. M.

Chauncey H. Browning, Jr., Atty. Gen., Billie Gray, Asst. Atty. Gen., Charleston, for Circuit Court, Wood County.

NEELY, Chief Justice:

This is an appeal from an order of the Circuit Court of Wood County terminating parental rights. The appellant parents make general assignments about the insufficiency of the evidence and argue that the circuit court should have granted them an improvement period pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6- 5(a)(4) (1977) and 49-6-5(c) (1977). Since their court appointed attorney did not move for an improvement period pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6- 2(b) (1977) the appellants alleged ineffective assistance of counsel. We disagree and affirm.

R.J.M., the child involved in this proceeding, was born on 8 January 1978. Her mother was 16 years old at the time of R.J.M.'s birth and had left the tenth grade about a year earlier when she was pregnant with her first child Shawn. Shawn was also the subject of a neglect petition at the time of the proceedings under consideration here regarding R.J.M., and while the record does not develop the facts surrounding Shawn's removal from the home, it is apparent that he had been placed under the supervision of the Department of Welfare. R.J.M.'s father is an unskilled laborer suffering from a nervous condition.

In early March 1978, Gladys Foster, a mother of three and a grandmother, acquainted with the parents in this case because one of her daughters was living with them, noticed that R.J.M. looked ill and hungry. On her next visit, Mrs. Foster brought a jar of baby food and a jar of milk, which she fed to R.J.M. Mrs. Foster noticed no feeding problems or vomiting and in response to Mrs. Foster's suggestion that R.J.M. looked ill the mother promised to take her daughter to a doctor.

At about the same time, Isodene Alkire, a Department of Welfare homemaker who was working in the subject home, became concerned about R.J.M.'s health. She noticed that the child looked pale and unhealthy and observed that the mother had stopped giving her baby the prescribed formula and was substituting a mixture of Karo syrup, water and milk. When Mrs. Alkire asked the mother if she had discussed this change with her pediatrician she replied that she had not, but had made the change because the baby was spitting up the formula. Mrs. Alkire reported her concern to Larry Lowe of the Department of Welfare Child Protective Services Office who had been working with the parents since December 1977 concerning problems with their older child Shawn. On 3 March 1978, both Mrs. Alkire and Mr. Lowe visited the subject home and discussed with the mother the necessity for proper feeding of her child.

On 15 March 1978, Mrs. Alkire came to the subject home and took the mother and R.J.M. to Camden Clark Hospital in Parkersburg where R.J.M. was seen by Dr. Robert Crooks, a pediatrician, who found the baby to be suffering from gastroenteritis, dehydration and "failure to thrive" (malnutrition). R.J.M.' s skin showed the wrinkling and dryness common to undernourished children, a remarkable condition since R.J.M. had been a healthy normal seven pound eleven ounce baby at birth. R.J.M. had gained only one ounce in the two months since birth. The history given by the mother to Dr. Crooks was that her baby had been healthy until three days earlier when she developed diarrhea, began vomiting, and refused to eat. This was the first time the infant had been seen by a doctor since her birth.

R.J.M. was discharged from the hospital two weeks later, by which time her weight had increased by almost half to ten pounds ten ounces. Mr. Lowe, alerted by hospital staff members to the mother's apparent unwillingness to participate in a feeding program planned by Dr. Crooks, tried to discuss the matter with the mother before she took R.J.M. home, but found her uncooperative. He explained that the mother appeared not to understand the need for consistent feeding.

Mr. Lowe sought to maintain contact with the family following R.J.M.'s discharge from the hospital and during the next several weeks he made numerous attempts to visit the mother and R.J.M. which were to no avail. Remembering that the mother was to bring R.J.M. for an appointment with Dr. Crooks on 4 April, he went to the doctor's office to await her arrival. The appointment was never kept and when asked about it the mother explained that she had forgotten. Mr. Lowe waited for the mother again at Dr. Crook's office on 7 April but again she did not come. On 10 April Mr. Lowe discovered that the parents had moved from their previous address. Three days later he located the mother at the home of a relative, in Belpre, Ohio.

Despite his many attempts to remain in touch with the family, Mr. Lowe was unable to locate them again until 24 April 1978 when he received a telephone call from Mr. and Mrs. Harry Love of Parkersburg, West Virginia. They informed Mr. Lowe that R.J.M. had been left in their care and was ill and in need of medical attention. R.J.M.'s parents could not be located and Mr. Lowe responded by arranging for the Department of Welfare to be given emergency temporary custody.

Later that same day, Mr. Lowe received a telephone call from the mother. She declined to divulge her whereabouts, but explained that the purpose of her call was to inform Mr. Lowe and the Department of Welfare that R.J.M. was in Ohio. She expressed dismay when Mr. Lowe informed her that her daughter was in the custody of the Department of Welfare and in a foster home. That same day R.J.M. was seen by Dr. Crooks who discovered that she was not ill but weighed only ten pounds five ounces, a loss of five ounces since her discharge from the hospital less than one month earlier.

Mr. Lowe tried eleven times during the following weeks to contact the parents in order to discuss R.J.M. with them, all to no avail. On 12 May 1978 he filed a neglect petition on behalf of R.J.M. and at the preliminary hearing the circuit court found probable cause to believe that the allegations in the petition were correct and ordered custody to continue in the Department of Welfare. At the close of the preliminary hearing counsel for the parents expressed his intention to move for an improvement period. The court scheduled a hearing on the motion, but at the hearing the motion was withdrawn without explanation and psychiatric examinations of both parents requested instead.

The adjudicatory hearing, held on 9 June 1978, resulted in a termination of the parental rights of the appellants. The court found by clear and convincing proof that R.J.M.'s illness, malnutrition and abandonment were the result of her parents' refusal to care and provide for the child and that there was > . . . no reasonable likelihood (sic) that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future as ar e necessary for the welfare of the child in that the parents have refused and not responded to or > followed through with a reasonable reha bilitative effort of social, medical and other rehabilitative agencies designed to reduce and prevent the neglect of the child evidenced by the continua tion of substantial and repeated acts of neglect after efforts were made by the West Virginia Departm ent of Welfare, by the nurses at the hospital a nd by various other such agencies to supply the needed assistance to the family to avoid the neglect.

> . . . that the mother is of average to above average intelligence, the father is of average intelligence, both of whom are able to grasp the nature and character of their failure to properly care for the child and the consequences thereof, and are able to understand a nd respond to the assistance, support, and help offered to them by the various child welfare agencies, and that the parents have, as disclosed by the evid ence, willfully failed and refused to accept such services to th e substantial detriment of the health, welfare and wellbeing of the child, and the substa ntial endangerment of the child' s physical condition.

We conclude that the Court's findings of fact are amply supported by the evidence and further conclude from the records that every possible opportunity was given to these parents to behave in a responsible way toward their child. While the record does not reveal trial counsel's continued insistence upon an improvement period, the record does reveal that such an insistence, under the facts and circumstances of this case, would have been a vain act.

Starvation is a particularly insidious type of child abuse; if the parents in the case before us had routinely flogged their child to within an inch of her life the legitimacy of the trial court's action would never been questioned. An infant less than a year old is at the utter mercy of the adults around her and unless her needs are anticipated by the parents they will be unmet, since the child is incapable of articulating her demands. W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1977) provides:

> In any proceeding under this article, the parents or custodians may, prior to final hearing, move to be allowed an improvement period of three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based. The c ourt shall allow such an improvement period unless it finds com pelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof, but m ay require tem porary custody in the state departm ent or another agency during the improvement period. (Emphasis supplied by Court.)

Certainly it must have been obvious to all concerned that when these parents: (1) had permitted the child to come very close to starvation which was only averted by the intervention of outside authorities; (2) had contumaciously declined to follow the advice of qualified physicians and the Department of Welfare after the child's life had been jeopardized; and (3) had negligently or deliberately missed doctor appointments and concealed themselves from representatives of the Department of Welfare, a reasonable person would conclude that permitting this child to return to their custody would threaten the child's life. In a case such as this where return of the child to the parents might result in their absconding the jurisdiction and removing the child from effective supervision, there are certainly compelling reasons to justify the denial of an improvement period.

In addition, where a child is under the age of three immediate termination without an intervening period employing a less drastic alternative is more reasonable than in other cases. A child of that age has a far greater susceptibility to illness; the child is not as irrevocably attached to his parents; and, numerous placements may severely retard the child's ability to form lasting attachments. At the early stage of development a child needs close interaction with an adult fully committed to helping the child's emotional as well as physical development See footnote 1 and, it is difficult for foster parents to fulfill this role because they often fear forming a deep emotional attachment to the child. See footnote 2

Furthermore, this Court finds that the trial court did not abuse its discretion or deny the appellants due process when it selected the most drastic remedy provided by W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 (1977), namely termination of parental rights, because all of the requirements for finding that "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" as set forth in Code, 49-6-5(b) (1977) were met. That section provides that no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected shall mean that:

> . . . (2) the parent or parents have willfully refused or are presently unwilling to cooperate in the development of a reasonable foster care plan designed to lead to the child's return to the parent or parents; (3) the parent or parents have not responded to or followed through with reasonable rehabilitative efforts of social, medical, mental health or other rehabilitative agencies designed to reduce or prevent the neglect or abuse of the child, as evidenced by the continuation of substantial or repeated acts of neglect or abuse after the provision of such services; . . .

For the reasons set forth above the judgment of the Circuit Court of Wood County is affirmed.

Affirmed.

MILLER, Justice, dissenting:

I dissent, since I believe the majority has ignored testimony in the record which casts substantial doubt upon the claim that this infant girl has been neglected. Furthermore, the majority has also ignored the order of precedence mandated by W.Va.Code, 49-6-5, by upholding the imposition of the most severe statutory disposition, that of total, permanent severance of the parental rights, when less restrictive alternatives could adequately protect the child.

The majority's statement of the facts of this case is not supported by the record. Foremost, it is important to note that as a whole, the medical testimony contradicts, rather than supports, a finding of neglect.

The infant's physician was Robert D. Crooks, a Parkersburg pediatrician. Dr. Crooks provided the only medical testimony in the record. He examined the infant on two occasions, first on March 15, 1978, when the mother, accompanied by Isodene Alkire, a welfare worker, brought the baby to the hospital for treatment. Dr. Crooks found the two-month-old infant to be suffering from "gastroenteritis, dehydration, and failure to thrive." He explained that gastroenteritis is a virus, "a condition of the intestinal tract characterized by either vomiting or diarrhea and usually by weight loss due to loss of fluid." Rather than attributing the infant's illness to starvation resulting from a pattern of parental neglect, as the majority characterized his testimony, Dr. Crooks found the condition to be wholly attributable to the onset of gastroenteritis a few days prior to his examination of the child. See footnote 1

Dr. Crooks' second examination of the infant was on April 24, 1978, the day the Welfare Department seized custody of the child and brought her to Dr. Crooks for examination. Dr. Crooks examined the infant on that date and found her to be in good health. See footnote 2

Despite the favorable medical report, the Department of Welfare kept the baby and initiated proceedings to terminate parental rights. As of the time of final disposition on June 9, 1978, the infant had not been taken to a physician again. Dr. Crooks' testimony remains unrebutted by any other medical evidence. Thus, the State has terminated the parental rights of an infant found to be in good health, on the ground that the infant was starving.

In light of the fact that the medical testimony is favorable to the parents, the remaining lay testimony faces a heavy burden in order to nullify the medical testimony and meet the statutory requirement of abuse or neglect "proven by clear and convincing proof." W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c).

Three persons in addition to Dr. Crooks and the infant's parents testified at the termination hearing: Gladys Foster, an acquaintance of the family who had observed the infant on several occasions, and Isodene Alkire and Larry Lowe, both employees of the Department of Welfare.

The majority accurately describes Mrs. Foster's testimony insofar as it includes her impression that the infant appeared ill and hungry. The majority, however, ignores her testimony relating to her observations that the infant always appeared clean and freshly clothed. See footnote 3 Thus, the only negative aspect of Mrs. Foster's testimony, that the infant appeared to be ill and hungry, was contradicted by Dr. Crooks, an acknowledged expert.

The majority states that Mrs. Alkire "became concerned about R. J. M.'s health," and "noticed that the child looked pale and unhealthy." Mrs. Alkire's testimony, however, contains no remarks to this effect. Her only testimony is a brief narration of a conversation she had with the infant's mother concerning its diet. The testimony gives no indication of apparent illness or lack of health, or other evidence of the presence or absence of proper care.

The remaining testimony in the record is that of Mr. Lowe, who described his difficulty over a period of time in locating the family. It is important to note, however, that nothing in the record indicates that the family was under any legal obligation to maintain contact with the Department of Welfare regarding the infant. There is no testimony that the family was enrolled in a Department of Welfare program beyond the fact that the Department had initiated proceedings to gain custody of the infant's older brother. See footnote 4

The record is clear that the Department of Welfare had nothing to do with the infant's admission to the hospital on March 15. This admission was voluntarily undertaken by the mother, and the infant was released from the hospital to the mother on March 28. Most of the contact that Mr. Lowe had with the case was after the baby was released from the hospital.

It is apparent that the mother and Mr. Lowe had not maintained a good relationship regarding the infant. The presence of ill will might well be understood in light of the fact that Lowe was concurrently directing proceedings initiated by him for custody of the family's older child. The mother testified that she had attempted to elude Lowe because of her fear that the Department was also trying to take custody of R. J. M. a fear that cannot be considered groundless in light of the proceedings against the older child and the fact that the Department, upon locating the infant, did indeed seize custody and begin adoption proceedings, despite the medical findings of the infant's good health.

Because the medical testimony is favorable to the parents and the lay testimony is meager and equivocal, the finding of neglect by clear and convincing proof, as required by W.Va.Code, 49-6-2, is clearly erroneous.

Even if the finding had been correct, however, the dispositional requirements of W.Va.Code, 49-6-5, were violated. W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a), sets forth six possible dispositions following a petition for abuse or neglect of a child. See footnote 5 The dispositions are listed in order of least to most severe, and this statute requires the court to adhere to that order, giving precedence to the least restrictive alternative that is appropriate to the circumstances. The last alternative, termination of all parental rights, is proper only where the preceding five alternatives are inadequate to redress the situation and only "(u)pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future." W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a)(6). Even then, under W.Va.Code, 49-6- 5(b), in order to find "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected," the court must find one of five specific grounds to exist in order to sever all parental rights. See footnote 6

The record demonstrates that no such ground existed. First, there was no evidence that the parents were addicted to intoxicating liquor or drugs. W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b)(1). Second, it cannot be found that the parents "willfully refused" to cooperate in the "development of a reasonable foster care plan," since no such plan was ever offered them by the court. W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b)(2). Third, it cannot be charged that the parents refused to follow through "with reasonable rehabilitative efforts of social, medical, mental health or other rehabilitative agencies," since no such alternative was ever developed and offered to the parents. W.Va.Code, 49-6- 5(b)(3). Fourth, there is no showing that the parents abandoned the child. W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b)(4). Nor does the fifth ground exist, that the parents repeatedly or seriously physically abused the child. W.Va.Code, 49-6- 5(b)(5).

It is obvious from the foregoing statutory standards that with the exception of a finding of alcohol or drug abuse, abandonment or serious physical abuse, none of which were present in this case, the court is not empowered to sever the parental rights without some prior attempt at a rehabilitative program. In the present case, there is a complete lack of any such showing of a rehabilitative plan. Absent this, the majority is in clear error when it affirms the trial result.

The proper disposition, if we assume clear and convincing proof of neglect, would have been that the court fashion some type of rehabilitative program involving the parents and, if necessary, place the infant in the temporary custody of the Department of Welfare. Should the parents have refused to cooperate in the rehabilitative program, the court, at a later hearing, could have then made the determination to totally sever the parents' right.

The statutory expression of the parents' right to the least restrictive alternative before custody of their children can be permanently terminated is buttressed by constitutional grounds. In Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645, 651, 92 S.Ct. 1208, 1212-13, 31 L.Ed.2d 551, 558-59 (1972), the United States Supreme Court, in a related context, stated that:

> "It is plain that the interest of a pa rent in the com panionship, care, custody and m anagement of his or her childre n ' come(s) to this Court with a momentum for respect lacking when appeal is made to liberties which derive m erely from shifting econom ic arrangem ents.' Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77, 95, 69 S.Ct. 448, 458, 93 L.Ed. 513, 527 (10 A.L.R.2d 608) (1949) (Frankfurter, J., concurring).
> "The Court has frequently em phasized the importance of the family. The rights to conceive and to raise one' s children have been deem ed 'essential,' Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399, 43 S.Ct. 625, (626), 67 L.Ed. 1042, (1045), (29 A.L.R. 1446) (1923), ' basic civil rights of m an,' Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535, 541, 62 S.Ct. 1110, (1113), 86 L.Ed. 1655, 1660, (1942), and ' (r)ights far more precious . . . than property rights, ' May v. Anderson, 345 U.S. 528, 533, 73 S.Ct . 840, (843), 97 L.Ed. 1221, (1226) (1953). 'It is cardinal with us that th e custody, care and nurture of the child reside first in the parents, whose primary function and freedom include preparation for obligations the state can neither supply nor hinder.' Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158, 166, 64 S.Ct. 438, (442), 88 L.Ed. 645, (652) (1944). The integrity of the fam ily unit has found protection in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Am endment, Meyer v. Nebraska, supra, (262 U.S.) at 399, (43 S.Ct. at 626), (67 L.Ed. at 1045), the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Am endment, Skinner v. Oklahom a, supra, 316 U.S. at 541, 62 S.Ct. (1111) at 1113, (86 L.Ed. at 1660), and the Ninth Am endment, Griswold v. C onnecticut, 381 U.S. 479, 496, 85 S.Ct. 1678, 14 L.Ed.2d 510, (522) (1965) (Goldberg, J., concurring)."

The principles set forth in Stanley were acknowledged by this Court in a previous child neglect decision, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). In Willis, the Court added that "We hasten to affirm that Article III, Section 10 of the West Virginia Constitution in equal measure protects this fundamental right of parenthood. See In re: Simmons Children, 154 W.Va. 491, 177 S.E.2d 19 (1970)." (157 W.Va. at 237, 207 S.E.2d at 137).

Where the constitutionally protected interests of parenthood are at stake, overriding considerations permit impingement only to the minimum extent necessary to achieve the particular goal. See Note, Termination of Parental Rights and the Lesser Restrictive Alternative Doctrine, 12 Tulsa L.J. 528 (1977). The right to the least restrictive alternative in a child neglect proceeding relegates permanent termination of parental rights to the far end of a long list of alternative dispositions. See Derdeyn, Rogoff and Williams, Alternatives to Absolute Termination of Parental Rights After Long-Term Foster Care, 31 Vand.L.Rev. 1165 (1978); Wald, State Intervention on Behalf of "Neglected" Children: Standards for Removal of Children from Their Homes, Monitoring the Status of Children in Foster Care, and Termination of Parental Rights, 28 Stanford L.Rev. 623 (1976). These are the precise standards set out in W.Va.Code, 49-6-5, but the majority has chosen to ignore them.

A careful reading of the majority opinion in comparison with the case record and our law demonstrates that the majority's analysis is both cursory and mistaken on this vital issue. A great injustice has been visited upon both the parents and the child, and we have allowed it to become irrevocable.

I have been authorized to state that Justice McGraw joins me in this dissent.

Footnote: 1 "Q (By the prosecuting attorney) Now, from your examination and the history you took, Doctor, you were not able to reach an opinion as to the cause of this condition of the child on that date, were you? "A No. We assumed that it was a viral type of gastroenteritis, as most are.
"Q But that was you made that opinion based on other cases which you have observed?
"A Yes, and on the medical examination.
"Q (By the court) So I do understand you would the viral infection also be responsible for the dehydration and failure to survive (sic) and the weight of the child as you found it at that particular time?
"A Yes. Gastroenteritis is a cause of weight loss, and failure to thrive would be explained at that time from that immediate episode of gastroenteritis."

Footnote: 2 At the preliminary hearing on May 22, 1978, Dr. Crooks testified as follows:
"Q (By the prosecuting attorney) Since the child was released from the hospital on March 28th of this year, have you seen the child since?
"A Yes.
"Q And when was that?
"A I saw this child again on April the 24th, 1978.

"Q And what was the condition of the child on that day?
"A The child appeared to be active, in good health. I found at that time no disease.
"Q (By the attorney for the child) Between the time you saw her on the 15th and the time that you saw her again on April 24th, what in your opinion caused the change from all these feeding problems and so forth to active good health, in your opinion?
"A I think well, the absence of any viral disease plus the fact that the baby was on a different formula."

Footnote: 3 Mrs. Foster gave the following testimony at the preliminary hearing:
"Q Was the child clothed?
"A Yes. "Q When you saw it at all times?
"A Yes.
"Q What condition were his (sic) clothes in?
"A Clean.
"Q Clean?
"A They were.
"Q Did the child smell bad or look very
"A She just looked bad that is all.
"Q Was she dirty, the child?
"A She didn't look dirty to me."

Footnote: 4 The record contains scant information regarding the basis for the proceeding involving custody of the older child, other than the fact that it had been initiated.

Footnote: 5 W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a), provides:
"(a) Following a determination pursuant to section two (s 49-6-2) of this article, the court may request from the state department information about the history, physical condition and present situation of the child. The court shall forthwith proceed to disposition giving both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard. The court shall give precedence to dispositions in the following sequence:
"(1) Dismiss the petition;
"(2) Refer the child and the child's parent or custodian to a community agency for needed assistance and dismiss the petition;
"(3) Return the child to his own home under supervision of the state department;
"(4) Order terms of supervision calculated to assist the child and the child's parent or custodian which prescribe the manner of supervision and care of the child and which are within the ability of the parent or custodian to perform;
"(5) Upon a finding that the parents or custodians are presently unwilling or unable to provide adequately for the child's needs, commit the child temporarily to the custody of the state department, a licensed private child welfare agency or a suitable person who may be appointed guardian by the court; "(6) Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental or custodial rights and responsibilities and commit the child to the permanent guardianship of the state department or a licensed child welfare agency. Notwithstanding any other provisions of this article, the permanent parental rights shall not be terminated if a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court, objects to such termination. No adoption of a child shall take place until all proceedings for termination of parental rights under this article and appeals thereof are final."

Footnote: 6 W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b), states:
"As used in this section, 'no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected' shall mean that: (1) The parent or parents have habitually abused or are addicted to intoxicating liquors, narcotics or other dangerous drugs to the extent that proper parenting ability has been seriously impaired and the parent has not responded to or followed through with recommended and appropriate treatment which could have improved the capacity for adequate parental functioning; (2) the parent or parents have willfully refused or are presently unwilling to cooperate in the development of a reasonable foster care plan designed to lead to the child's return to the parent or parents; (3) the parent or parents have not responded to or followed through with reasonable rehabilitative efforts of social, medical, mental health or other rehabilitative agencies designed to reduce or prevent the neglect or abuse of the child, as evidence by the continuation of substantial or repeated acts of neglect or abuse after the provision of such services; (4) the parent or parents have abandoned the child; or (5) the parent or parents have repeatedly or seriously physically abused the child."

Barbara L. Baxter, Wheeling, for appellant.

Charles G. Brown, III, Atty. Gen., for the Dept. of Human Services.

PER CURIAM:

This is an appeal from a final order of the Circuit Court of Ohio County, entered September 10, 1986, which terminated the parental rights of the appellant, G.O. The appellant contends that the evidence was not sufficient to support the termination of her parental rights. We remand for a further hearing.

On November 16, 1984, Debra Hannan, a protective services worker for the West Virginia Department of Human Services (hereinafter, "the Department"), filed a petition with the Circuit Court of Ohio County, seeking to have two children, age 3 and age 1, declared neglected or abused children and removed from the custody of their natural mother, the appellant herein, until the conditions giving rise to the petition had been corrected. By order dated the same day, the court ordered the children placed in the temporary care, custody and control of the Department and appointed separate counsel to represent the children and the appellant.

A preliminary hearing was conducted on November 19, 1984, at which time the appellant requested an improvement period. In response, the Department prepared a family case plan See footnote 1 designed to correct the conditions existing at the time the petition was filed. Among other things, the family case plan required the appellant to submit to a psychological evaluation and to any counseling or treatment recommended as a result of such evaluation and to participate in parenting classes and cooperate with suggestions for improving her parenting skills. The appellant subsequently waived her right to a preliminary hearing and agreed to accept the Department's recommendation of a three-month improvement period in which to implement the provisions of the family case plan. By order dated January 28, 1985, the circuit court adopted the Department's recommendations and family case plan, but ordered the children to remain in the Department's temporary custody during the improvement period.

An adjudicatory hearing was conducted on March 21, 1985. The evidence showed that at the time the petition was filed, the appellant had failed to provide the children with suitable housing, furnishings or clothing, had failed to supervise or discipline the children and had refused numerous offers of assistance, including offers of needed food and milk for the children. In addition, the evidence strongly suggested that the appellant was suffering from a serious mental illness which required hospitalization and which, without treatment, rendered her incapable of caring for and potentially harmful to the children.

The evidence adduced at the adjudicatory hearing also showed that although the appellant had obtained appropriate housing and home furnishings during the improvement period and was financially able to maintain the home and care for the children, her overall progress on the family case plan was poor. The appellant appeared not to understand why the children were taken from her and had repeatedly refused to accept inpatient evaluation and treatment recommended by the Department, mental health professionals and her own attorney, usually accusing those making such suggestions of mental illness. On this evidence, the Department moved for termination of the appellant's parental rights.

At the conclusion of the hearing, the court found that the children had been neglected at the time the petition was filed, but that such neglect was not willful in that the appellant was suffering from a mental illness or deficiency. The circuit court also found that the appellant had failed to cooperate in the development of a family case plan or to follow through with the rehabilitative efforts of the Department and other social and mental health agencies and that her mental illness rendered her incapable of exercising proper parenting skills or sufficiently improving the adequacy of such skills. Although any of these findings would have supported termination of the appellant's parental rights, under

W.Va.Code § 49-6-5(b) [1984], the statute then in effect, the circuit court, as an alternative, granted the appellant a three-month post-dispositional improvement period and strongly urged her to seek psychological evaluation and treatment. In July 1985, the improvement period was extended for an additional three months. The children remained in the temporary custody of the Department during this time.

A further hearing was conducted on September 26, 1985, at which time the evidence showed that the appellant had continued to reject any suggestion or offer of psychological evaluation or treatment and was given to hostile and intemperate outbursts in front of the children. The case was submitted for final disposition on October 17, 1985.

It does not appear, however, that any further action was taken until July 17, 1986. At a hearing conducted on that date, counsel for the Department advised the court that a mental hygiene petition had been filed against the appellant and that she had been committed to a mental health facility approximately one month before. Counsel for the appellant joined in the Department's motion that a final decision be rendered upon the record as it existed at that time. At the conclusion of the hearing, the court indicated its intention to terminate the appellant's parental rights.

Two further hearings were conducted for the purpose of advising the appellant, following her release from the hospital, of the court's decision and of her rights regarding appeal. No evidence was adduced at either of these hearings. By order dated September 10, 1986, the court found that the appellant had failed to cooperate in the development of the family case plan, had not responded to reasonable rehabilitative efforts and was mentally or emotionally unable to provide properly for the children. The court found no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect could be substantially corrected in the near future and that termination of the appellant's parental rights was necessary for the welfare of the children. See footnote 2 It is from this order that the appellant brings this appeal.

The appellant does not seriously contend that the trial court erred in finding that the children were neglected at the time the petition was filed. Instead, her principal contention is that the evidence did not warrant termination of her parental rights. In this regard, the appellant asserts that the evidence did not show any reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect could be substantially corrected in the near future.

The dispositional phase of child abuse or neglect proceedings is governed by W.Va.Code § 49-6-5 (1988 Cum.Supp.), which provides a number of dispositional alternatives the circuit court may consider, giving precedence to the least restrictive alternative appropriate in the circumstances.

> "As a general rule the least restrictiv e alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] will be employed; however, courts are not required to e xhaust every speculative possibility of parental im provement before term inating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illne ss, need consistent clos e interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by num erous placements." Syl. pt. 1, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Syllabus point 1, In the Interest of Darla B., 175 W.Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985).

> Termination of parental rights, the most restrictive alternative, is authorized only "[u] pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially correct ed in the near future, and when necessary for the we lfare of the child." W.Va.Code § 49-6- 5(a)(6). The State m ust produc e clear and convincing evidence to support this finding before the court m ay sever the custodial rights of the natural parents. State v. Carl B., [171] W.Va. [774] , 301 S.E.2d 864 (1983); In re Willis, [157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1978)].

State v. C.N.S., 173 W.Va. 651, 656, 319 S.E.2d 775, 780 (1984).

Here, it appears that the principal reason for the termination of the appellant's parental rights was her serious mental illness and her repeated refusal to seek professional evaluation and treatment. The existence of a mental illness which renders a parent incapable of exercising proper parenting skills or of improving the adequacy of such skills and the failure of a parent to respond to rehabilitative efforts of the Department are circumstances warranting a finding of "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" under the statute. See footnote 3 We have also expressly recognized that the inability or unwillingness of a parent to obtain medical treatment to correct a mental deficiency that endangers the welfare of his or her children will support a termination of parental rights. See State v. Scritchfield, 167 W.Va. 683, 280 S.E.2d 315 (1981).

There is evidence in the record which indicates that the appellant was suffering from a serious mental illness which affected her ability to care for the children. Despite the urging of the Department, the court, mental health professionals and her own attorney, the appellant repeatedly refused to acknowledge this fact or to seek treatment to correct her condition. We tend to believe that these facts support the ruling of the circuit court.

We are troubled, however, by the lack of a record concerning the appellant's condition following her hospitalization. Although it appears that hospitalization was forced upon the appellant, it seems clear that she had been released from treatment prior to entry of the final order. If the appellant's parental rights are to be terminated for her inability or unwillingness to seek treatment for her mental illness, the requirements of due process would appear to require the Department to put into evidence the results of such treatment when it was ultimately forced upon her.

Accordingly, we believe the appropriate remedy in this case is to remand for further evidentiary development. The hearing on remand is solely for the purpose of adducing evidence as to the appellant's mental state following her hospitalization in July of 1986. If the evidence shows that the appellant has not, in the past two years, sought out and responded to professional treatment, the order of the circuit court terminating her parental rights should stand.

REMANDED.

Footnote: 1 Under W.Va.Code § 49-6-2(b) (1986 Replacement Vol.), the Department is required to prepare a family case plan in accordance with the provisions of W.Va.Code § 49-6D-3 (1986 Replacement Vol.) any time an improvement period is authorized. See State ex rel. W.Va. Department of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987).

Footnote: 2 The Department had also petitioned for termination of the parental rights of the children's natural father on grounds of abandonment. Counsel was appointed to represent the father in the proceedings below, but was unable to locate him. The court subsequently terminated the father's parental rights, and no appeal has been taken from this ruling.

Footnote: 3 W.Va.Code § 49-6-5(b) provides, in pertinent part:
As used in this section, "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" shall mean that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect, on their own or with help. Such conditions shall be deemed to exist in the following circumstances, which shall not be exclusive:

* * *

(3) The abusing parent or parents have not responded to or followed through with a reasonable family case plan or other rehabilitative efforts of social, medical, mental health or other rehabilitative agencies designed to reduce or prevent the abuse or neglect of the child, as evidenced by the continuation or insubstantial diminution of conditions which threatened the health, welfare or life of the child;

* * *

(6) The abusing parent or parents have incurred emotional illness, mental illness or mental deficiency of such duration or nature as to render such parent or parents incapable of exercising proper parenting skills or sufficiently improving the adequacy of such skills.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Starcher, J.:

In this appeal from the Circuit Court of Hardy County, we are asked to examine a brief order dismissing a petition alleging abuse and neglect of four children. As set forth below, we reverse the circuit court's dismissal order, and remand the case for additional proceedings.

I.
Facts & Background

On July 28, 2005, the Department of Health and Human Resources ("the DHHR") filed an abuse and neglect petition that initiated this case. The petition alleged that the respondent, Lucinda H.,[1] had through her actions placed four children in her custody – Megan H., Brittany T., April G., and Randy H.[2] – in imminent danger. Lucinda H. was well

---

[1]We follow our traditional practice in cases involving sensitive facts and use initials to identify the last names of the parties. See In re Jeffrey R. L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

[2]Respondent Lucinda H. was the custodian and mother of the oldest of the four children, Megan H., who was sixteen years old. The next oldest child in the respondent's custody, Brittany T. (age eight), was the daughter of Rhonda G. and Charles T. (a man apparently unrelated to the respondent, but who was also raised by the respondent). The third child, April G. (age four), is the child of Rhonda G. and James G. The fourth child in the respondent's custody is Randy H. (age two), who is the child of the respondent's twenty-six-year-old daughter Mary Ann C. and the respondent's now-ex-husband Simon H.

The DHHR's petition in this case also appropriately names as respondents, in addition to Lucinda H., the various natural parents of the children: Calvin H., Rhonda G., Charles T., James G., Mary Ann. C., and Simon H.

known to the DHHR, as she had been the subject of at least twenty-seven referrals since 1997, and her parental rights to six other children had previously been terminated (four voluntarily, two involuntarily).

In its petition, the DHHR alleged that on July 25, 2005, eight-year-old Brittany took four-year-old April and two-year-old Randy into the bathroom, locked the door and gave them a prescription drug. The person watching the children at the time, a thirty-five-year-old registered sex offender named Kevin P., called 911 and the children were taken to a hospital for treatment. Hospital personnel found that the children had a lice infestation, and found that April had a yeast infection, had bruising on her inner thigh, and acted in a manner suggestive of sexual abuse. Hospital personnel also saw Kevin P. holding hands and acting affectionate toward the oldest child, sixteen-year-old Megan, in the hospital waiting area. The DHHR applied for and received an emergency order from the circuit court, and immediately took custody of all four children.

The DHHR appears to have visited Lucinda H.'s residence, and Lucinda H. complied with the DHHR's suggestions. A counselor from Family Preservation Services described Lucinda H. as cooperative, the home as neat and hygienic, provided with utility service, appropriately furnished with food in a clean kitchen, and appropriate for young children. More importantly, the counselor found that Lucinda H. had child-proofed the home, and had placed medications in a lockbox which was locked, with the keys put away so the children in the household could not get to them.

On August 2, 2005, the DHHR stated that it could not present testimony or other evidence in support of its petition, and moved to dismiss the petition. The circuit court denied the motion, but returned the children to Lucinda H.'s custody.

On September 8, 2005, the respondent moved to dismiss the petition "for lack of presentation of testimony." The DHHR agreed with the motion and "indicated that the Respondent [Lucinda H.] had complied with services, and stated that they were prepared to dismiss the petition."

The guardians ad litem for the children, however, objected and demanded a deeper investigation of the case by the DHHR because of the numerous prior referrals and terminations involving Lucinda H. Further, it appears that the guardians ad litem were concerned that Lucinda H. was endangering the children by exposing them to known sex offenders. The guardians ad litem assert that, in addition to Kevin P., the respondent associated with Calvin H. – Megan's natural father – who was also a registered sex offender. Further, they assert that the respondent's ex-husband, Simon H., is a convicted sex offender who might return to live in the respondent's household after a term in prison; while the record is unclear, it appears that Simon H. pleaded guilty to the offense of "lewd and lascivious behavior" apparently arising from his affair with a person to whom he was not married: Lucinda H.'s twenty-six-year-old daughter Mary Ann. C. See W.Va. Code, 61-8-4 [1923].

The DHHR subsequently amended the petition to allege aggravated circumstances. However, the DHHR presented no additional evidence in support of the petition.

On November 3, 2005, over the objections of the guardians ad litem, the circuit court dismissed the amended petition in a brief order. The order states:

> Whereupon, the Court heard statements from all parties in regards to the status of this matter.
>
> Whereupon, the Counsel for Respondent Lucinda [H.] made a Motion to Dismiss the Amended Petition. Thereafter, counsel for the children objected to this Motion; said objection appears more fully in the official tape recordings of these proceedings.
>
> After due consideration, the Court GRANTED the Motion to Dismiss; counsel for the children's objection thereto was noted and saved.

The guardians ad litem now appeal that order, and ask this Court to compel the circuit court to conduct a more thorough review of the case. The DHHR did not file a petition for appeal, but has submitted a letter indicating that the DHHR does not oppose the relief sought by the guardians ad litem.

II.
Discussion

Two principles guide our deliberations in this case. First, the findings of a circuit court in an abuse and neglect case will not be set aside by a reviewing court unless they are clearly erroneous – that is, although there is evidence to support the findings, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). Second, "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syllabus Point 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

The respondent, Lucinda H., argues that, in five hearings over two months, the DHHR produced no testimony in support of its petition. Counsel for the respondent asserts that she remedied the situation complained of in the petition, mainly by placing locks on the prescription medication in the house. The respondent therefore contends that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in dismissing the DHHR's petition.

The guardians ad litem for the children, however, do not dispute the respondent's position. Instead, the guardians ad litem assert that the DHHR failed to fully investigate the possibility that Lucinda H. may be exposing the children in her care to future harm from the various sex offenders with whom she associates. The guardians ad litem argue that the respondent failed to prove, by clear and convincing evidence, that she was committed to providing a safe environment for the children.

The burden of proof is statutorily placed upon the proponent of the allegations contained in the petition alleging abuse and neglect, namely the DHHR. See W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [2006] (the circuit court must make findings of fact and conclusions of law "based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing proof."). See also, Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981); ("W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Health and Human Resources] in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof.'"). In accord, Syllabus Point 1, West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Peggy F., 184 W.Va. 60, 399 S.E.2d 460 (1990) (per curiam); Syllabus Point 3, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995); Syllabus Point 3, State v. Julie G., 201 W.Va. 764, 500 S.E.2d 877 (1997).

We are moved, however, by the argument of the guardians ad litem that the DHHR failed to act upon the allegations that further harm might come to the children because of respondent Lucinda H.'s alleged association with several sex offenders. We believe, from our review of the abuse and neglect statutes and procedural rules, that the circuit court had the authority to compel the DHHR to further investigate these allegations and had a duty to make findings of fact and conclusions of law regarding those allegations.

Abuse and neglect cases are troublesome to this Court because of "the very nature of the painful issues involved." In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 35-36, 435 S.E.2d 162, 173-74 (1993). Although courts are expected to give the highest priority and degree of attention to child abuse and neglect cases, we are still compelled to "explore stronger approaches to facilitate the fair and expeditious handling of child abuse and neglect cases." Id.

Recent amendments to the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings – in conjunction with similar amendments to the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Domestic Violence Civil Proceedings and the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court – have emphasized that judges are to take a pro-active role in facilitating the prompt, fair, but thorough resolution of cases which involve the abuse or neglect of a minor child.[3] For example, Rule 3a of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings [2006], states that when a circuit court receives a written report of potential abuse or neglect from a family court judge, the circuit court is required to enter an administrative order "directing the Department [of Health and Human Resources] to submit to the court an investigation report or appear before the court in not more than 45 days . . . to show cause why the Department's investigation report has not been submitted[.]" The DHHR can then submit a report of its investigation, or – if the circumstances warrant – file

[3]For example, Rule 48 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court [2006] states that, if a family court judge has reasonable cause to believe a minor child involved in a proceeding before the court has been abused or neglected, then the judge must do two things. First, the judge must send a written report of the suspected abuse or neglect to the DHHR. Second, the judge must send a copy of the written report to the appropriate circuit judge and the prosecuting attorney. The family court judge retains jurisdiction over the minor child until the DHHR and/or the circuit court acts upon the reported abuse or neglect. See also, Rule 16a of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Domestic Violence Civil Proceedings [2006] (stating that if, during the course of a domestic violence proceeding a family court judge "has reasonable cause to suspect any minor child involved in the proceedings has been abused or neglected," then the judge must make a report as set forth in Rule 48).

Rule 48 goes on to require the DHHR to investigate the family court judge's report, and promptly report back to the family court, the circuit court, and the prosecutor what action, if any, should be taken.

an abuse and neglect petition. If the DHHR chooses not to file a petition, but the circuit court believes that the information presented "suggest[s] circumstances upon which the Department would have a duty to file a civil petition," the circuit court may then issue a show-cause order to determine whether the DHHR has erred in its choice.

Furthermore, we believe that the protection-oriented concerns that undergird our cases and rules in this area clearly dictate that if a circuit court discerns that the evidence developed during an abuse or neglect proceeding is suggestive of additional abuse or neglect not encompassed by the allegations contained in the DHHR's petition, then the circuit court has the discretion to compel the DHHR to amend its petition to encompass that evidence. As we stated in Syllabus Point 4 of State v. Julie G., 201 W.Va. 764, 500 S.E.2d 877 (1997):

> Under Rule 19 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, amendments to an abuse/neglect petition may be allowed at any time before the final adjudicatory hearing begins. When modification of an abuse/neglect petition is sought, the circuit court should grant such petition absent a showing that the adverse party will not be permitted sufficient time to respond to the amendment, consistent with the intent underlying Rule 19 to permit liberal amendment of abuse/neglect petitions.

See also, Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings Rule 19 [1997] ("The court may allow the petition to be amended at any time until the final adjudicatory hearing begins[.]")

To facilitate the prompt, fair and thorough resolution of abuse and neglect actions, we therefore hold that if, in the course of a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, a circuit court discerns from the evidence or allegations presented that reasonable cause exists to believe that additional abuse or neglect has occurred or is imminent which is not encompassed by the allegations contained in the Department of Health and Human Resource's petition, then pursuant to Rule 19 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings [1997] the circuit court has the inherent authority to compel the Department to amend its petition to encompass the evidence or allegations.

Furthermore, the statutes and rules pertaining to abuse and neglect actions mandate that a circuit court make findings of fact and conclusions of law, in writing or on the record, as to whether or not a child is abused and/or neglected. See, e.g., W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [2006] ("At the conclusion of the hearing, the court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected[.]"); Rule 27, Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings [2000] ("[T]he court shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law, in writing or on the record, as to whether the child is abused and/or neglected[.]").

When a circuit court has not fully complied with the statutes and rules of procedure pertaining to cases under Chapter 49, this Court will not hesitate to reverse the circuit court. As we stated in Syllabus Point 5 of In Re Edward B., 210 W.Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001):

> Where it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for > compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order.

The record in the instant case indicates that the DHHR did not thoroughly pursue the allegations of potential danger asserted by the guardians ad litem, and the circuit court was imbued with the authority to compel a thorough review of such allegations. Further, while these allegations were presented to the circuit court, the court failed to make specific findings of fact or conclusions of law regarding their validity.

Based upon our review of the parties' arguments, upon the record, and upon the brevity of the circuit court's final order, we find that the result which will best protect the interests of the children is to reverse the circuit court's decision and remand the case. On remand, the court should compel the guardians ad litem and the DHHR to give full investigation to the allegations of potential harm raised by the guardians, and should thoroughly discuss those allegations in the court's future order[s].

III.

The circuit court's November 3, 2005 order is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings.

Reversed and Remanded.

SYLLABUS

"'Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. Per Curiam:

In the instant case, we uphold a decision by the Circuit Court of Ritchie County terminating a mother's parental rights.

I.

The pertinent facts of the instant case can be presented fairly simply.

On June 30, 2001, the appellant, Susie Pearl K. C., gave birth to a female child, Rebecca K. C.[1] On July 18, 2001, the appellee, the West Virginia Department of Health & Human Resources ("DHHR") filed a petition seeking the termination of the appellant's parental rights.[2]

W.Va. Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3)(1998) requires the DHHR to file such a petition (subject to certain exceptions) if there has been a prior involuntary termination of rights to another of a parent's children. In the appellant's case, as we detail further infra, her parental rights to three other children were terminated by court order in 2000.

[1]As is our custom in certain sensitive cases, we use initials instead of last names.

[2]W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [2002] sets forth a hierarchy of dispositional options that are available to a circuit court upon a finding that a child is neglected or abused. The final option is to ". . . terminate the parental, custodial or guardianship rights and/or responsibilities of the abusing parent . . .." W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [2002] (emphasis added). This statutory language recognizes the constellation of legal obligations, duties, responsibilities, authorities, and powers that make up the parent-child relationship.

After several hearings, the circuit court determined that Rebecca K. C. was neglected and/or abused; that there was no reasonable likelihood that the appellant, even with assistance, could correct the conditions that led to the finding of neglect and/or abuse; and specifically that granting an improvement period to see if those conditions could be corrected would be pointless. Consequently, on December 27, 2001, the court entered an order terminating the appellant's parental rights with respect to Rebecca K. C.

The appellant appeals this order, arguing first that the circuit court erred in determining that the child was neglected or abused; and second, assuming arguendo that this determination was correct, that the court erred in determining not to grant the appellant an improvement period to attempt to correct the conditions that led to the finding of neglect and/or abuse.

Inasmuch as the evidence regarding both of these determinations was basically the same, we shall combine them for purposes of our discussion.

II.

We begin by briefly discussing the applicable standards of review for civil abuse and neglect proceedings. In Syllabus Point 1 of State ex rel. Virginia M. v. Virgil Eugene S. II, 197 W.Va. 456, 475 S.E.2d 548 (1996), this Court stated:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether > such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety. Syl. Pt. 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

We further stated in State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W.Va. 555, 562, 490 S.E.2d 642, 649 (1997) that:

> The above standard of review requires deference by this Court to the findings of a circuit court in a civil abuse and neglect proceeding. The critical nature of unreviewable intangibles justify the deferential approach we accord findings by a circuit court.

In In re Emily & Amos B., 208 W.Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542 (2000), we recognized that "the circuit court is the better-equipped tribunal" to make the substantive determination regarding termination of parental rights. 208 W.Va. at 340, 540 S.E.2d at 557 (rejecting the contention that incarceration should automatically result in termination; holding that incarceration was a factor for the court to consider in exercising its discretion).

III.

As previously stated, the appellant's (and her former husband's) parental rights with respect to their three older children were involuntarily terminated by the Circuit Court of Ritchie County on September 14, 2000 – following the filing of a neglect and abuse petition in 1999. In this earlier case, severe adverse conditions for the children were found to exist; the appellant and her then-husband were granted an improvement period, and an extension of that period. However, they did not comply with a family plan that included assistance from social service agencies, and the court ultimately concluded that – even with available assistance – they could not adequately parent their children. The merits of this earlier finding are not challenged in the instant case.

The appellant was born in 1977; she is illiterate and mildly retarded. She has a history of alcohol abuse, unstable and abusive relationships, and sexual victimization. When the child at issue in the instant case was born, the appellant had ended her marriage to the father of her three other children, and she was living at her parents' house.[3] She did not obtain pre-natal medical care until the third trimester of her pregnancy.

The record from the previous neglect and abuse case demonstrated that the appellant has serious limitations in her judgment and her ability to parent, even with assistance.

The appellant testified in the instant case that she and her child intended to live with her parents. At first blush, this testimony might seem to argue that the circuit court should have viewed her ability to parent her fourth child, with their assistance, in a different light; and that the court should have afforded her an improvement period.

[3]The father of the child at issue in the instant case (not the appellant's former husband) was determined, after the termination order in the instant case, to be an individual who is apparently not asserting any claim to parental rights; presumably his rights have been or are to be terminated voluntarily.

However, her living with her parents was in fact not a positive factor for the appellant, in terms of their supporting or enhancing her ability to adequately parent her child. The contrary is true. The children's maternal grandparents were originally named as respondents in the earlier neglect and abuse proceedings. Many of the adverse conditions in the previous case occurred while the appellant was living with her parents and away from her then-husband. Those conditions included unsanitary and dangerous surroundings and neglect of illnesses.

An in-depth psychological evaluation of the appellant and her parents that was prepared in the earlier case concluded that the appellant's parents did not appreciate the deficiencies in the appellant's parenting of her (previously terminated) children, and that her parents contributed to and enabled those deficiencies. The appellant's mother, in her testimony before the circuit court in the instant case, disputed any need to make any changes or improvements in her or the appellant's parenting. The psychological report in the earlier case stated that "[t]here appears to be a significant basis for concern about ongoing neglect and abuse should the appellant return to that setting (the appellant's parents' home)."[4]

It is axiomatic that the fact that conditions of neglect or abuse have been found for one child, or that a parent has had their rights terminated with respect to one child, does not, standing alone, mean that such conditions necessarily exist for another child, or that a parent's rights to another child are to be automatically terminated. But such facts may be considered, and have considerable weight, in determining the issue of termination of a second child.

[4]Additionally, when the circuit court set the DHHR's petition for a preliminary hearing, on July 30, 2001, the appellant appeared in court and said she did not know the whereabouts of the child (this was apparently untrue). The appellant's mother testified that she did know the child's location, but that she would not tell the court; whereupon she was briefly held for contempt. The authorities soon located the child, who had been concealed at a relative's home.

In In Re Christina L. and Kenneth J. L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), this Court reiterated that the fact of neglect or abuse of another child by a parent does not relieve the DHHR of its burden to show by clear and convincing evidence that a child who is the subject of a petition is neglected or abused – although the abuse or neglect of another child may be relevant evidence with respect to the condition of a child that is the subject of a petition. Id. 194 W.Va. at 452, 460 S.E.2d at 698.

Syllabus Points 3-5 of In re George Glen B., Jr., 207 W.Va. 346 (2000), 532 S.E.2d 64, state:

> 3. "Where there has been a prior involuntary termination of parental rights to a sibling, the issue of whether the parent has remedied the problems which led to the prior involuntary termination sufficient to parent a subsequently-born child must, at minimum, be reviewed by a court, and such review should be initiated on a petition pursuant to the provisions governing the procedure in cases of child neglect or abuse set forth in West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-1 to -12 (1998). Although the requirement that such a petition be filed does not mandate termination in all circumstances, the legislature has reduced the minimum threshold of evidence necessary for termination where one of the factors outlined in West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a) (1998) is present." Syllabus Point 2, In re George Glen B., Jr., 205 W.Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863 (1999).
> 4. "When an abuse and neglect petition is brought based solely upon a previous involuntary termination of parental rights to a > sibling pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) (1998), prior to the lower court's making any disposition regarding the petition, it must allow the development of evidence surrounding the prior involuntary termination(s) and what actions, if any, the parent(s) have taken to remedy the circumstances which led to the prior termination(s)." Syllabus Point 4, In re George Glen B., Jr., 205 W.Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863 (1999).

> 5. The presence of one of the factors outlined in W.Va.Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998] merely lowers the threshold of evidence necessary for the termination of parental rights. W.Va.Code, 49-6-5b(a)(3) [1998] does not mandate that a circuit court terminate parental rights merely upon the filing of a petition filed pursuant to the statute, and the Department of Health and Human Resources continues to bear the burden of proving that the subject child is abused or neglected pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-2 [1996].

In abuse and neglect cases, circuit courts have limited procedural discretion. For example, they must move cases quickly to decision, so that the rights and interests of children, parents, government officials, and other interested parties do not languish. This Court has not hesitated in overruling circuit courts when we perceived procedural errors – such as a court's refusal to consider the merits of a petition, or to hear certain evidence, or to move a case to a decision in a timely fashion, or to create a reasonably specific improvement period. See, e.g., State v. Julie G., 201 W.Va. 764, 500 S.E.2d 877 (1997) (reversing a trial court's finding that there was no neglect and abuse because the court did not consider relevant evidence developed during an improvement period; see also In re Edward B., 210 W.Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001) (reversing a trial court's termination of parental relationship because the court did not make findings and follow proper procedures).

On the other hand, as set forth in Part II. supra, of this opinion, a circuit court's substantive determinations in abuse and neglect cases on adjudicative and dispositional matters – such as whether neglect or abuse is proven, or whether termination is necessary – is entitled to substantial deference in the appellate context. See, e.g., In re Johnathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996) (upholding a decision by a circuit court to dismiss an abuse and neglect petition and reunify a child with a parent who acknowledged abuse, where the natural parents had cooperated with therapeutic intervention that was ultimately deemed beneficial); see also State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W.Va. 555, 490 S.E.2d 642 (1997) (trial court was not clearly erroneous in going against the wishes of the DHHR and the guardian ad litem by ordering an improvement period).

Applying the foregoing principles to the instant case, the record shows that the circuit court had ample evidence from which to conclude, using a clear and convincing standard, that the appellant – even with help from social service agencies and her parents – could not be reasonably expected to properly parent her child.[5]

We emphatically reiterate that a prior termination does not mean that a parent does not have the right to "another chance" – in the form of an improvement period or otherwise. To the contrary, regardless of past events, unless the evidence is clear and convincing to the effect that an improvement period would be pointless, our law requires that one must be ordered. But if a court, and it would be expected that this would be the rare case, determines based upon all of the evidence, including evidence from any prior abuse and neglect cases, and clearly enunciates in reasoned findings, that there is clear and convincing proof that conditions constituting abuse and neglect are present, and if the court clearly explains why it has concluded that an improvement period would be pointless, then the court may, in its discretion, decide not to grant such a period. That is what occurred in the instant case, and we conclude that the court acted within its discretion.

IV.

For the foregoing reasons, we affirm the circuit court's decision.

Affirmed.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

Where a child is initially removed from the custody of his or her parents pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-3 (Supp. 1994), and where such emergency taking is subsequently ratified on the basis of a finding of imminent danger, the child shall remain in the temporary legal and physical custody of the State or some responsible relative within the meaning of West Virginia Code § 49-6-3 and out of the alleged abusive home during the improvement period until the circumstances which constitute the imminent danger have ceased to exist, or the alleged abusing person has been precluded from residing in or visiting the home.

Workman, Justice:

This matter is before the Court on appeal from an order of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County entered June 2, 1994, ratifying the emergency removal of the Appellant, Renae Ebony W., See footnote 1 an infant child, from her parents' custody, but returning the child to her parents' physical custody for a three-month improvement period. The issue raised by Appellant E. Kent Hellems, the infant's guardian ad litem, is the propriety of the court's granting of an in-home improvement period once the child had been taken under emergency circumstances constituting imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child. We hold that the lower court erred in returning Renae Ebony to the immediate physical custody of her parents during the improvement period. For the reasons stated, we reverse the lower court's order insofar as it continued custody of Renae Ebony in her parents. We further order that temporary custody of Renae Ebony continue in the Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") and that Renae Ebony's parents both submit to psychological evaluations and both be granted liberal visitation with her during the course of the court-supervised three-month improvement period, the terms of which should be developed by the lower court on remand.

I.

Renae Ebony was born on December 22, 1993, to Paula W. and Alonzo F. The guardian ad litem contends that both of the child's parents are low-functioning and mentally-impaired individuals who met while attending vocational rehabilitation in Charleston, West Virginia.

On February 16, 1994, the DHHR received a child abuse complaint regarding Renae Ebony which was made by Helen F., the child's paternal grandmother. Ms. Nancy Forsberg of DHHR traveled to the child's home in Beckley, West Virginia, to conduct an initial investigation into the allegations of child abuse. Upon arriving at the child's home, Ms. Forsberg found the child, who was then less than two months old, living in a two-bedroom apartment occupied by as many as seven other people. During Ms. Forsberg's visit, Helen F. advised her that Paula W., the child's natural mother, had been mistreating the child. Specifically, Ms. F. advised Ms. Forsberg that the child's mother had been heard spanking the baby, cussing the baby and calling the baby "a bitch." The child's father told Ms. Forsberg that he had seen Paula W. shaking the baby.

The DHHR, recognizing that a problem did exist, entered into an arrangement with Paula W. whereby she would enter the Florence Crittendon Home ("Home") in Wheeling, West Virginia, with Renae Ebony to learn better parenting skills. Ms. W. entered the Home at the end of February and stayed for approximately two weeks, at which time she left with the child, allegedly to visit her ailing father. Ms. W. was scheduled to return to the Home on March 14, 1994, but she refused to do so and on March 16, 1994, the DHHR filed its Petition in the circuit court, thereby initiating the underlying child abuse and neglect proceeding. An order was entered that same day, granting the DHHR temporary custody of Renae Ebony pending a hearing scheduled for March 17, 1994.

The March 17, 1994, hearing was held before Judge John C. Ashworth of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County for the purpose of hearing testimony to ratify the emergency taking of Renae Ebony by the DHHR. Michael Horton rendered testimony on behalf of the DHHR during the hearing. There were no other witnesses. At the close of the hearing, the Appellant recommended to the court that the child remain in the temporary legal and physical custody of the DHHR and that both of the child's parents undergo psychological evaluations. The court denied the Appellant's request, refused to ratify the emergency taking, and dismissed the case.

On March 24, 1994, a hearing was held on the motion of Appellant and the DHHR for reconsideration of the lower court's prior ruling. Several witnesses testified at this hearing. Helen F. testified that she initially contacted the DHHR regarding the allegations of abuse of Renae Ebony by her mother because she herself did not want to get into trouble if the child was injured. She also testified that she heard Paula W. yelling at the baby that she would "flush you down the toilet" or "throw you out the window" when the baby was less than one-month-old.

Stephanie F., the child's paternal aunt, also testified at the March 24, 1994, hearing. She testified that she was awakened one morning at approximately 2:30 a.m. by her boyfriend, who told her that he had actually seen Paula W. spanking the baby. Ms. Stephanie F., once awakened, witnessed this incident herself. She further testified that, during this same incident, she heard Ms. W. tell the child "shut up" or she would "stick" you. Ms. Stephanie F. characterized the blows as "hard-like" and stated that she could actually hear the baby being spanked.

At the close of the March 24, 1994, hearing, the guardian ad litem again requested that the lower court continue temporary custody of Renae Ebony with the DHHR and that the child's parents be ordered to undergo psychological evaluations. Although the lower court did reconsider its prior ruling and ratified the emergency removal of Renae Ebony from her parents' custody, See footnote 2 the court again refused to continue temporary custody of Renae Ebony with the DHHR, stating in-home placement was "the least intrusive alternative," See footnote 3 and placed the child's parents on a three-month improvement period. See footnote 4

Upon being advised of the court's ruling regarding temporary custody of Renae Ebony, the Appellant immediately moved the court for a stay of its order pending an appeal to this Court. The lower court denied the motion for stay. Thereafter, the Appellant filed a motion to stay the circuit court orders of May 27, 1994, and June 2, 1994, See footnote 5 which was granted by this Court. Consequently, temporary custody of Renae Ebony has remained with the DHHR pending this appeal.

II.

West Virginia Code § 49-6-3 (Supp. 1994), provides in part:

> Upon the filing of a petition, the court may order that the child alleged to be an abused or neglected child be delivered for not more than ten days into the custody of the state department or a responsible relative, which may include any parent, guardian or other custodian pending a preliminary hearing, if it finds that: (1) There exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child, and (2) there are no reasonably available alternatives to removal of the child . . . .

In syllabus point one of In re Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989) we held:

> W. Va. Code, 49-6-3 (1984), authorizes, upon the filing of a petition, the immediate, temporary taking of custody of a child by the Department of Human Services when there exists an imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child and there are no reasonably available alternatives to the removal of the child.
>

Imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child is statutorily defined as:

> an emergency situation in which the welfare or the life of the child is threatened. Such emergency situation exists when there is reasonable cause to believe that any child in the home is or has been sexually abused or sexually exploited, or reasonable cause to believe that the following conditions threaten the health or life of any child in the home:
>
> (1) Nonaccidental trauma inflicted by a parent, guardian, custodian, sibling or a babysitter or other caretaker; or
>
> (2) A combination of physical and other signs indicating a pattern of abuse which may be medically diagnosed as battered child syndrome; or
>
> (3) Nutritional deprivation; or

> (4) Abandonment by the parent, guardian or custodian; or
>
> (5) Inadequate treatment of serious illness or disease; or
>
> (6) Substantial emotional injury inflicted by a parent, guardian or custodian; or
>
> (7) Sale or attempted sale of the child by the parent, guardian or custodian.
> W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(e) (Supp. 1994).

Both the paternal grandmother and the paternal aunt testified at the March 24, 1994, hearing that they witnessed more than one incident when Renae Ebony, a very young infant, was spanked by her mother. Nancy Forsberg, the DHHR investigator, testified that she was told by Alonzo F. that he had seen the mother shake the baby. Michael Horton, also of DHHR, testified at the March 17, 1994, hearing that Paula W. admitted to him that she had shaken the baby on more than one occasion. None of these adults, including the baby's father, seemed able to afford the child protection.

Counsel for the mother relies heavily on the fact that Renae Ebony bore no visible physical marks or injury discernible to the naked eye from the alleged abuse. What constitutes the imminent danger, however, is the grave potential for serious harm or even death to an infant who is subjected to the type of physical shaking described in this case. See footnote 6

The lower court's conclusion, therefore, that a reasonably available alternative to continuing temporary custody of Renae Ebony in the DHHR existed in the form of a DHHR supervised improvement period in the home is contrary to the evidence in the record. The mother's admitted practice of shaking the infant at issue, together with the inability or unwillingness of the other adults in the home to intervene, created too great a potential for great harm to this child.

Although we have previously discussed improvement periods in abuse and neglect cases, See footnote 7 we have not had occasion to discuss when such improvement periods should include physical custody of the child in-home versus out-of-home. West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(b) (Supp. 1994) provides that:

> In any proceeding under this article, any parent or custodians may, prior to final hearing, move to be allowed an improvement period of > three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based. The court shall allow one such improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof, but may require temporary custody with a responsible relative, which may include any parent, guardian, or other custodian, or the state department or other agency during the improvement period. . . .

> W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(b) (emphasis added).

In the ordinary abuse and neglect case filed under West Virginia Code § 49-6-1, the court must, upon appropriate motion, allow at least one improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to refuse such request. West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(b) leaves within the sound discretion of the trial court the question of whether the child or children who are the subject of the proceeding will remain in the custody of their parents or be placed in the temporary custody of a responsible relative, which may include any parent, guardian, or other custodian, or the state during the term of the court-imposed improvement period. Thus, even in the typical abuse and neglect case where there is no emergency taking, the court has the discretion to impose an out-of-the-home improvement period where custody is granted to a responsible relative or to the state during the temporary removal.

In a case involving an emergency taking, however, the statute requires placement of the child in a safe environment away from the abusing person:

> Provided, That where the alleged abusing person, if known, is a member of a household, the court shall not allow placement pursuant to this section of the child or children in said home unless the alleged abusing person is or has been precluded from visiting or residing in said home by judicial order.
> W. Va. Code § 49-6-3(a) (Supp. 1994).

We therefore conclude that where a child is initially removed from the custody of his or her parents pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-3, and where such emergency taking is subsequently ratified on the basis of a finding of imminent danger, the child shall remain in the temporary legal and physical custody of the state or some responsible relative within the meaning of West Virginia Code § 49-6-3, and out of the alleged abusive home during the improvement period until the circumstances which constitute the imminent danger have ceased to exist, or the alleged abusing person has been precluded from residing in or visiting the home.

For the foregoing reasons, we reverse the lower court's order to the extent that order returns physical custody of Renae Ebony to her parents. We further order that temporary custody of Renae Ebony continue with the DHHR, that both of the child's parents undergo psychological evaluation, and that the parents be granted the three-month improvement period, as previously directed by the circuit court.

We have spoken before about the importance of circuit courts crafting improvement periods in a manner designed to remedy the problem that led to the abuse and neglect action. See Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613 at 625, 408 S.E.2d 365 at 377. There we stated:

> The goal [of improvement periods and family case plans] should be the development of a program designed to assist the parent(s) in dealing with any problems which interfere with his ability to be an effective parent and to foster an improved relationship between parent and child with an eventual restoration of full parental rights a hoped-for result. The improvement period and family case plans must establish specific measures for the achievement of these goals, as an improvement period must be more than a mere passage of time. It is a period in which the D.H.S. and the court should attempt to facilitate the parent's success, but wherein the parent must understand that he bears a responsibility to demonstrate sufficient progress and improvement to justify return to him of the child.
> Id. at 625, 408 S.E.2d at 377.

Consistent with our decision in Carlita B., we emphasize in this case that the status of the child and the progress of the parents be monitored on a monthly basis to ensure compliance with the specific goals set forth in the conditions of the improvement period. Id. at 625, 408 S.E.2d at 377. We note in this regard that West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(b) allows for a three to twelve month improvement period to remedy the alleged circumstances upon which the abuse and neglect proceeding is based. It would be wise of the circuit judge in drafting the court order imposing the terms and conditions of the improvement period to give himself the flexibility to extend the improvement period past the three month period if progress is being made, but the parents are not fully ready for restoration of custody. We also emphasize the importance of the court offering the parents wide opportunity for continued contact with this infant in crafting the conditions of the improvement period. As was noted in Carlita B., the level of interest a parent demonstrates in visiting his or her child says much about his or her potential to be a good parent. Id. at 628, 408 S.E.2d at 380. See footnote 8

Based on the foregoing, this case is reversed and remanded consistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

Footnote: 1 Consistent with our practice in cases involving sensitive matters, we identify the parties through the use of initials. See Benjamin R. v. Orkin Exterminating Company, Inc., 182 W. Va. 615, 390 S.E.2d 814, n.1 (1990) (citing In re Jonathan P., [182] W. Va. [302],[303] n.1, 387 S.E.2d 537 n.1 (1989)); State v. Murray, 180 W. Va. 41, 375 S.E.2d 405, n.1 (1988).

Footnote: 2 On March 24, 1994, the court reconsidered its refusal to ratify the emergency taking and did ratify the emergency taking by order entered June 2, 1994. Even though the trial court ratified the emergency taking, the court, in comments from the bench, indicated that he believed there was insufficient evidence of imminent danger to the child. Although the ratification of the emergency taking is not at issue here, we are compelled to note that the record supports a finding of imminent danger to this child.
In addition, as more fully set forth herein, the DHHR attempted to develop a reasonably available alternative to removal by arranging the residential parenting training at the Florence Crittendon Home, but the mother's refusal to complete the program left no other reasonably available alternative.

Footnote: 3 Generally, the least restrictive alternative available regarding parental rights to custody of a child is appropriately considered at the dispositional stage in child abuse and neglect cases. See W. Va. Code § 49-6-5 (Supp. 1994). The concept of least restrictive alternative may even be useful by way of analogy when dealing with improvement periods granted pursuant to a standard abuse and neglect petition filed under West Virginia Code § 49-6-1 (Supp. 1994). The concept, however, has little value in an emergency taking proceeding under West Virginia Code § 49-6-3 (Supp. 1994) where a child has been removed from the custody of its parents based on a finding of imminent danger. In such cases, the placing of the child in a safe environment away from the alleged abusing adult until the problems giving rise to imminent danger are remedied should be of the utmost concern to the court.

Footnote: 4 The terms of the improvement period were as follows:

1. Both Respondents shall submit to parenting skills[,] education and other counseling services under West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources direction; both promptly shall receive psychological, psychiatric and parental evaluations at FMRS Mental Health Council, Inc., with results promptly to be provided this Court and all parties.

2. Both Respondents, and the grandmother and all other persons residing with the infant or acting in a custodial capacity are herein restrained from using corporal punishment of any kind or nature upon the infant, or using any degree of force against her, including but not limited to spanking, striking, shaking, throwing; further, the Respondents and the other described parties are hereby restrained from cursing at or otherwise verbally abusing the infant; and the Respondents and other described persons are hereby notified, in open court in their presence, that each Respondent and every other household member has a duty to report to the Department of Health and Human Resources, or to police or to the State or Guardian ad Litem, any knowledge of any other person's prohibited conduct against the infant, and that failure to do so may subject the non-reporting party to prosecution.

3. Respondents shall cooperate with regular home monitoring by the Department of Health and Human Resources and with any home services deemed necessary by the Department of Health and Human Resources.

Footnote: 5The June 2, 1994, order entered by the trial court reinstating and ratifying the removal of the child is a cursory order which does not include findings of fact and conclusions of law consistent with the statutory requirements. We once again urge the trial courts to be more thorough in making findings of fact and conclusions of law in child abuse and neglect cases, and that theycomply with statutory requirements before entering orders.
This Court has repeatedly recognized that it is incumbent on all courts to be especially vigilant in protecting the welfare of children of the tender age of three years or less. See State v. Jessica M., 191 W. Va. 302, ___, 445 S.E.2d 243, 248 n.24 (1994) (specifically noting the child's age of two years, eleven months as being "of particular concern to this Court"); In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 33, 435 S.E.2d 162, 171 (1993) (recognizing that "termination of parental rights is even more appropriate in cases where the welfare of a child less than three years of age is seriously threatened"); Carlita B., 185 W. Va. at 623, 408 S.E.2d at 375 (quoting various authorities on the critical importance of a child's first three years of life); Syl. Pt. 1, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980) (holding that "courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years. . . .").

Footnote: 6 The allegation of the shaking of Renae Ebony is of particular concern as every year thousands of babies suffer blindness, brain damage, or even death from being shaken. A diagnosis of "shaken baby syndrome" may be difficult to make where there is a lack of any external signs. As Jack Showers, Ed. D., notes,

The term 'Shaken Baby Syndrome' (SBS) describes the consequences which occur when a young child's head is whiplashed back and forth during shaking. Babies can be easily injured when shaken. Their neck muscles aren't strong enough to control head movements, and rapid movement of the head can result in the brain being bruised from banging against the skull wall. Bleeding behind the eyes and in and around the brain occurs and can cause serious injury. Depending upon the vulnerability of the child and the severity of the shaking, consequences may include seizures, partial or total blindness, paralysis, mental retardation, or death. In cases of less violent and sometimes chronic shaking of a young child, long-term outcomes can include attention deficits and learning disabilities.

Jack Showers, Children Today, p.34 (vol. 21, no.2 1992) (footnotes omitted). We further note that the publication, Children Today, is regarded as a "well-rounded interdisciplinary journal for the professions serving children" and that it is recognized as being "[v]ery useful for public and academic libraries supporting child-oriented programs and professionals." Bill Katz & Linda Sternberg Katz, Magazines For Libraries, p. 224 (5th ed. 1986).
Furthermore, records submitted by the Appellant, but not in the record of this case and not considered on the underlying issues of this opinion, reinforce our conclusion as to the danger of shaken baby syndrome. The notation of particular concern is included in a letter to Appellant from Terri L. Farley, a child protective services worker, in which it is stated:

Ebony was taken to FMRS for an Early Intervention evaluation on May 13, 1994 to ascertain if there were any developmental delays. She was very stiff this date in her muscle movements. The more she tried to crawl forward the farther she went backwards. She seemed to be favoring her left side and did little with her right. She was very alert and responded well when assisted with movement by the therapist. She did grasp with her right hand and hold. There was stiffness in her legs, thighs and shoulders. Later evaluation revealed a concern for her jerky motions. The therapist advised the foster parent these motions seemed to be consistent with a 'crack' baby or 'baby shaking' syndrome . . . ..

Footnote: 7 See In re Lacey P., 189 W.Va. 580, 433 S.E.2d 518 (1993); James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991); In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991); State v. Krystal T., 185 W.Va. 391, 407 S.E.2d 395 (1991).

Footnote: 8 Although it is not part of the record before us on the issue involved in this case, the guardian ad litem contends in his brief that the mother, and to some extent, the father of Renae Ebony have a poor record with regard to visiting the child once removal was mandated. The circuit court should monitor their level of interest in this child closely in the coming months.

Attorney for Appellants

JUSTICE WORKMAN delivered the Opinion of the Court.
CHIEF JUSTICE DAVIS concurs and reserves the right to file a concurring opinion.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review." Syl. Pt. 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W. Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995).

2. "This Court reviews the circuit court's final order and ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard." Syl. Pt. 4, in part, Burgess v. Porterfield, 196 W. Va. 178, 179, 469 S.E.2d 114, 115 (1996).

3. "Rule 48a(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court requires that if a family court presiding over a petition for infant guardianship brought pursuant to W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 learns that the basis for the petition, in whole or in part, is an allegation of child abuse and neglect as defined by W. Va. Code § 49-1-3, then the family court is required to remove the petition to circuit court for a hearing thereon. Furthermore, '[a]t the circuit court hearing, allegations of child abuse and neglect must be proven by clear and convincing evidence.' West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court 48a(a)." Syl. Pt. 7, In re Abbigail Faye B., 222 W. Va. 466, 665 S.E.2d 300 (2008).

4. "In the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, this Court will not decide nonjurisdictional questions which were not considered and decided by the court from which the appeal has been taken." Syl. Pt. 1, Mowery v. Hitt, 155 W. Va. 103, 181 S.E.2d 334 (1971).

5. "A statutory provision which is clear and unambiguous and plainly expresses the legislative intent will not be interpreted by the courts but will be given full force and effect." Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Epperly, 135 W. Va. 877, 65 S.E.2d 488 (1951).

6. At common law, a parent or legal guardian may transfer medical, educational, and other legal decision-making authority for his or her child or ward to another adult through the execution of a power of attorney. Such instruments are revocable and automatically terminate upon death or incapacity of the principal.

7. Pursuant to the Caregiver's Consent Act, West Virginia Code § 49-11-1 to 10 (2010), an adult over the age of eighteen who is not legally related to a minor, but who has resided continuously with the minor for the immediately preceding six month period, may consent to health care and treatment on behalf of the minor, so long as that adult possesses an adequate affidavit, as set forth in that Act.

Workman, Justice:

The Appellants, Cary P. and Jennifer P. (jointly "the Appellants"), reside together in Fayette County, West Virginia, with Jennifer's biological children, Richard P. and Devon P.[1] On July 11, 2008, the Appellants filed a "Petition for Appointment of a Legal Guardian," in the Family Court of Fayette County, West Virginia, seeking to appoint Cary as the legal guardian of Richard and Devon. The Appellants do not wish to interfere with Jennifer's parental rights but instead seek to allow Cary, as a legal guardian, to make medical, educational and other legal decisions for the children when Jennifer is unavailable.

The family court, believing that the petition included an abuse and neglect allegation, transferred the case to the Circuit Court of Fayette County. After conducting a hearing and receiving further briefing from the Appellants, the circuit court denied the petition, finding that the appointment of a guardian for the children was not warranted under the circumstances presented in this case. On appeal, the Appellants waived oral argument, and the case was submitted on the Appellants' brief.[2] Having considered that brief, the record in the case, and all relevant legal material, this Court affirms the circuit court's Order.

[1]The Court follows its customary practice in cases involving minors of using only the first initial of the parties' last names, in order to protect the privacy of the minors. See, e.g., In re Emily B., 208 W. Va. 325, 329 n. 1, 540 S.E.2d 542, 546 n. 1 (2000).

[2]Although the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") is designated as the Appellee in this case, it did not oppose the Appellants' petition below and has not filed a brief in this appeal.

I.

FACTS AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

Richard P. and Devon P. are both minors under the age of eighteen; Richard is approximately thirteen years old and Devon is approximately eleven years old. The boys' biological father, Richard A., resides in Indiana. He and Jennifer separated when the boys were very young, and he is no longer in their lives.[3] Jennifer, Cary and the children have resided together since July 1999, at which time the boys were approximately three and one, respectively. Both Jennifer and Cary have acted as parents to the boys. Jennifer has consistently worked outside of the home, while Cary is a homemaker.

On July 11, 2008, the Appellants filed a "Petition for Appointment of a Legal Guardian," in the Family Court of Fayette County, seeking to have Cary appointed as the [3]After Jennifer divorced Richard A., the boys initially maintained contact with their father, visiting him occasionally. In 2005, Richard A. was charged with sexually molesting his sons. He eventually pled guilty to "dissemination of matter harmful to minors," and the molestation charges were dropped. He was convicted, however, of molesting the thirteen-year-old daughter of his then girlfriend. Following the 2005 charges, the boys ceased all contact with their father. Richard A. does not pay child support and the Appellants allege, without documentation, that pursuant to Indiana statute, his parental rights have been terminated.

As a consequence of the events with his father, Richard P. began acting out in school, exhibiting violent behaviors, and he has now undergone extensive psychological treatment, including inpatient hospitalization. As a result of these problems, the DHHR investigated the family. All of the DHHR's reports, however, indicate that Jennifer and Cary are "nurturing parents" who are "very supportive" of their children. The DHHR has consistently found no risk of abuse or neglect in the home. Devon P., the younger of the brothers, appears to be well adjusted and is not suffering the same consequences of their father's actions as Richard P.

boys' legal guardian.[4] Jennifer did not seek to relinquish any of her parental rights; rather, the Appellants sought to add Cary as a legal guardian, thus giving her the ability to make medical and educational decisions for the boys when Jennifer is unavailable. In the petition, the Appellants assert that Cary is a psychological parent to the boys and that legalizing their relationship would create stability for the children in the event that something happened to Jennifer and would protect the children if Richard A. ever attempted to reassert his parental rights.[5] They further contended that appointing Cary as a legal guardian would clarify, before an emergency occurred, Jennifer's wishes for the care of her children.[6]

The family court, concluding that the petition included an abuse and neglect allegation, transferred the petition, pursuant to Rule 48a of the West Virginia Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court, to the Circuit Court of Fayette County, West Virginia, on July 11, 2008. On July 18, 2008, the Circuit Court of Fayette County conducted a hearing on the petition. In addition to the Appellants, Tom Steele, counsel for the DHHR,

[4]The petition also sought a legal name change for Richard P., who was named after his father, Richard A. While undergoing psychological treatment, Richard P. became upset over having the same name as his father and decided, with Jennifer and Cary's support, to change his first name. The circuit court granted this name change in October 2008, and that Order is not at issue in this appeal.

[5]Because the record contains no documentation or explanation of the alleged termination under Indiana law of Richard A.'s parental rights, the Court is unable to discern whether the Appellants' concerns in this area are legitimate.

[6]The petition indicates that the Appellants ultimately want Cary to legally adopt Richard and Devon and that they are seeking the guardianship as an interim measure.

and Robin Holland, a Child Protective Services worker for the DHHR, were also present at that hearing. Mr. Steele informed the court that the DHHR supported the Appellants' petition and urged the Court to appoint Cary as the children's guardian. The circuit court, however, questioned the need for a guardian given that Jennifer, the biological mother, was alive, healthy and capable of caring for the children. The circuit court declined to rule on the petition at that hearing, instead taking the matter under advisement.

Following the hearing, the Appellants submitted an additional brief, entitled "Response to Court's Query," further outlining their reasons for seeking the guardianship despite Jennifer's current good health and well-being. In that brief, the Appellants pointed out that Jennifer's employment with an ambulance service frequently renders her unreachable for significant periods of time. Thus, they asserted, the children's best interests would be served by giving Cary legal guardianship, so that she could make legal, medical and other decisions for the children when Jennifer is unavailable. The Appellants provided three examples of incidences that have occurred as a consequence of Cary not having the legal ability to make medical decisions for the children, but which could have been avoided had Cary been the children's legal guardian.

In the first incidence, Devon had fallen and injured his arm. Cary took him to the emergency room at the Plateau Medical Center, but the hospital refused to treat him because Cary could not legally consent to medical treatment. Jennifer was at work at the time, transporting a patient to Morgantown, West Virginia. Consequently, Devon did not receive treatment until a day later when Jennifer was back in Fayette County and could take him to the emergency room herself.

In another instance, which occurred while Richard was hospitalized for psychological treatment, Richard had been prescribed a medication that was causing him to shake. The hospital called the family home seeking consent to remove him from the medication. Jennifer was not home and Cary gave consent; the hospital, however, would not accept the consent from Cary, and continued to administer the medication until Jennifer, who had been at work at the time, was able to contact the hospital and give consent herself.

Finally, on a third occasion, Richard had been admitted to another hospital for psychiatric examination and treatment. The hospital would not allow Cary to visit Richard during his stay, and would not provide her with information about his treatment, care or progress because she was not his legal guardian. This occurred even though Jennifer was present at the hospital and requested that Cary be allowed to have such information and to visit with Richard.

The Appellants assert that all of these situations occurred despite the fact that Jennifer had executed a power of attorney permitting Cary to make medical decisions for the children in Jennifer's absence. The record contains a document entitled "Medical Power of Attorney," granting Cary the power to consent to health care decisions for Jennifer, when Jennifer is unable to do so for herself. In addition, the record includes a document entitled "Durable Power of Attorney," which names Cary as Jennifer's attorney-in-fact, and grants Cary full power over the (1) disposition of property, (2) collection of debts, (3) acquisition of property, (4) litigation, representation, and employment of assistance, (5) endorsing checks and depositing funds, (6) safe deposit boxes, (7) savings bonds, (8) borrowing money, (9) executing government vouchers, (10) tax returns, and (11) automobiles, trucks, and other personal property. It is unclear from the briefs and the record whether these two documents were presented by the Appellants to the medical institutions, or whether the Appellants had an additional power of attorney specifically authorizing Cary to make medical decisions for Richard and Devon in Jennifer's absence.

On August 14, 2008, the circuit court issued an Order denying the Appellants' petition. In that Order, the circuit court found that the Appellants could "accomplish their goals" through West Virginia Code § 44-10-1 (2000), which permits a biological parent to name, in their will, the person who is to be the guardian of their minor children in the event of their death. The circuit court further found that appointing Cary as a legal guardian "is not necessary at this time," stating that "the appointment of a non-relative as guardian while the custodial biological parent is alive, able and willing to care for the children has great potential to cause unnecessary difficulties in the future for both the biological mother and the minor children named herein." The circuit court then concluded that such appointment was not in the best interests of the children.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

On appeal, the Appellants argue that (1) the family court improperly transferred their petition for guardianship to the circuit court, and (2) the circuit court improperly interpreted the guardianship statute to require that certain factual circumstances exist as a prerequisite to appointing a legal guardian, specifically that the minor's biological parent or other legal guardian be unable or unwilling to properly care for the minor.

"Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review." Syl. Pt. 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W. Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995). However, "[t]his Court reviews the circuit court's final order and ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard." Syl. Pt. 4, in part, Burgess v. Porterfield, 196 W. Va. 178, 179, 469 S.E.2d 114, 115 (1996). The Court, therefore, reviews the family court's transfer of the guardianship petition and the circuit court's interpretation of the guardianship statute de novo, but reviews the circuit court's ultimate conclusion in this case for an abuse of discretion.

III.

DISCUSSION

A. Transfer of the Guardianship Petition

As an initial matter, the Appellants challenge the family court's transfer of their guardianship petition to the circuit court. In its "Order of Removal of Infant Guardianship Case to Circuit Court," the family court found, following a preliminary review, that the petition was based, in whole or in part, on allegations of abuse and neglect. Thus, pursuant to Rule 48a of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court,[7] it transferred the petition to the Circuit Court of Fayette County.

The statute under which the Appellants filed their guardianship petition, West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 (Supp. 2009) (effective June 14, 2006), indicates that a legal guardian may be appointed by either the family court or the circuit court in the county in which the minor resides. Rule 48a(a) of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court, however, limits the family court's authority by providing that:

> [i]f a family court learns that the basis, in whole or part, of a petition for infant guardianship brought pursuant to W. Va. Code § 44-10-3, is an allegation of child abuse and neglect, as defined in W. Va. Code § 49-1-3, then the family court before whom the guardianship case is pending, shall remove the case > to the circuit court for hearing. . . . At the circuit court hearing, allegations of child abuse and neglect must be proven by clear and convincing evidence.

[7]The family court Order removing the guardianship petition to circuit court incorrectly cites "Rule 47a" of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court as its basis for removal, rather than Rule 48a(a). In fact, Rule 47(a) provides for the appointment of guardian ad litems in family court cases, while Rule 48a(a) establishes the basis for removing a guardianship petition to circuit court.

In syllabus point seven of In re Abbigail Faye B., 222 W. Va. 466, 665 S.E.2d 300, this Court explained that Rule 48a(a) > requires that if a family court presiding over a petition for infant guardianship brought pursuant to W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 learns that the basis for the petition, in whole or in part, is an allegation of child abuse and neglect as defined by W. Va. Code § 49-1-3, then the family court is required to remove the petition to circuit court for a hearing thereon.

The Court in Abbigail Faye B. further held that when addressing such petitions, a circuit court must conduct a hearing on the allegations of abuse and neglect and may only grant the guardianship petition if such allegations are supported by clear and convincing evidence. 222 W. Va. at 469, 665 S.E2d at 303.

In the instant case, the Appellants' petition raises the issue of the prior abuse by Richard and Devon's father as one of several grounds for the guardianship. Specifically, in the petition, the Appellants set forth information about Richard A., including his abuse of Richard and Devon and his subsequent convictions, and they explain that Richard A. no longer pays child support and that a protective order prevents him from contacting the children. The Appellants argue that because Richard A. is an unfit parent, the court is not required to notify him of the guardianship proceeding. Moreover, the Appellants use the prior abuse by Richard A. as a basis to support the petition, arguing that appointing Cary as the children's guardian would help prevent Richard A. from ever successfully re-asserting parental rights.

On appeal, the Appellants contend that these references to the prior abuse by Richard A. are not new allegations of abuse or neglect which must be proven by clear and convincing evidence as required by Rule 48a(a) and Abbigail Faye B. Thus, the Appellants argue that the family court was not required to transfer the petition to circuit court and erred in doing so.

At the hearing following the removal of the petition, the circuit court noted that the allegations of abuse and neglect contained within the petition were not alleged to be presently existing, nor were the children in any present danger of abuse or neglect. Thus, the circuit court was not required to make a finding of abuse or neglect by clear and convincing evidence. Despite this acknowledgment, the circuit court did not address whether the family court's transfer of the petition to the circuit court constituted error, nor did it consider whether the case should be returned to the family court for further consideration. Importantly, the Appellants did not raise this issue with the circuit court either.

"In the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, this Court will not decide nonjurisdictional questions which were not considered and decided by the court from which the appeal has been taken." Syl. Pt. 1, Mowery v. Hitt, 155 W. Va. 103, 181 S.E.2d 334

(1971). Here, the issue is not jurisdictional in nature because West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 provides that either the family court or the circuit court in the county in which the minor resides may appoint a suitable person as a minor's guardian. Consequently, family and circuit courts have concurrent jurisdiction over appointing guardians under § 44-10-3 and, thus, the circuit court possessed jurisdiction to rule on the petition in this case. This Court, therefore, will not consider this issue which was not properly raised below.

B. The Guardianship Petition

The principle issue in the instant appeal is whether the circuit court erred in denying the Appellants' guardianship petition. Specifically, the Appellants contend that the circuit court improperly interpreted the infant guardianship statute to require, as a prerequisite to appointing Cary as the boys' legal guardian, that Jennifer be unable or unwilling to care for her children.

The statute on which the Appellants base their petition for guardianship, West Virginia Code § 44-10-3, entitled "Appointment and revocation of guardian by county commission,"[8] vests family and circuit courts with the authority to appoint guardians for minors. The statute does not describe the types of situations in which such appointments are [8]Prior to 2004, West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 (Supp. 1999) authorized county commissions to appoint guardians for minors. Although the Legislature, in 2004, amended the statute to transfer that authority to family and circuit courts, it did not change the title of the statute.

appropriate; rather, it simply states that a family or circuit court may appoint a suitable person as a minor's guardian. Specifically, the statute provides that > [t]he circuit court or family court of the county in which the minor resides, or if the minor is a nonresident of the state, the county in which the minor has an estate, may appoint as the minor's guardian a suitable person. The father or mother shall receive priority. However, in every case, the competency and fitness of the proposed guardian and the welfare and best interests of the minor shall be given precedence by the court when appointing the guardian.

W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) (emphasis added). Thus, the plain language of the statute neither requires nor prohibits the appointment of a legal guardian for a minor as an addition to, rather than a replacement for, the minor's biological parent or parents.

It is well-settled that "[a] statutory provision which is clear and unambiguous and plainly expresses the legislative intent will not be interpreted by the courts but will be given full force and effect." Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Epperly, 135 W. Va. 877, 65 S.E.2d 488 (1951). Although the statute at issue in this case is silent as to whether a family or circuit court may appoint a guardian in situations such as the one presented in this case, the statute clearly evinces a legislative intent to provide family and circuit courts with discretion in making such determinations. By stating that family and circuit courts may, rather than must, appoint a suitable person as a guardian for a minor, the Legislature granted family and circuit courts discretion in determining when the appointment of a guardian is appropriate.

Here, after reviewing the Appellants' petition for guardianship, the circuit court determined that appointing Cary as a guardian was not necessary, because Jennifer is "alive, able and willing to care for the children." It then denied the petition, noting that appointing a guardian under these circumstances could potentially create unnecessary difficulties in the future. Contrary to the Appellants' assertions, the circuit court did not wrongly interpret the guardianship statute to require that certain prerequisites be met for the appointment of a guardian, but rather the circuit court exercised the discretion afforded it by the Legislature to determine that the appointment of a guardian was not necessary in this case.

As more fully explained hereafter, alternative remedies exist, including the recently enacted "Caregiver's Consent Act," which provide alternate avenues by which the Appellants can address their legitimate concerns. Accordingly, under the circumstances presented in this case, and in light these alternative remedies, the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in denying the Appellants' petition.[9] The Court, therefore, affirms the decision of the circuit court.

C. Alternative Use of a Power of Attorney

As noted, the Appellants have expressed legitimate concerns regarding Cary's ability to make decisions for the boys in emergency situations. The facts in this case clearly demonstrate that, because Jennifer often travels for work while Cary stays at home, Cary is frequently the parent who first responds to medical, educational and other emergencies in the [9]Because circuit and family courts may be utilizing West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 to grant temporary guardianships to non-parents where a parent is absent, in order to stabilize the child's custodial situation or assure his receipt of benefits, the Court is hesitant to embark on any interpretation of existing law that would limit a family or circuit court's authority in this area. Such interpretation is unnecessary for resolution of the instant issue. Further, any analysis of the breadth of a family or circuit court's authority to grant guardianships to non-parents should only be made after such issues are fully briefed and argued, which has not occurred in this case. There is concern, however, that current interpretations of statutory and case law may permit family and circuit courts to appoint a legal guardian for a minor over the objection of a natural, unoffending parent whose parental rights have not been terminated. The appointment of a legal guardian for a child in such a situation could arguably divest the natural parent of his or her parental rights without meeting the legal standards required in termination proceedings. To be clear, however, the Court recognizes that situations do exist where a guardianship may be appropriate and in the child's best interests, even when there is a natural parent whose rights have not been terminated. See, e.g., In Re Nelson B., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___, 2010 WL 2346736 (W. Va. June 10, 2010).

Because these significant issues are not raised or briefed in the instant case, and because addressing them is unnecessary for resolution of the issues here, the Court declines to do so at this time. However, these are significant questions that the Legislature should perhaps review and address. Of course, in enacting any changes, the Legislature should be mindful of the large body of case law holding that the best interests of the child are always of predominate concern. See, e.g., Syl. pt. 5, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

family. Cary, therefore, needs to be able to make decisions for the children in these situations.

Under existing West Virginia law, the Appellants can achieve these goals through alternative means. First, as the circuit court noted, under West Virginia Code § 44-10-1, entitled "Testamentary Guardians," Jennifer may name Cary in her will as the individual to become the children's guardian in the event of Jennifer's death. In addition, as further explained herein, by executing a proper power of attorney and by utilizing a recently enacted West Virginia law known as the "Caregivers Consent Act," the Appellants can ensure that Cary has the authority necessary to properly care for the boys in Jennifer's absence.

On appeal, the Appellants argue that they had, in fact, executed a power of attorney authorizing Cary to make healthcare decisions for the boys in Jennifer's absence, but that several medical providers have refused to honor the power of attorney, thus preventing Cary from making such decisions or obtaining medical information about the children. As noted previously, the record on appeal includes two power of attorney documents. Neither of these documents, however, specifically permit Cary to make decisions for the children. Rather, the Appellants have executed a medical power of attorney which designates Cary to make medical decisions for Jennifer, in the event of Jennifer's incapacity, and a Durable Power of Attorney, which specifically grants Cary authority to make a variety of economic and property decisions. The record does not contain a power of attorney specifically granting Cary authority to make decisions for the children.

A "power of attorney" is "an instrument granting someone authority to act as agent or attorney-in-fact for the grantor. An ordinary power of attorney is revocable and automatically terminates upon death or incapacity of the principal." Blacks Law Dictionary 1290 (9th ed. 2009). Although no West Virginia statute specifically provides for an "ordinary" power of attorney by which a parent may grant authority over the care of their children to another adult, the authority to grant such powers exists at common law. While this Court has never directly addressed the legal basis for such powers of attorney, it has recognized on several occasions that such authority may be granted. See, e.g., In re Destiny Asia H., 211 W. Va. 481, 566 S.E.2d 618 (2002) (acknowledging a power of attorney executed by a parent who left her child temporarily with a friend, which authorized the friend "to act in loco parentis"); Baugh v. Merritt, 200 W. Va. 393, 395, 489 S.E.2d 775, 777 (1997) (remanding the case to the lower court for a determination of the parties' intent in executing a document entitled "Special Power of Attorney and Voluntary Appointment of Guardian"); Efaw v. Efaw, 184 W. Va. 355, 357, 400 S.E.2d 599, 601 (1990) (considering, as part of a determination of who had been the children's primary caretaker, a power of attorney authorizing the children's grandparents to make medical and other decisions for the children).

Although the record is unclear as to whether the Appellants had executed this type of power of attorney, to prevent any future confusion, the Court now clarifies that, at common law, a parent or legal guardian may transfer medical, educational, and other legal decision-making authority for his or her child or ward, to another adult through the execution of a power of attorney. Such instruments are revocable and automatically terminate upon disability or incapacity of the principal.

Moreover, a recently enacted law provides an additional avenue by which Jennifer may authorize Cary to make medical decisions for the boys. In the 2010 Legislative Session, the West Virginia Legislature passed the "Caregivers Consent Act," West Virginia Code § 49-11-1 to 10 (2010) (effective ninety days from March 8, 2010). This Act permits a "caregiver," who is an adult over the age of eighteen and is a relative by blood, adoption or marriage to a minor, or who has resided with a minor continuously during the immediately preceding six month period, to consent to health care and treatment on behalf of the minor, if the caregiver possesses an adequate affidavit. Id. §§ 49-11-2, -3. Such affidavit must provide the caregiver's name, address, birth date, and relationship with the minor, as well as the minor's name, birth date, and length of time residing with the caregiver. Id. § 49-11-5. In addition, the affidavit must be signed by the caregiver under oath, and by the minor's parent or guardian, consenting to the caregiver's authority. Id. The parent or guardian's signature is not necessary, however, if they are unavailable despite the caregiver's attempts to locate them and seek their permission. Id. The affidavit is valid for one year, or until the minor no longer resides with the caregiver, which ever is less. Id. § 49-11-6(b). In addition, a parent or guardian may rescind the affidavit by writing at any time. Id. § 49-11-6(a).

Accordingly, pursuant to the Caregiver's Consent Act, an adult over the age of eighteen who is not legally related to a minor, but who has resided continuously with the minor for the immediately preceding six month period, may consent to health care and treatment on behalf of the minor, so long as that adult possesses an adequate affidavit, as set forth in that Act. Because Cary has resided continuously with the boys for more than the most recent six-month period, it appears that, under the Caregivers Consent Act, the Appellants may execute an affidavit permitting Cary to consent to health care and treatment for the boys. See id. §§ 49-11-2, -3. The execution of such affidavit, combined with a power of attorney and the testamentary designation of Cary as the children's guardian in the event of Jennifer's death, should allow the Appellants to substantially achieve the practical objectives that they had hoped to achieve through a guardianship appointment.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated herein, the Court affirms the final Order of the Circuit Court of Fayette County, West Virginia, entered on August 14, 2008, denying the Appellants' petition for guardianship.

Affirmed.

No. 34751 - In Re: Richard P. and Devon P.

FILED
September 3, 2010
RORY L. PERRY II, CLERK
SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

Davis, Chief Justice, concurring:

I agree with the result obtained by the majority of the Court, and I concur that, pursuant to W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 (2006) (Repl. Vol. 2010), the decision of whether a guardian should be appointed for a minor child in a particular case rests within the sound discretion of the presiding court. Nevertheless, I feel compelled to write separately to reiterate my concerns regarding the inadequacy of the guardianship statutes currently in place that fail to consider the unique circumstances of modern-day families and leave such parents with little assurance that their children will be sufficiently provided for in an emergency situation.

Throughout its jurisprudence, the Court frequently has acknowledged that a parent has the right to the custody of his/her child. See, e.g., Syl. pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973) ("In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions."); Syl., Whiteman v. Robinson, 145 W. Va. 685, 116 S.E.2d 691 (1960) ("A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality, abandonment or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts.").

Attending such custodial rights is the parent's corresponding responsibility to make decisions to promote and ensure his/her child's well-being, including making provisions for the child's care in the event of an emergency. Although such arrangements necessarily must comport with a child's best interests and are presumed to be made by a parent in accordance therewith,[1] providing for a child's best interests and well-being in anticipation of an emergency situation is not always easily achieved as is evidenced by the presence of the case sub judice before this Court. While the instant proceeding arose in the context of a less traditional family structure, the concerns expressed by Jennifer and Cary might easily have occurred in any number of typical American households. Oftentimes, a child's parent is requested to sign a form authorizing another person to obtain medical care for a child as a prerequisite to the child's participation in school, sports, extracurricular, or religious activities. However, a seeming double-standard exists when, as here, a parent's attempt to give another person the authority to seek medical care for his/her child is not heeded, arguably because such authorization was not provided on an "official" childcare authorization form such as would be used by schools and sports, extracurricular, and religious organizations.

[1]See, e.g., Syl. pt. 3, in part, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996) ("Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal . . . in all family law matters . . . must be the health and welfare of the children.").

In still other families, as with the family involved in this case, one of the child's parents might work very far from home, or even out of the country, as with the case of a tractor trailer driver or deployed military personnel. The parent remaining at home in both such families understandably would want to make provisions for his/her child should something happen to the home-based parent given the delay in contacting the off-site parent. Appointment of an alternate formal guardian pursuant to W. Va. Code § 44-10-3 is not always viable because it is rather invasive of the parents' parental rights, yet the necessity of executing decision-making documents that will be honored by medical, educational, and other facilities is of real concern to these families. Similar problems arise in households in which the children have only one residential parent–either because the other parent is deceased or because the other parent's parental rights have not been exercised or have been terminated. In these families, what happens if the remaining parent becomes incapacitated and cannot care for the children or if that parent is out of town and cannot be reached? Does the law of this State enable this parent to adequately plan for such a contingency?

While the Legislature has made significant inroads in recent months to accommodate a parent's need to provide for his/her children's medical care in the event of an emergency through its enactment of the Caregivers Consent Act, W. Va. Code § 49-11-1, et seq., more certainty and direction is needed to ensure that a parent's authorization of another to act on his/her behalf for his/her child's well-being will be respected by medical, educational, and legal authorities. This Court, too, through its recognition of a power of attorney as a method by which a parent may delegate medical, educational, and legal decision-making authority regarding his/her child to another adult gives parents substantial power to plan for their children's safety and well-being in the event of an emergency. With the promulgation of this new statutory law and the Court's decision of this opinion, I fervently hope that other families will not have to endure the turmoil that Jennifer and Cary have undergone, all in an effort to provide for the best interests of their children. However, whether either an affidavit prepared in accordance with the Caregivers Consent Act or a power of attorney executed pursuant to this Court's holding will satisfy the demands of cautiously wary educational, medical, and legal institutions to actually permit a non-parent to exercise such delegated decision-making authority remains to be seen. While the law of this State is evolving to recognize the changing dynamics of modern families and the arrangements they wish to make to provide for unforeseen contingencies, many institutions have not yet embraced the accommodations that are required to carry out these parents' legally enforceable decisions for the care of their children.

As a final matter, I would be remiss if I did not also comment on the Court's seeming reluctance, in footnote nine of the majority's opinion, to embrace the discretion afforded to courts to appoint guardians for minor children. As clearly delineated in the guardianship statute, see W. Va. Code § 44-10-3, and as I pointedly held in Syllabus point 6 of In re Abbigail Faye B., 222 W. Va. 466, 665 S.E.2d 300 (2008), courts have the discretion to determine when a child's best interests require the appointment of a guardian. See W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) (2006) (Repl. Vol. 2010) ("The circuit court or family court of the county in which the minor resides, or if the minor is a nonresident of the State, the county in which the minor has an estate, may appoint as the minor's guardian a suitable person." (emphasis added)). See also Syl. pt. 6, In re Abbigail Faye B., 222 W. Va. 466, 665 S.E.2d 300 (2008) ("Pursuant to the plain language of W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a) (2006) (Supp. 2007), the circuit court or family court of the county in which a minor resides may appoint a suitable person to serve as the minor's guardian. In appointing a guardian, the court shall give priority to the minor's mother or father. 'However, in every case, the competency and fitness of the proposed guardian and the welfare and best interests of the minor shall be given precedence by the court when appointing the guardian.' W. Va. Code § 44-10-3(a)." (emphasis added)). This discretion is clearly provided for in the governing statutory law and should be accepted without question.

It goes without saying that the law dictating precisely when a guardian should be appointed for a minor child is murky and does not contemplate all of the nuances of today's modern family. Although custodial placements are not directly at issue in this case, the majority's reticence to permit courts to appoint guardians in necessary circumstances may thwart a court's ability to honor a child's best interests by prematurely thrusting him/her into a custodial placement with a parent or another adult with whom the child does not have an established relationship. For example, a child may be living with one parent and have little or no contact with his/her other parent who moves out of state following the parents' divorce. If the child's residential parent dies, becomes incapacitated, or otherwise becomes unfit to care for the child, and if the non-residential parent is fit to have the child's custody, the law governing child custody directs that child's best interests are best served by a gradual transition to the non-residential parent's custody. See Syl. pt. 3, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991) ("It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives."). The appointment of a guardian under such circumstances would serve to accomplish this transition by bridging the gap between the former residential parent's custody and the subsequent non-residential parent's custody. Such a guardian might simply be a grandparent with whom the child has an exceptionally close relationship and with whom the child previously has resided. In this scenario, the appointed guardian might not be afforded the full gamut of parental rights but the guardian would be vested with the ability to make decisions on the child's behalf to ensure his/her safety and well-being during the period of transition. If courts are not afforded the discretion–granted to them by statute– to appoint guardians, the gradual transition of custody most befitting the child's best interests could not be accomplished in such a case. Therefore, I urge that any decisions or changes in the law regarding the propriety of guardianship appointments be made with extreme caution to ensure that innocent children do not become hapless victims of the laws that are intended to provide them with safety and security.

Although progress has been made through the recent decisions of this Court to clarify the circumstances in which the appointment of a guardian is appropriate and by the Legislature with its promulgation of the Caregivers Consent Act, additional legislative action must be taken to further clarify the process by which laypersons may delegate medical, educational, and legal decision-making authority for their children in the event of an emergency. Until such further guidance is provided, and heeded by the medical, educational, and legal institutions to whom parents direct such permission, I remain cautiously optimistic about families' abilities to adequately plan for the safety and well-being of their children should an emergency arise.

For the foregoing reasons, I respectfully concur in the majority's decision in this case.

Attorney for the Appellant

Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by Theresa Ann O. from an order of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County denying her petition for custody of her two infant children, the custody of whom was previously awarded to her former husband. On appeal, the appellant claims that the evidence adduced demonstrates that the circumstances of the parties have changed and that the change of custody which she seeks will materially promote the welfare of her children. Under the circumstances, she claims that the Circuit Court of Kanawha County erred in denying her petition for modification of the previous custody award and for custody of the children. After reviewing the documents filed and the issues presented, this Court agrees with the appellant. The judgment of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County is, therefore, reversed.

The parties to this proceeding, Theresa Ann O. and Robert Darrell O., were divorced by order of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County entered on August 14, 1989. The final order incorporated a settlement agreement dated January 10, 1989, in which the parties agreed that Robert Darrell O. would be granted custody of the parties' two infant children, A.L.O., who is now twelve years old, and E.C.O., who is now ten years old. The settlement agreement also provided that the appellant was to have extensive visitation with the children.

After entry of the final divorce order, the appellant married a captain in the United States Army, who was subsequently stationed in Germany and in Virginia. He and the appellant now reside in California.

Over the years, the appellant has had extensive visitation with the children, including lengthy stays by them with her in Germany and in Virginia.

During the children's last visit with the appellant in California, she found her youngest child in the bathroom crying. When asked why he was upset, he told the appellant that he could no longer take beatings from his father.

After questioning the children extensively, the appellant learned that, according to the children, they had been subjected to frequent and excessive corporal punishment, including once when the appellant's daughter was beaten by her father at the drive-in window in a bank in Charleston, West Virginia.

The appellant investigated the children's stories and found that a teller at the drive-in window at the bank had actually reported to the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Services that the appellant's daughter had been beaten in the car by her father while conducting a drive-through banking transaction and that an investigation of the incident had resulted.

After learning this information, the appellant filed a petition in the Circuit Court of Kanawha County for modification of the previous custody award and for custody of the parties' children.

Hearings were conducted following the filing of the petition for modification of custody. During the hearings, Ingrid Schwartz, a child protective service worker for the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Services, and Vanessa Lynn Connor, the bank teller who witnessed the beating at the Charleston bank, testified. The parties' two children also testified in camera. Ms. Schwartz testified that she was assigned to investigate the case after the Department received a phone call stating that a woman had witnessed Robert Darrell O. hitting his daughter. She interviewed both children and testified that:

> Basically they both stated that there was an argument in the car. They did not disclose that [Robert Darrell O.] had struck his daughter. And I remember [E.C.O.], the son -- I asked him if he had seen [Robert Darrell O.] hit his sister and he said they started arguing and he looked the other way.

On cross-examination, Ms. Schwartz testified that she asked the daughter if her father had hit her, and the daughter replied, "No."

The second witness, Vanessa Lynn Connor, the bank teller who witnessed the beating at the bank, testified that the appellant's former husband had driven to the teller window and that a little girl was in the passenger seat in the front of the vehicle. While conducting a banking transaction, Ms. Connor testified that she looked up and saw the man hitting the little girl. She indicated that the man, whom she could identify from the transaction process, repeatedly hit the little girl with his forearm. She testified:

> A. . . . And he was hitting her -- It was about in the chest area. And he was hitting her repeatedly very hard.
> Q. When you say repeatedly, did you see how many time he struck her?
>
> A. I didn't count. I was in so much shock. It was several times.
>
> Q. Did you notice the little girl's reaction?
>
> A. She was crying very hard. When he stopped she had her school books up around her chest like a shield. I have never seen a look of fear like I did on her face. She was terrified.

Ms. Conner then identified the appellant's husband from recognition as the party who did the striking.

In discussing the incident at the bank, the appellant's daughter, who was eleven at the time of the hearing, testified that on the day of the beating at the bank, she had failed to brush her teeth and the father noticed that fact. She stated that "[h]e excessively smacked me on the lower part of the body." When asked if he had done that before, she replied that he had and added that her brother was hit more than she was.

The appellant's daughter also stated that on one occasion, when she was in the second grade, her father hit her fifty to sixty times on the rear and that it had turned black and blue and stayed black and blue for two days. She also said that her father, on occasion, had struck her brother. She testified:

> He [her brother] had left his race car out in the rain and when he went to get it Dad got all mad and he smacked [E.C.O.] once, you know, just once or twice and he made him throw it away even though it still worked. He sometimes has a bad temper. He'll yell at us if we spill our milk.

During the hearing, the appellant's daughter further testified that she did not want to live with her father when she went into puberty. She indicated that she had discussed this with her mother, the appellant, but that this was her own idea, not her mother's idea.

The appellant's son, who was nine at the time of the hearing, testified that he had always wanted to live with his mother and did not know how he had come to live with his father.

Relating to his reason for wanting to live with his mother, the appellant's son testified:

> A. The reason why --- Some of the reason I want to live with Mom is I'm tired of being slapped.
>
> Q. Oh. Did he slap you?
>
> A. Yes. He slapped me several times.
>
> Q. When did he slap you?
>
> A. So many times I can't remember.

Q. Does he get mad?

A. Yes. He gets mad very easily and he drinks quite a bit.

Q. He does?

A. He drinks coke with wine in it, or he has two or three beers.

He further testified:

Q. You don't think you would get -- If you come back to stay with your father for a while, you don't think you would change your mind?

A. No.

Q. Why not?

A. Because I'm sure I want to live with Mom. I thought it over and I'm positive.

Q. What about your sister?

A. Same thing with her.

During the hearings, the appellant's former husband testified:

In the course of my children's life, they have had their hands slapped or their rears slapped for disciplinary reasons. Presently they get yelled at more than I would like to, but they get yelled at and sent to their room, which is really the only functional discipline that they receive now.

He testified that the incident at the bank was the only time either child had been touched during the year. He indicated that in the past when he had spanked the children, he had swatted them three or four times on the rear.

At the conclusion of the first hearing, the family law master entered a temporary order granting custody of the children to the appellant and directing that the parties and the children present themselves to a psychologist.

The parties and the children were interviewed by Jeffrey Harlow, a licensed psychologist, who reported that the appellant's former husband had unresolved feelings about the divorce, which included anger and remorse. He stated that the appellant's husband attempted to deny his anger and frustrated feelings and they increased over time. He then expressed them suddenly. The psychologist concluded that this and his impatience were significant personality weaknesses. He concluded that while the appellant's husband had the personality characteristics to be a parent, his "discipline techniques are inappropriate, inconsistent and ineffective . . . His slapping of the children falls within the grey area in regard to physical abuse." On the other hand, Mr. Harlow concluded that the appellant had the cognitive and personality attributes sufficient for her to provide parenting for the two children.

The psychologist noted that the two children wanted to live with their mother, and he indicated that the little girl's verbal intellectual abilities were very superior and that her general intellectual functioning was superior. He also found that the parties' son felt emotionally closer to his mother.

The psychologist found that the appellant's husband's discipline techniques were inappropriate, inconsistent, and ineffective and stated that regardless of the outcome of the custody proceeding, he should be required to receive instruction and guidance in effective disciplinary procedures.

During the hearings, two witnesses for the appellant's former husband testified. One was a close neighbor, who generally described the appellant's husband as a good father who participated regularly in the schooling and extracurricular activities of his children. The other witness was the appellant's mother, who testified that the appellant's former husband had permitted her to spend a lot of time with the children and she testified generally that the appellant's former husband was a good father who allowed the children liberal visitation with their maternal grandparents.

At the conclusion of the hearings, the family law master, on October 5, 1993, issued a recommended order in which he recommended that custody of the children be changed from the appellant's husband to the appellant. The family law master found that:

> Dr. Harlow's report indicates that the bank teller's and children's version of the bank incident is closer to the truth than that of the plaintiff, who is apparently denying Dr. Harlow's interpretation that plaintiff seems to be over-emotional at times. Dr. Harlow did not make a recommendation as to custody, but did strongly recommend that plaintiff be required to receive instruction and guidance in effective disciplinary procedures.

The master also found that "these children have clearly expressed a preference for living with their mother . . . and have given good reasons for changing custody," and he noted that the daughter gave as one reason for wanting to reside with her mother that she was entering puberty and felt she would be more comfortable with her mother during this period in her life.

The appellant's former husband filed exceptions to the recommendation of the family law master, and a hearing on the exceptions was held before the Circuit Court of Kanawha County.

At the conclusion of the hearing, the circuit court rejected the recommendation of the family law master and refused to modify the previous custody arrangement entered into by the parties and adopted by the court. The court stated:

> This Court does not feel that good reasons have been presented to justify a change in custody nor does it feel that there has been a showing of significant change in circumstances to warrant such a change. The mere fact that 11 and 9 year old children express a desire to live with the non-custodial parent, particularly after a lengthy stay with that parent, is not and never has been sufficient grounds to warrant a change in custody.

The court accordingly denied the appellant's petition for a change of custody, but did order the appellant's former husband to attend parenting classes and counselling to assist him in maintaining control of his anger.

On appeal, the appellant claims that the circuit court erred in failing to follow the family law master's recommendation regarding change of custody.

In Higginbotham v. Higginbotham, 189 W. Va. 519, 432 S.E.2d 789 (1993), this Court indicated that there were limitations on a circuit court's authority to depart from a family law master's recommendation in a domestic relations case. In syllabus point 1 of Higginbotham, the Court stated:

> W. Va. Code, 48A-4-10(c) (1990), limits a circuit judge's ability to overturn a family law master's findings and conclusions unless they fall within one of the six enumerated statutory criteria contained in this section. Moreover, Rule 52(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure requires a circuit court which changes a family law master's recommendation to make known its factual findings and conclusions of law.

The six criteria which authorize a circuit court to depart from a family law master's recommendations are set forth in W. Va. Code, 48A-4-20, as follows:

> The circuit court shall not follow the recommendation, findings and conclusions of a master found to be: (1) Arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion or otherwise not in conformance with the law; (2) Contrary to constitutional right, power, privilege or immunity; (3) In excess of statutory jurisdiction, authority or limitations or short of statutory right; (4) Without observance of procedure required by law; (5) Unsupported by substantial evidence; or (6) Unwarranted by the facts.

In the present case, the court did not find that the family law master's decision was arbitrary, capricious, or not in conformance with the law or contrary to constitutional right, power, privilege, or immunity, or in excess of statutory jurisdiction, or entered without observance of procedure required by law. Essentially, it appears that the circuit court found that the family law master's conclusion was unsupported by substantial evidence or unwarranted by the facts.

The fundamental rule to be applied in determining whether the evidence or facts in a case justify a change in child custody is set forth in syllabus point 2 of Cloud v. Cloud, 161 W. Va. 45, 239 S.E.2d 669 (1977), as follows:

> To justify a change of child custody, in addition to a change in circumstances of the parties, it must be shown that such change would materially promote the welfare of the child.

In the present case, it appears that the trial court concluded that the family law master's recommendation of a change in custody was predicated solely upon the family law master's finding that the children had expressed a preference to live with the appellant rather than with their father.

A close examination of the family law master's findings shows that, while indicating that the master did consider the children's preferences, the master also considered the evidence relating to the striking of the parties' child in the presence of the bank teller. The master found that the psychologist indicated that the children's version of the bank incident was closer to the truth than that of their father. The family law master also found that the psychologist indicated that the children's father was over-emotional at times and that he required instruction and guidance in effective disciplinary procedures.

This Court has recognized that physical abuse of a child by a parent may properly serve as a ground for transfer of custody of a child. See Rozas v. Rozas, 176

W. Va. 235, 342 S.E.2d 201 (1986), and State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W. Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d 798 (1969). While the striking of the child involved in the present case did not rise to the level of abuse, it was characterized by the psychologist as being in the grey area of abuse.

Further, in the present case, the children did express a clear preference for living with their mother. It is apparent that the children are very intelligent, and it appears that they did, in a thoughtful manner, consider and weigh various factors in arriving at their decisions relating to custodial preference. Their decisions apparently were not based only on the appellant's husband's approach to discipline or on single incidents, but on various factors.

In a number of cases, this Court has discussed the impact of a child's preference on the question of which parent should have custody of the child. On the one hand, the Court has indicated that ". . . [A]n adolescent fourteen years of age or older . . . has an absolute right under W. Va. Code, 44-10-4 [1923] to nominate his own guardian." Syllabus point 7, Garska v. McCoy, 167 W. Va. 59, 278 S.E.2d 357 (1981). On the other hand, the Court has recognized that children under six years of age usually cannot articulate an intelligent opinion about their custody and, obviously, the preferences of such children should be given little weight. See, David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W. Va. 57, 385 S.E.2d 912 (1989); J.B. v. A.B., 161 W. Va. 332, 242 S.E.2d 248 (1978). In between the two extremes, the Court has suggested that if the children can articulate preferences and explain their preferences, their preferences should be accorded some weight. See, David M. v. Margaret M., supra.

In view of all this, the Court believes that the expressions of preference of the children in the present case should be entitled to some weight.

Overall, in this Court's view, a fair reading of the evidence suggests that the family law master's recommendation was supported by clear findings of fact and conclusions of law based on facts which, under the decisions of this Court, would justify a change of custody.

Given the conclusion that the family law master's decision was based on facts and findings that would support a change of custody, and given the fact that the circuit court failed to find that the family law master's decision was inappropriate under any of the other circumstances discussed in W. Va. Code, 48A-4-20, this Court believes that the circuit court erred in reversing the family law master's decision and in failing to transfer custody of the infant children in this case to the appellant.

From the human perspective, this is a very difficult case, and we do not reach this conclusion lightly. This father has done the lion's share of parenting over the last five years of these children's lives. The record indicates that they are intelligent, active children and that their father has been extremely dedicated to them.

The Court notes that the appellee has been a caring father and that, except for his problems relating to the disciplining of the children, he apparently has taken excellent care of them. Also, it appears that he has sought, and seriously engaged in, counselling to modify his attitude and approach to discipline. Somewhat similarly, the children have indicated that they are emotionally attached to him.

This Court has recognized that a change of custody is a traumatic event for minor children, and it likewise recognizes that it can be a traumatic event for parents. For instance, in syllabus point 3 of James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991), the Court stated:

> It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives.

See also, Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W. Va. 488, 338 S.E.2d 322 (1989).

While this Court adheres to the principle that the welfare of the child is the paramount consideration, the Court also believes that a change in custody should, where possible and where consistent with the welfare and best interests of the children, be undertaken in a manner to lessen parental trauma and to facilitate stability in the children's lives.

In the present case, where it is evident that both parents care deeply for the children, and the children care deeply for both parents, and where the children are currently receiving proper and good care and are in the middle of their school year, where they are doing quite well in school and in extracurricular activities, the Court believes that the actual transfer of custody should be postponed until the end of the present school year.

The judgment of the Circuit Court of Kanawha County is, therefore, reversed, and this case is remanded with directions that the circuit court modify the previous custody order and grant custody of the children to the appellant in the manner consistent with the principles stated in this opinion. See footnote 1

Reversed and remanded with directions.

Footnote: 1 It appears that the change of custody in this case will require that the circuit court address the question of child support. The circuit court is, therefore, authorized and directed to take such action on remand as is reasonably necessary to provide for adequate financial support for the children.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia

In the Matter of Ronald Lee WILLIS

No. 13379
Submitted Oct. 9, 1973
Decided Dec. 11, 1973
Dissenting Opinion July 29, 1974

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions.

2. West Virginia Code, Chapter 49, Article 6, Section 2, as amended, and the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions prohibit a court or other arm of the State from terminating the parental rights of a natural parent having legal custody of his child, without notice and the opportunity for a meaningful hearing.

3. In an emergency which imminently threatens the welfare, health or life of any minor child, the State, as Parens patriae, exercises an interest which temporarily overrides the rights of natural parents to the custody of the child and warrants the assumption of the child's custody by the State for a reasonable time, without regard to the requirements of Due Process.

4. Any retention of a minor child by the State, accomplished in the first instance by emergency procedures, beyond a period necessary to serve the legitimate interest of government to protect the health and welfare of the child, is unwarranted and unjustified and though presumptively legal at its inception, is, by the passage of time coupled with the omissions of the State to accord due process to the natural parents, void ab initio and of no effect in law.

5. Though constitutionally protected, the right of the natural parent to the custody of minor children is not absolute and it may be limited or terminated by the State, as Parens patriae, if the parent is proved unfit to be entrusted with child care.

6. The standard of proof required to support a court order limiting or terminating parental rights to the custody of minor children is clear, cogent and convincing proof.

7. Each neglect proceeding in a juvenile court based upon the ground of unfitness of the natural parent must be decided on its own particular facts.

8. Once a court exercising proper jurisdiction has made a determination upon sufficient proof that a child has been neglected and his natural parents were so derelict in their duties as to be unfit, the welfare of the infant is the polar star by which the discretion of the court is to be guided in making its award of legal custody. Even then, the legal rights of the parents, being founded in nature and wisdom, will be respected unless they have been transferred or abandoned.

HADEN, Justice:
This is an appeal by John and Rosetta Willis, husband and wife, from a judgment of the Juvenile Court of Fayette County of November 22, 1972 which, upon a finding of neglect terminated their parental rights in their infant child, Ronald Lee Willis, and awarded the legal custody of the child to the West Virginia Department of Welfare, with full power and authority in the department to consent to his adoption.

The State first commenced action in this case on December 23, 1968 upon the filing of an unsworn petition by Regina Hardin, a social worker with the welfare department, which alleged that all five minor children of the Willises were 'neglected' as defined by the laws of the State. The petition contained no factual allegations supporting 'neglect' but merely conclusional words that such children were neglected. According to the testimony of a co- worker of Regina Hardin given in subsequent proceedings almost four years after the filing of the initial petition, the apparent reasons for the action of the welfare department at that time were the extremely unsanitary and substandard living conditions to be found in the Willis home and the poor physical appearance and condition of the minor children living there.

On December 23, 1968, the Juvenile Court of Fayette County entered an order transferring the custody of the children to the welfare department on a temporary basis. The action of the court was taken without notice to the parents, and in that the order stated a hearing was 'pending,' it is indicated that further judicial action was contemplated. Pursuant to the direction of the court, the welfare department, accompanied by a deputy sheriff of Fayette County, assumed custody of the Willis Children on December 28, 1968.

Within several months after the temporary custody change was accomplished, the four older Willis children then ranging in age from four to fourteen years were, at their request, restored to their parents. Ronald Lee, however, was not returned; he had been placed with foster parents shortly after his custody was removed from his natural parents. He has since resided with the foster parents continuously from the date of placement by the welfare department to the present. Considering his age to have been approximately eight months at the time of the initial placement and now to be approximately five and one-half years, he has lived for almost the total of his short life with the foster parents.

From the date of the initial State action in December of 1968 until a court hearing some three years later, John Willis, the natural father of the infant, made repeated informal requests and attempts to regain custody of Ronald Lee, and also to comply with the suggestions and directions of the welfare department to remedy the conditions existing at the home which had apparently precipitated the initial removal of the Willis children.

It was not until February 3, 1972 that further legal proceedings were instituted concerning Ronald Lee's custody. On that date a second petition was filed with the juvenile court by Bruce L. Webb, also a social worker with the department, alleging Ronald Lee Willis to be a neglected child, and alleging as factual grounds constituting neglect, that the child 'has resided with his foster parents for approximately three years; all efforts to improve the natural parents' condition for return have failed; the natural parents' slow mentality also prohibits the child's return to them.'

A hearing was held on that petition on February 15, 1972, at which time both parents were present and represented by counsel, and the petitioner Webb was present and represented by the county prosecutor. Although no transcript or record was taken of that proceeding, an order was entered on the day following the hearing by the juvenile court finding the child to be neglected and permanently awarding his custody, care and control to the welfare department with 'the right to said Department to consent to the said infant's adoption.' The findings and judgment of the court were excepted to by the parents.

Subsequent to the court's order of February 16, 1972, the appellants' counsel informed the social worker Webb, that his clients intended to seek a review of the court's order and requested that Webb, on behalf of the welfare department, notify appellants if further proceedings were contemplated with respect to the infant Ronald Lee. Webb acknowledged such a conversation did occur and that he had agreed to notify the appellants of any change of position by the department in respect to Ronald Lee's custody, but also, he had been assured he would be contacted later by the appellants or their counsel and he was not so contacted. In any event, on April 26, 1972, Webb participated in an adoption proceeding before the same juvenile court in which the child Ronald Lee was permitted to be adopted by the foster parents with whom he had been previously placed by the department. All such proceedings were had and concluded without notifying the Willises.

On May 2, 1972, John Willis the father, through counsel, requested a rehearing upon the validity of the final order of February 16, assailing the order as invalid because the Willises received inadequate notice of the hearing. The petition also was attacked as insufficient in law, challenged hearsay evidence was admitted and considered by the court and the evidence established by proof at the hearing was insufficient in law to constitute neglect. On May 12, 1972, the juvenile court entertained the appellants' motion for rehearing, and as reflected by an order entered August 21, 1972, the court voided the decree of February 16, 1972. It is to be noted that the rather sketchy transcript recounting the proceedings of February 15, 1972 does not reflect that service of notice was had upon the appellants prior to that hearing, nor does any record reflect an affirmative waiver of notice on the part of the appellants.

On August 25, 1972, the court reconsidered its previous order of August 21, 1972 and vacated it for the reason that the petition of February 3, 1972 failed to set forth allegations sufficient to meet the minimum requirements of West Virginia Code, Chapter 49, Article 6, Section 1, as amended. The court also accorded the Willises a 'rehearing' on the matters adjudicated in the February 16 decree. Although this court action took place on August 25, an order reflecting this and other proceedings was not entered until October 6, 1972 after the conclusion of all testimony in a neglect proceeding reheld in September 1972.

It further appears from the corrective order of October 6 either a 'rehearing' or an entirely new proceeding commenced on August 25 at the instance of the welfare department, the final object of which was to seek a court decree declaring Ronald Lee Willis to be a neglected child, to terminate the parental rights of the appellants and to gain authority for the welfare department to consent to the child's adoption. All parties were present and were generally aware of the purport and intent of the proceedings. Counsel for the appellants waived formal notice of the proceeding on behalf of his clients as to matters contained in a handwritten petition apparently prepared coincident with the convening of the hearing. On that date the court was notified the department also intended to prove John Willis' unfitness as a parent by offering evidence of his intoxication at various times over the previous years. Appellants' counsel objected on the basis of surprise. The juvenile court informally ruled the department could amend its petition so as to enable it to adduce proof on the intoxication issue and other matters relating to the appellants' fitness and to conditions in the home. Appellants were also given opportunity for a continuance to meet the new matters asserted by the welfare department, and hearings in the case actually did not begin until September 7, and were not concluded until September 29, 1972.

On November 22, 1972, the transcript reflects the filing or entry of three documents. First, an order was entered permitting the State to present evidence on the issue of intoxication; second, filing the 'new' or 'amended' juvenile petition which recited Inter alia on the complaint of Bruce L. Webb, social service worker with the department of welfare, that:

> 'Ronald Lee Willis is an infant four years of age; that the said infant lives and resides with his foster parents (now adoptive parents) Buford and Roxie Blevins.

'Your petitioner would further show unto your Honor that the said infant aforementioned as of about the 3 day of February, 1972, had resided with said foster parents for about three years; that prior thereto had lived with his natural parents, Mr. and Mrs. John F. Willis in Fayette County, in a house not fit or suitable for human occupancy; said parents' hom e was frequently without proper heat in cold weather, also in a dirty and filthy condition; said child was kept dirty; said hom e was in disrepair; and said child was not given care and supervision adequate for his physical, em otional or social needs and with the result that the future welfare and well being of said child were seriously endangered. The father, John F. Willis, drank intoxicants frequently and excessively and became intoxicated in the presence of his children.'

This petition was signed and verified on the 30th day of October, 1972.

The concluding entry on November 22, 1972 was the final order of the juvenile court decreeing in accordance with the prayer of the petition that:

'. . . Ronald Lee Willis under the evidence introduced in the hearings in this matter is and the court finds him to be a neglected child.
'It is further ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED that the care, custody and control of Ronald Lee Willis is permanently removed from his natural father and mother, John Willis and Rosetta Mary Neal Willis.
'The court being of the opinion that it is necessary for the welfare of the child does terminate the parental rights and responsibilities of the child' s parents and the permanent care, custody and control of Ronald Lee Willis is granted and awarded to the State Departm ent of Welfare and the State Department of Welfare shall have the right to give consent to the adoption of Ronald Lee Willis.'

This order was entered without notice to appellants or their counsel.

The foregoing represents our best efforts to recount the legal proceedings which resulted in the final order appealed from. Inasmuch as orders were entered recounting and ratifying events which occurred considerably prior to their reflection in the official record, it is hoped the preceding account accurately reflects the chronology of procedures employed in the Juvenile Court of Fayette County.

Parenthetically, it also should be noted that the adoption proceedings of the infant Ronald Lee Willis concluded on April 26, 1972, are the subject of a separate revocation proceeding by the appellants herein against the department of welfare and Buford and Roxie Blevins, the adoptive parents. The adoption proceeding remains on the docket of the Juvenile Court of Fayette County pending the outcome of this appeal.

All the evidence which is before this Court was taken at the two hearings of September 7 and September 29, 1972.

From the testimony given by Nellie MacMillion, a welfare department social worker, it affirmatively appears that from sometime in 1966 to a period in 1969, within a few months after the initial taking of the Willis children from their natural parents, the living conditions in the home were severely substandard. During her visits to the home she found that there was a strong odor in the house; the family used the area around the house for their bodily functions; there was human excreta in the house; and cooking utensils were filthy. As to the physical structure of the house, the only heating unit, a stove, was propped up with bricks and rocks; there were no bathroom facilities; the kitchen facilities were such that it was impossible to prepare complete meals; there were only two bedrooms in the house. There were twelve persons occupying the house in December of 1968. Found in that environment, Ronald Lee, the disputed infant, appeared anemic, underdeveloped and undernourished as well as being physically dirty. Additionally, the witness testified she had observed a number of partially-filled wine bottles in the home and, on one occasion during that time period, she had observed Mr. Willis in an intoxicated state in the county jail. Based upon those things it was her opinion the care of all the Willis children was inadequate.

In her later testimony on cross-examination, Mrs. MacMillion said that she had no personal knowledge of what had occurred in relation to the Willis family or the home living conditions since her last visit early in 1969. She also stated she had been unsuccessful in locating new living quarters for the Willis family although she attempted to assist them in upgrading their living conditions, and acknowledged that the visiting homemaking services extended by the department of welfare to dependent families were not utilized in this instance since no such service was available in Fayette County.

For the period from March 1970 until February of 1972, Bruce Webb, the social worker most recently assigned to this family, also gave corroborating testimony in regard to the living conditions in the home. He observed the Willis children who had returned to the home as being unkempt and dirty and stated the home condition had remained generally unsatisfactory. He related one incident in November 1971 at a time when the outside weather was cold and wintry and said the inside of the home was so cold that he and Mrs. Willis, though warmly dressed, were shivering because the home was in such a state of disrepair that it was virtually open to inclement weather conditions. Webb also opined that the children at home did not have proper discipline but admitted that none were in any type of difficulties outside the home. It was his further opinion that both parents lacked the ability to accept their parental responsibilities. Webb also corroborated previous testimony to the effect that he had once seen John Willis in an intoxicated state in the presence of some of his children. He also offered his opinion that, because of Ronald Lee's age when he left the home and considering the long separation, he felt a return to his natural parents would have a detrimental effect upon his future welfare.

On the other hand, his testimony was also to the effect that the parents were happy to have the children back in their custody and had made repeated attempts to secure Ronald Lee's return. Mr. Willis, according to Webb, had made twenty to twenty-five contacts with him during the 1970--1972 period for the purposes of expressing his concern for the return of Ronald Lee and finding new housing, an apparent precondition the department placed on Ronald Lee's return. Further, the Willis family had never refused any of the services offered to them by Webb and the welfare department, and Webb did not consider the children in the home to be physically abused.

Two school attendance officers testified for the State that they had had serious truancy problems with some of the Willis children in earlier years, but that in 1971 the school attendance by these children had been better than usual and that the most any of the children had missed in that year was seventeen days. Additionally, none of the children in the custody of the appellants had missed any school during the 1972 school year.

T. E. Myles, an attorney from Fayetteville who represented the foster parents, stated he offered Mr. Willis two or three hundred dollars to compensate or reimburse him for Ronald Lee's birth expenses and, contemporaneously, had asked both parents to sign a relinquishment and consent to adopt. Mr. Willis refused the offer of money and refused to sign any documents, telling Myles he believed there was hope of securing the return of his child.

The appellants offered testimony from four witnesses. Mary McNab, a former caseworker with the department of welfare in Washington, D.C., visited the Willis home on two occasions immediately prior to the September 1972 hearings. In addition, she conducted interviews with some fifteen neighbors and school officials who had contact with the Willis family. She offered testimony concerning her personal observations and gave opinion evidence in her capacity as a trained caseworker. On her visits to the home she found it to be in good repair, clean and neat, with linoleum on the livingroom floor and the rooms, though poorly furnished, appeared to be adequate to serve the family's needs. She also stated there was water in the house and the family then had an electric pump for the water, and other plumbing facilities.

She stated she found the children expressed affection for one another and cared a great deal for their parents and she saw no indication of child abuse. Health records at the school corroborated the children's general good physical health. It was her concluding opinion that the family could and would properly care for the infant Ronald Lee if he were returned to his parents.

James Sommerville, a Presbyterian minister, visited the Willis home at the request of the Welfare Rights Organization for the stated purpose of giving testimony in this case and, also, to volunteer to help Mr. Willis with some home repairs. From his personal observation he found the home to be neat and clean and found no repairs to be necessary. Both Mary McNab and James Sommerville acknowledged on cross-examination that their visits to the Willis home were expected by the Willis family, but both said that the Willises did not know when they were going to drop in on them.

Annie Kelly, a sister of John Willis who also lived in Fayette County, testified she had visited the Willises at least once a month over the previous years; the present home was typical of other substandard rural homes in the area, and that Mrs. Willis kept the home clean and cooked good simple meals for the family. She stated, in her opinion, the Willises loved their children, took care of them to the best of their ability and did not abuse them. It was her further opinion the children loved their parents and all the children were in good health. She stated the Willises were on good terms with their neighbors. Further, as to the living conditions in the home they now had a Warm Morning heater in the livingroom and an electric stove in the kitchen.

John Willis testified that he had no notice nor was he served with any type of papers when the children were initially taken from him some four years previous. He testified generally that, though he had attempted to do everything the welfare department requested of him, they had not helped him get better living quarters and had refused to return Ronald Lee to the family despite his repeated requests to have Ronald Lee returned.

As to the condition of the present home, Willis said he had repainted the inside of the house, put in a bathroom, and was in the process of adding an additional room. Mr. Willis offered no testimony to rebut charges concerning his drinking habits.

The principal and underlying issue in this case is whether the State offered sufficient proof of unfitness of the natural parents of Ronald Lee Willis to warrant a permanent change of custody for the child, and whether such child is neglected within the meaning of the statutes and case law?

Before arriving at consideration of the foregoing issue, we must assess the validity and legal effect of the initial taking of the infant child from its natural parents and of all proceedings had prior to the final hearing which began in September of 1972.

A principal contention of the State, in support of the correctness of the final order, is that the welfare of the child commanded the Juvenile Court of Fayette County to have given utmost consideration to the fact that the child had resided with his foster parents for most of his life. The appellants, on the other hand, say that the initial taking of the child, resulting in his prolonged absence from his natural parents, was illegally and unconstitutionally accomplished. This Court cannot ignore this assertion in the disposition of this case.

In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person. State ex rel. Acton v. Flowers, comm'r, 154 W.Va. 209, 174 S.E.2d 742 (1970); State ex rel, Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W.Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d 798 (1969). The Supreme Court of the United States has recognized the right to raise one's children is a fundamental personal liberty guaranteed by the Due Process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645, 92 S.Ct. 1208, 31 L.Ed.2d 551 (1972). In that decision, Mr. Justice White cited, with approval, the language of Mr. Justice Frankfurter in an earlier concurrence:

> 'It is plain that the interest of a parent in the companionship, care, custody, and m anagement of his or her children 'comes(s) to this Court with a momentum for respect lacking when appeal is made to liberties which derive merely from shifting economic arrangem ents.' Kovacs v. Cooper, 336 U.S. 77, 95, 69 S.Ct. 448, 458, 93 L.Ed. 513, 527, 10 A.L.R.2d 608 (1949).'

We hasten to affirm that Article III, Section 10 of the West Virginia Constitution in equal measure protects this fundamental right of parenthood. See In re: Simmons Children, 154 W.Va. 491, 177 S.E.2d 19 (1970).

The preeminent right of the parent to the custody of his child has been recognized in the statutes of this State since its formation. Code 1931, 44--10--7, as amended, provides Inter alia:

> '. . . But the father or mother of any m inor child or children shall be entitled to the custody of the > person of such child or children, and to the care of his or their education. . . .'

Nevertheless, this Court, early in the history of this State, recognized that the right of the natural parent to the custody of his child is not absolute; it is limited and qualified by the fitness of the parent to honor the trust of the guardianship and custody of the child. See State ex rel. Neider v. Reuff, 29 W.Va. 751, 761, 2 S.E. 801 (1887). Standing at the side of the natural parents with benign, but continuing, interest is the State. The doctrine of Parens patriae, subsisting since feudal times and well documented in the common law of England, Virginia, and this State, accords the State rights just below that of the natural parent in the health and welfare of minor children. For the protection of the child, the State has always moved expeditiously and decisively when a natural parent has been proved to be unfit to continue the trust of raising his child, when a child has been abandoned by his natural parent or when the parent, by agreement or otherwise, has permanently transferred, relinquished or surrendered the custody of such natural child. See State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, W.Va.,187 S.E.2d 601 (1972); State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W.Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d 798 (1970); Whiteman v. Robinson, 145 W.Va. 685, 116 S.E.2d 691 (1960); Hoy v. Dooley, 144 W.Va. 64, 105 S.E.2d 877 (1958).

Our statutes providing for the welfare of children establish a mechanism whereby the courts may adjudicate questions arising when the State or a citizen thereof believes there is necessity to change the custodial relationship of natural parent and child because of some dereliction on the part of the parent or the child. Chapter 49 of the Code of 1931, as amended, is the legislative declaration of the State's interest, responsibilities and rights as respects any minor child under the age of eighteen years, who for some reason specified by the statute is in need of services, protection or care. See Code 1931, 49--1--2, as amended. The statute also recognizes that children may be neglected, and defines a neglected child in Section 3 thereof.

The procedure to be followed when an arm of the State or one of its citizens believes neglect of a minor child to have occurred, is to be found in Article 6 of Chapter 49. Section 1 provides:

> 'If the State department, (of welfare) or a reputable person, believes that a child is neglected, the department or the person may present a petition setting forth the facts to the juvenile court in the county in which the child resides, or to the judge of such court in vacation. The petition shall be verified by the oath of some credible person having knowledge of the facts. Upon the filing of the petition, the court or judge shall set a tim e and place for a hearing.'

Recognizing the rights of a natural parent to the care, custody, and companionship of his natural child rise to a constitutional level and judicial proceedings affecting such rights must be conducted with regularlity and fairness, this Court in a case concerning the alleged neglect of children, recently held:

> 'Although the hearings in a juvenile court are not usually held to the same strict rules of procedure as ordinary cases, the basic requirement of the law as to due process m ust be followed for a proper hearing to be held.' Syllabus, Point 1, In re: Simmons Children, Supra.

One of the basic constitutional guarantees of due process is, of course, that no one shall be deprived of a substantial right by an arm of the State without notice and the opportunity to be heard in a meaningful manner. See State ex rel. Payne v. Walden, W.Va., 190 S.E.2d 770 (1972). Code 1931, 49--6--2, as amended, recognizes and accords the right of notice and the opportunity to be heard to the parents of a child whose custody is sought to be taken by the state department of welfare or another person because of neglect. The case of In re: Gault, 387 U.S. 1, 87 S.Ct. 1428, 18 L.Ed.2d 527 (1966), established the principle that fundamental due process requires the notice of an adjudicatory hearing to the parties affected in a juvenile proceeding. Well before Gault was decided, however, this Court held in the case of In re: Sutton, 132 W.Va. 875, 53 S.E.2d 839 (1949), a parent could not be divested of his parental rights without notice and opportunity for a hearing when such parent was subject to the jurisdiction of the court and available for service of process; and any such hearing held divesting the parent of his rights to his child resulting in a decree, was void and of no effect. This is the undoubted law in this jurisdiction and elsewhere, mandated by our own as well as the Federal Constitution, and it operates to prevent the permanent termination of parental rights without according the full range of due process guarantees to the affected persons.

Nevertheless, there are situations of an emergency nature which can and do arise demanding the State as Parens patriae and acting In loco parentis, to move immediately without regard to the rights and sensibilities of the parents in order to protect the health, welfare and sometimes the very life of a child who needs care and protection. Again, our statute so provides. Code 1931, 49--6--3, as amended, reads:

> 'Until a hearing can be held upon the petition, the court or judge may order that the child be delivered into the custody of a county department, or into such other custody as the court or judge may deem proper.'

Until now, this section of the statute has never been construed. It would appear the welfare department availed itself of the provisions of this section to accomplish the taking of the Willis children in December of 1968. Recently, this Court was faced with an analogous situation, coincidentally involving the department of welfare, which involved the claimed entitlement or privilege of one to do business with the State. In the case of State ex rel. Bowen v. Flowers, Comm'r, W.Va., 184 S.E.2d 611 (1971), based upon an investigation, the welfare department suspended a pharmacist from participation in medical programs administered by the department, and did not permit him to continue selling drugs to the State while under civil and criminal investigation. The commissioner suspended the pharmacist without first granting him opportunity to be heard. The Court recognized the legitimate State interest in purchasing and supplying pharmaceuticals to persons eligible for the medical assistance programs administered by the department of welfare and held this principle to be of overriding and compelling State interest. As such it warranted the temporary abrogation of an individual's right to due process:

> 'The opportunity to be heard is a fundam ental requirement of the due process clause of the federal and state constitutions. However, where there is an overriding public interest involved the hearing m ay be postponed for a reasonable period of tim e in order to allow an investigation to be conducted.' Syllabus, Point 1, State ex rel. Bowen v. Flowers, Comm'r, Supra.

It then became necessary for the Court also to define a 'reasonable period of time' and it held:

> 'In a case where a temporary suspension prior to a hearing pending an investigation is justified, the length of the suspension in order to conduct the investigation depends on the needs and circumstances of the individual case.' Syllabus, Point 2, State ex rel. Bowen v. Flowers, Comm'r, Id.

Then, appraising the facts in that particular case, the Court held the suspension of the pharmacist's entitlement for a period of four months without opportunity for a hearing, and considering that an investigation had been continuing for a period of seven months, was an unreasonable length of time. Consequently, the commissioner was subject to the award of a rule in mandamus against him, in that his failure to accord the hearing for the period of time involved constituted an arbitrary and capricious action on his part.

Returning to the facts of the case at hand, we assume there was good and sufficient reason for the lodging of a petition by a welfare department official in December of 1968 against John and Rosetta Willis in order to effect an immediate charge of the custody of their minor children. Arguendo, we further assume emergency circumstances warranted an immediate taking, without notice to the parents or opportunity for them to be heard. However, we must pass upon whether the department then had the right to retain the custody of Ronald Lee and to pass his custody on to strangers while withholding from his natural parents the opportunity for a meaningful hearing for a period of more than three years.

In a very similar child custody case involving a dispute between a natural parent and the department of welfare in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, a three-judge federal district court in White v. Minter, 330 F.Supp. 1194 (D.C.Mass.1971), had occasion to pass upon this specific question. That court held the retention of an allegedly abandoned child away from its natural mother without extending the right of hearing to the mother for a six-months' period of time, was an unconstitutional application of a statute (similar in language to Code 1931, 49--6--3 as amended) which otherwise permitted a temporary custody change in an emergency. The court also approved language from the case of United States v. Thirty-Seven Photographs, 402 U.S. 363, 91 S.Ct. 1400, 28 L.Ed.2d 822 (1971) wherein the Supreme Court held a statute setting forth no guidelines for a 'reasonable time' as meaning that time 'reasonably requiring administrative and judicial action within time limits that would meet constitutional demands.' Id, 330 F.Supp. at page 1198. In other words, a reasonable time would be an unspecific time, rather short in duration, necessarily required to effectuate the overriding state interest.

We believe the principles enunciated and implied in the cases of State ex rel. Bowen v. Flowers, Comm'r, Supra, and White v. Minter, Supra, are applicable to the case at hand. Under the principle of Parens patriae we acknowledge the State has an overriding interest in the health and welfare of any allegedly neglected child within its jurisdiction who is in apparent need of immediate care. On the other hand, we will not say the retention of custody of a child and the deprivation of companionship of the child from his natural parents for a period of three years, without notice and without a hearing to the persons affected, is sanctioned, by any stretch of the imagination, by the 'overriding State interest' principle. Any taking and holding of a child from the custody of its natural parents is an unwarranted and unjustified intrusion by the State into the very personal family relationship, if it continues beyond any period necessary to serve the legitimate interest of government to protect the health and welfare of the minor child. The holding of the child in legal limbo away from his family and in disregard of their rights, without adjudication of these rights, offends due process and subverts the associative benefits of the familial relationship which natural law has honored since ancient time and which the Constitution protects today. See Stanley v. Illinois, Supra; In re: Gault, Supra; Kent v. United States, 383 U.S. 541, 86 S.Ct. 1045, 16 L.Ed.2d 84 (1965); In re: Simmons Children, Supra; Accord, Kennedy v. Meara, 127 Ga. 68, 56 S.E. 243 (1906). Both this Court and the Constitution are offended by the timespan of the retention of the infant child Ronald Lee Willis in obvious disregard of his parents' rights, his rights, and his consequent future welfare. We hold, therefore, the initial custody change of Ronald Lee from his natural parents to the department of welfare, though presumptively legal at its inception, to have become, by the mere passage of time coupled with the omissions of the State to accord due process to the natural parents, void ab initio and of no effect.

As respects the abortive legal proceeding held in February of 1972 purporting to terminate the parental rights of the appellants and transferring permanent custody to the department of welfare, and reposing authority in it to consent to the adoption of Ronald Lee Willis, the Juvenile Court of Fayette County upon reconsideration saw fit to set aside its ruling of February 16, 1972, we see no reason to disturb that ruling. There is ample authority in the case of In re: Simmons Children, Supra, to support the legal conclusion of the court in the vacation of its former order. Syllabus, Point 2 of that case held:

> 'The petition to the juvenile court in cases involving neglected children should set forth the facts constituting the neglect and not merely state conclusions in connection therewith.'

This principle, as well as those involving adequate notice to the parties and the exclusion of hearsay evidence, is directly applicable to the proceedings had in February of 1972.

Accordingly, we come to the main issue with a view that valid legal proceedings occurred in this case, if at all, within a time frame between August 25, 1972 and November 22, 1972. On the former date, regular juvenile proceedings were convened by the court. All parties were present with counsel and waived any defects as to notice of the scope of the hearing.

In assessing the allegations of the petition and the evidence taken in the proceeding, this Court is guided by relatively settled principles. First, a petition in a proceeding involving custody of an infant is addressed to the sound discretion of the juvenile court. Green v. Campbell, 35 W.Va. 698, 14 S.E. 212 (1891); Armstrong v. Stone, 9 Gratt. (50 Va.) 102 (1852); Coffee v. Black, 82 Va. 567 (1866). See also, 14 M.J., Parent and Child s 8 (1951). The juvenile court is authorized to exercise a discretion conducive to the best interest of the child. Hammond v. Department of Public Assistance, 142 W.Va. 208, 95 S.E.2d 345 (1956). Second, even in a case where the State, acting by and through the authorization of the legislature in delegation to the department of welfare, properly seeks to interpose and substitute itself to the rights of natural parents to an allegedly neglected child, the basic presumption applies: 'The right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to the right of any other person.' State ex rel. Acton v. Flowers, Comm'r, Supra. Third, the right of the natural parent is not absolute and may be limited or terminated by the State if the parent is proved to be unfit to retain the trust of child care. State ex rel. Neider v. Reuff, Supra. Fourth in order to separate a child from its parents on the ground of their unfitness, there must be clear, cogent and convincing proof. In re: Simmons Children Supra; Whiteman v. Robinson, Supra. Fifth, each case turning on the unfitness of the natural parent must be decided on its own particular facts. Pierce v. Jeffries, 103 W.Va. 410, 137 S.E. 651 (1927). Sixth, once a court exercising proper jurisdiction has made a determination upon sufficient proof that a child has been neglected and his natural parents were so derelict in their duties as to be unfit, the welfare of the infant is the polar star by which the discretion of the court is to be guided in making its award of legal custody. Even then, the legal rights of the parents, being founded in nature and wisdom, will be respected unless they have been transferred or abandoned. Cunningham v. Barnes, 37 W.Va. 746, 17 S.E. 308 (1893); State v. Joplin, 131 W.Va. 302, 47 S.E.2d 221 (1948). The statutory scope of the juvenile court's discretion in making the award of custody, found in Code 1931, 49--6--5, as amended, is consistent with the common law of this State and the principle just exposited. Seventh, on this review, this Court is also guided by the principle that findings of fact of the juvenile court, in the exercise of its equity jurisdiction, will not be disturbed on appeal unless at variance with undisputed evidence or contrary to the plain preponderance of the whole evidence. See, Wade v. Wade, 115 W.Va. 132, 174 S.E. 787 (1934).

Applying the foregoing principles and assessing the evidence adduced by the parties, we are led inexorably to the conclusion that this case must be reversed and the child, Ronald Lee Willis, must be restored to the custody of his natural parents. Viewing the evidence of the State in the best light possible, it is strongly indicative of child neglect and less than proper parental care for a period from 1966 to December of 1968. From that point forward until late 1971, the evidence less strongly, though certainly affirmatively, indicates an unawareness on the part of the parents of their own personal needs as well as the State-recognized needs of the children. The rather dismal home conditions which prevailed during that period certainly cannot be ignored by this Court, nor were they ignored by the juvenile court.

On the other hand, there is strong evidence from the State's own witnesses as well as the witnesses for the appellants, that the natural parents were quite willing to accept all the help the department of welfare was willing to extend to them. That they and their children living at home with them, loved and cared for one another and that the father, though with repeated unsuccessful efforts, never gave up on attempts to resecure the custody of his infant child, Ronald Lee Willis. The evidence adduced on behalf of the appellants is strongly indicative of rehabilitative efforts to enhance the living conditions in the home and to effect repairs and restoration of the physical aspects of the residence in such a manner as to make it a more fit place within which sanitary and comfortable cohabitation could occur.

In summary, the best evidence of the department of welfare is remote and, unfortunately for the State, irrelevant to the conditions existing in the critical period just prior to the autumn of 1972, when the court was called upon to reassess in a valid and meaningful manner, relevant and pertinent evidence on the issues of neglect and unfitness of the parents. In point of time the evidence of the State, otherwise unrefuted, establishing the transgressions of apathetic parenthood, is certainly insufficient when assessed in light of the recent and favorable evidence showing the parents' efforts and successes toward improvement of the family environment and the physical living conditions in the home.

The conduct of the older Willis children living at the home must also be given consideration. It must be recalled that the children returned of their own volition to their parents' home in early 1969 and that the only evidence given in relation to them demonstrated strong ties of affection within the family and revealed they were in no trouble with the law or the community; and that though their earlier school attendance had been irregular and haphazard, that recent attendance records in 1971 and in 1972 showed significant improvement. From the testimony of the school attendance officials it appeared that in the year 1972 none of the children had missed any attendance in school.

As regards the voluntary return to home by the older children, we must also give some probative value to the inconsistent conduct of the welfare department in demonstrating strong concern for the youngest child's welfare while showing no concern in the older children's return to an allegedly unsuitable environment.

We cannot today in candor and fairness commend the family's living conditions or exemplify it as a typical West Virginia rural home; we cannot gloss over the unrefuted evidence of the father's intemperate drinking habits, nor can we even suggest these children will be raised in the best possible family environment from an educational, economic, or cultural standpoint.

Nevertheless, the duty on this Court has been to determine whether neglect and parental unfitness have been established by clear, cogent and convincing proof. Simply put, such proof has not been introduced. The strongest proof offered on behalf of the State was not seasonable as remote in time and, therefore, was not relevant and material. It must, of necessity, fail and the welfare department's case fails with it.

There is one further factual point which calls for a fair comment by this Court. Our decision is rendered all the more difficult because we cannot ignore the fact that Ronald Lee Willis is being restored to the custody of strangers in a strange and, for him, an unnatural environment. From the time he was eight months of age until now when he is five and one-half years old, he has been given the love, care, and companionship of the foster parents who are presumed on the evidence at hand to be fit, proper and fine people. It would be an understatement to say that it will be most difficult for them and for Ronald Lee to adjust to the change of custody. Through a tragic series of events, the State Department of Welfare is responsible for the consequences which must naturally flow from the implementation of this decision. And in that the State's custody of Ronald Lee Willis from December 1968 was never even presumptively valid until November 22, 1972, it naturally follows that the State could not consent legally to the adoption of the infant child in April of 1972.

As this Court has previously recognized in the case of Whiteman v. Robinson, Supra, the law does not recognize any relationship which may produce mutual affection between a child and his temporary custodian and which leads to the annulment of the natural parents' right to the care, custody and control of the child:

> 'It would be a dangerous and perversive doctrine to hold that the mutual affections of the child and its tem porary custodian should annul the parent' s natural right to his offspring.' Id., 145 W.Va. at page 696, 116 S.E.2d at page 697.

The welfare department sought to rely upon the passage of time and the ties of mutual affection which naturally arose between the foster parents and Ronald Lee Willis. Neither this Court nor the Juvenile Court of Fayette County is entitled to take legal cognizance of that custody change, and its effect upon the child. No court is warranted in applying the 'polar star principle' until the natural parents' rights have been lawfully severed and terminated.

For the foregoing reasons we hold the judgment of the Juvenile Court of Fayette County to have been plainly wrong: at variance with undisputed evidence, and contrary to the plain preponderance of the whole evidence. We, therefore, reverse the judgment and remand it to the juvenile court for the entry of orders consistent with this opinion and the principles of Res judicata as set forth in the case of State v. See, 145 W.Va. 322, 115 S.E.2d 144 (1960), and the holding reflected in Syllabus Point 1 thereof.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

SPROUSE, Justice (dissenting):

I respectfully dissent from the decision of my colleagues as expressed in the majority opinion. I agree in the main with that part of the discussion concerning the laws and constitutional principles as they relate to the temporary custody of an infant child in cases of this nature, but I believe that this discussion is irrelevant to the proper resolution of the issue in this case. The sole issue, in my opinion, is whether the trial court properly found after the 1972 hearings that the Willises were unfit parents.

Certainly, neither a court nor the Department of Welfare can, under the guise of temporary custody, permanently remove a child from its natural parents. The 'overriding state interest' principle cannot be thus abused. The discussion of the laws and constitutional principles concerning this is learned and well articulated in the majority opinion. Most certainly such temporary custody can only be for a reasonable time and the length of time 'depends on the needs and circumstances of the individual case.' Obviously, a retention of a child under a temporary custody order for a period of three years is too long and is violative of the due process rights of the parents. I disagree strongly, however, with the conclusion of the majority that the original action by the court awarding temporary custody is thus void ab initio. This conclusion has no bearing on the outcome of the majority decision and is an added increment not called for by the logic or rationale of the above rule. The prolonged illegal temporary custody, resulting in the unconstitutional application of an otherwise constitutional statute, is sufficient in itself to terminate the temporary retention. Code, 1931, 49-- 6--3, as amended, however, clearly gave the court authority to make the original award. Lifting ourselves by the boot-straps by creating the fiction that a once legal proceeding becomes void Ab initio is a dangerous precedent. Such judicial overkill is not necessary for the majority disposition of the case, and may well adversely affect some future relationship between innocent third parties.

I agree with most of the well-reasoned discussion in the majority opinion of the law relating to the right of parents to custody of their children. I disagree sharply, however, with the majority's application of these legal principles to the facts of the case. I agree that: A decision involving custody of an infant is in the sound discretion of the juvenile court and that the juvenile court is authorized to exercise a discretion conducive to the best interest of the child; the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to the rights of any other person (except the child, of course); the right of the natural parent is not absolute and may be limited or terminated by the State if the parent is proved to be unfit; in order to separate a child from its parents on the ground of their unfitness, there must be clear, cogent and convincing proof; each case of alleged unfitness of the natural parent must be decided on its own particular facts; once a determination of unfitness is made, the welfare of the infant is the polar star by which the discretion of the court is to be guided in making its award of legal custody; and finally and importantly, an appellate court reviewing a custody award made by a trial court is governed by the long established and still prevailing rule of law that the finding of fact by a juvenile court in the exercise of its equity jurisdiction will not be disturbed unless at variance with undisputed evidence or contrary to the plain preponderance of the whole evidence.

The majority opinion states: '* * * Viewing the evidence of the State in the best light possible, it is strongly indicative of child neglect and less than proper parental care for a period from 1966 to December of 1968. From that point forward until late 1971, the evidence less strongly, though certainly affirmatively, indicates an unawareness on the part of the parents of their own personal needs as well as the State-recognized needs of the children. The rather dismal home conditions which prevailed during that period certainly cannot be ignored by this Court, nor were they ignored by the juvenile court. * * *' The statement of facts is well presented in the majority opinion, but the above summary of them in applying the law is a considerable understatement.

The majority expresses the view that after 1971 and until the hearing in the Fall of 1972, the home conditions and the efforts of Mr. and Mrs. Willis to become better parents improved.

Importantly, the opinion goes on to say: 'In summary, the best evidence of the department of welfare is remote and, unfortunately for the State, irrelevant to the conditions existing in the critical period just prior to the autumn of 1972, when the court was called upon to reassess in a valid and meaningful manner, relevant and pertinent evidence on the issues of neglect and unfitness of the parents. * * *'

The principal witness in the case, the social worker, Nellie MacMillion, who observed the family frequently during the important period between 1966 and 1969, testified that during her visits to the home she found that there was continually a strong odor in the house; that the family used the area around the house for toilet functions; there was human excreta in the house; and that the cooking utensils were filthy. The rest of her testimony was well summarized in the majority opinion: '* * * As to the physical structure of the house, the only heating unit, a stove, was propped up with bricks and rocks; there were no bathroom facilities; the kitchen facilities were such that it was impossible to prepare complete meals; there were only two bedrooms in the house. There were twelve persons occupying the house in December of 1968. Found in that environment, Ronald Lee, the disputed infant, appeared anemic, underdeveloped and undernourished as well as being physically dirty. Additionally, the witness testified she had observed a number of partially- filled wine bottles in the home and, on one occasion during that time period, she had observed Mr.

Willis in an intoxicated state in the county jail. * * *'

Another social worker, Bruce Webb, testified that he was assigned to the family between 1970 and 1972, and his testimony indicated that these conditions remained substantially the same during that period of time. He testified that on one visit to the home in November, 1971, when the weather was extremely cold, the house was open to the cold weather and that the occupants were suffering from the cold, although they were dressed as warmly as possible. Webb also testified about seeing the father, John Willis, intoxicated in the presence of his children. Appropriate witnesses for the State indicated a serious discipline problem with the Willis children as well as frequent absences from school during the entire period through 1971.

None of the witnesses for the State could be considered to be biased in the ordinary sense. The two most important ones were MacMillion and Webb, social workers who, excepting the parents, knew far more about the family than any witnesses involved. The testimony of the principal witnesses for the defendants, on the other hand, could have been considered suspect. John Willis, the father, neither denied nor offered any rebuttal testimony concerning his alcoholic and slovenly habits. John Willis' sister could well have been motivated by the obvious familial interest. The mother, Mrs. Willis, although having the opportunity to testify, declined to avail herself of that opportunity. Mary McNab was obtained by the parents as a purported expert witness. Her qualification was one year in social work in the neighborhood of Washington, D.C. After the defendants were alerted to her arrival, she visited them on two occasions for a total of two and one-half hours. Based on this, she made the sweeping conclusion that the Willises were fit parents. Likewise sent to the Willis home after notification to them, was witness Sommerville. He testified concerning the same home that MacMillion and Webb had described as being so deplorable. Sommerville made the somewhat startling observation that the home was 'a very typical West Virginia home', and 'a good place for children to be living in.'

I agree with my colleagues that the proceedings of February 16 were invalid, and that the hearings of September 7, and September 29, 1972, were legal in all respects. I am at a loss to understand, however, how the evidence covering the period 1966 to 1972 by MacMillion and Webb loses its probative force when it was introduced during the latter hearings simply because it had been previously introduced in an irregular proceeding. The probative value of this evidence should likewise not be reduced because the infant, Ronald Lee Willis, was too long in the temporary custody of foster parents. The evidence was perfectly valid and, in fact, uncontroverted to prove that in each of the years from 1966 through 1971 the conditions of the willis home were intolerable for adequately rearing children and that the Willises either could not, or did not care to remedy their problems. This evidence was offered only to establish the conditions during that period. The evidence concerning the part of the year 1972 that was involved should, of course, be weighed along with the evidence relating to the previous years. The Court in its opinion did that. We cannot say that a trial court in making a difficult determination of this type is limited to observing the conditions of the home and the conduct of the parents for any one period of time. It would seem to me always to be pertinent to consider the history of home conditions. The greater evidentiary detail by which such conditions are documented, the easier should be the court's decision. To deprive the trial judge of these important tools is perhaps to force the exercise of his discretion by artificial game rules contrived by parties or their counsel.

The trial court in this case gave every indication of fairness to the natural parents. A circuit court, such as is involved here, acts as a criminal court, a domestic relations court, a juvenile court, and a court of general civil jurisdiction. The juvenile dockets are always crowded. It was the Department of Welfare's dereliction in not securing an expeditious hearing on the matter of permanent custody. The trial court recognized this, and invalidated the February 16, 1972 hearing on statutory and constitutional grounds. The court offered to suspend later hearings to permit the defendants opportunity to gather additional rebuttal evidence. The court on September 7 and September 29 heard all of the testimony offered, and on October 6 entered an order continuing the case until it had opportunity to consider the evidence. It found in a carefully drawn opinion of October 27, that the Willises were unfit parents.

It is unfortunate that the case was in litigation for such a long period of time. On the other hand, the court obviously had more opportunity than normal to observe the parties and the witnesses, as well as having the advantage of being a trial judge involved in many similar proceedings in the same locality.

In view of all of this, it seems incongruous to me that we can recognize the trial court's discretion in making this finding, restating the rule that its finding will not be disturbed unless at variance with undisputed evidence or contrary to the plain preponderance of the whole evidence, and not uphold it. In my view, the findings of the trial court are supported by clear, cogent and convincing evidence. I cannot visualize a set of circumstances less conducive to the proper welfare of a child than those reported in this case. It is trite to say perhaps, that this has nothing to do with the fact that the Willises are on welfare or are economically poor. Poverty is not a basis of finding unfavorable family conditions. Families in dire economic circumstances frequently create for themselves the warmest, most sensitive and rewarding intrafamily relationships. Who knows but what that may be the best environment in which a child can be reared. Parents of any status who so neglect their children could be deprived of their custody. Neither poverty nor opulence is an excuse for such gross neglect of children. Each case must be decided on its own facts regardless of the status of the parents.

I agree with the general statements concerning the doctrine of parens patriae and the doctrine relating to the rights of natural parents to custody of their children. I disagree, however, with what I consider to be an erroneous juxtaposition of these doctrines. It is clear that natural parents have rights superior to others in the absence of clear, cogent and convincing proof that the parents are unfit or have voluntarily relinquished their rights to a child. This does not mean, however, that the rights of a natural parent are superior to the rights of the child. No principle of law would suggest that. Once a determination is made that the parent is unfit, there is not involved a question of the rights of the State as opposed to the rights of the parents, but the rights of the child as opposed to the rights of the parents or perhaps more simply, the rights of the child disregarding any residuary feelings of the parents.

Once it was demonstrated by competent evidence that the parents were unfit, there could then be considered evidence of any matter affecting the welfare of the child. It was here that the trial court properly considered the fact that the child had been in the custody of foster parents from the time he was eight months old until he was five and one-half years old. This was not necessary to sustain the finding of unfitness, nor was it made solely in that respect. Once, however, unfitness had been determined, the trial court was faced with the task of ruling on the totality of the case, including the question of custody to the Department of Welfare.

My colleagues, of course, are sensitive to this aspect of the case, and realize as readily as I the tragic possibility of the scars inflicted upon this child because of his being taken from warmth and security to possible or probable insecurity. I cannot believe that justice is served by making this kind of human impact by syllogistic reasoning as to what point of time in a proceeding evidence will be received concerning the fitness of parents or that otherwide legitimate evidence should not be received because the Department of Welfare was negligent in not timely obtaining a hearing on the question of permanent custody. I also believe that the majority opinion would overly extend the great constitutional protection given to parents who have not, through their actions, lost their natural rights to those who are mere biological parents and have abandoned all claim to human dignity. Merely biological breeding without the sanctity of familial relationship of love, human dignity and respect is certainly not deserving of the blessings of constitutional protection. It is vitally important to distinguish in the application of this law between the fit and the unfit parents. Admittedly, it is seldom an easy chore. In drawing the difficult line, a court can only be guided by the question--how will the alleged unfit parent affect the child? The mere animal instinct of some affection to an offspring is not enough. The parents in this case evinced little more than that.

I do not believe that Syllabus 1 of the opinion completely states the law. In addition, the last line of Syllabus 8 confuses an otherwise proper statement of law. I agree with the statement of Syllabus 4, except that part which indicates that the passage of time, coupled with the due process omissions of the State, make an otherwise initially legal act void ab initio.

Finally, I am not clear whether the majority opinion would dispose of the adoption proceedings pending at the time this case was decided by virtue of the last paragraph of the opinion relating to the principles of res judicata. If so, I disagree with that application of the doctrine of res judicata. The parties and issues were identical in both proceedings in State ex rel. West Virginia Department of Public Assistance v. See, 145 W.Va. 322, 115 S.E.2d 144. That holding, therefore, would not govern prospective adoption proceedings in this case. The prospective adoptive parents of Ronald Lee Willis were not parties to this proceeding and the issue of their previous prolonged custody of the child and similar issues were not considered.

3. Under the provisions of W.Va. Code, 49-6-7, a circuit court may conduct a hearing to determine whether the signing by a parent of an agreement relinquishing parental rights was free from duress and fraud.

Starcher, J.:

The guardian ad litem ("guardian") appointed to protect the interests of the children of respondent, Richard L.,[1] has petitioned this Court for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the Circuit Court of Cabell County from a hearing a motion filed by Richard L. that requests the circuit court to set aside a document signed by Richard L. in which he agreed to relinquish his parental rights. Richard L. alleged in his motion that he had earlier agreed to relinquish his parental rights, but had done so under duress and fraud just prior to a final disposition hearing in an abuse and neglect case. The circuit court set a hearing date for the motion; however, before the hearing could be conducted, the guardian filed the present petition for a writ of prohibition.

Following our review of the briefs and arguments in this matter, we deny the writ.

I.
Facts & Background

On March 14, 1996, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") filed an abuse and neglect petition in the Circuit Court of Cabell County. The petition alleged that Richard L. and his wife Roberta L. had physically and sexually abused one of their minor children, [1]We follow our past practice in domestic and juvenile cases that involve sensitive facts, and do not use the last names of the parties. See State v. George W.H., 190 W.Va. 558, 562 n. 1, 439 S.E.2d 423, 427 n. 1 (1993).

Rose L.[2] The petition alleged that Rose L., who was then 8 years old, had tested positive for the sexually transmitted disease chlamydia on March 8, 1996.

The circuit judge entered an Emergency Order on the same day the petition was filed removing all four children from the family home and granting temporary legal and physical custody to the DHHR. By separate order on the same day the court also required Richard L. to submit to a medical evaluation to determine if he had chlamydia. According to the respondent's brief, the test of Richard L. for chlamydia was negative.[3]

The child abuse and neglect proceedings against Richard L. were set for final disposition on November 24, 1997. Counsel for Richard L. attempted to have Rose L. subpoenaed to testify at the final disposition, but for reasons that are not clear the subpoena was quashed. Sometime during the course of the hearing, Richard L. entered into an agreement with the State agreeing to relinquish his parental rights to all of his children in exchange for the right to have supervised visitation with the children if they desired to see him. On November 25, 1997, Richard L. signed a document titled "Relinquishment of Parental Rights." The agreement between the State and Richard L. was memorialized by the circuit court by order entered March 4, 1998.[4]

[2]In addition to Rose L. there were three other children residing with Richard and Roberta L. at the time the abuse and neglect petition was filed. Although the March 14, 1996 petition generally alleged abuse and neglect of all four children, specific factual allegations were made only with respect to Rose.

[3]Without providing this Court with the criminal record, the parties in their briefs assert that Richard L. was subsequently charged with criminal sexual abuse. According to the parties, on January 16, 1997, these charges were dismissed without prejudice.

[4]The March 4, 1998 order, in addition to memorializing the agreement between Richard L. and the State, also memorialized the events of the November 24-25, 1997 hearing, and "TERMINATED

Sometime later, Richard L. learned that Rose L. desired to see him. Consequently, on June 12, 1999 Richard L. filed a motion with the circuit court requesting that the court order DHHR to arrange for a visitation with his daughter, Rose. Upon reviewing Richard L.'s motion, the circuit judge ordered that Rose L. be brought to the court for an in camera hearing to determine if Rose L. did, in fact, desire to visit with her father, and to determine if visitation would be appropriate. During the April 6, 1999 in camera hearing Rose L. disclosed to the judge that it was not her father, Richard L., who had sexually abused her, rather, it had been her grandfather.

Following the in camera hearing on May 14, 1999, Richard L. filed a motion to "Set Aside Relinquishment of Parental Rights And To Again Set This Matter For Final Hearing." In his motion, Richard L. argued that the relinquishment agreement had been obtained by fraud and duress.

After a review of the case[5] the circuit judge, by order entered June 11, 1999, set Richard L.'s motion for hearing on September 8, 1999.[6] In this order the judge recognized that "[t]here is no legal FOREVER" the parental rights of both Richard L. and Roberta L. to all four of their children, Mary, Laura, Richard, Jr., and Rose, subject to conditional visitation.

[5]The record indicates that the transcript of the hearing that was conducted on the day Richard L. signed his relinquishment has been lost.

[6]The circuit court judge, in his June 11, 1999 order, stated that:

> 4. The motion of Richard [L.] to set aside his relinquishment of parental rights should be set for hearing for the following reasons:
>
> a. A close reading of W.Va. Code § 49-6-7, which controls, provides that the agreement of a natural parent in the termination of parental rights shall be valid if made in writing and entered into under circumstances free from duress and free from fraud.
>
> b. This court has more than a suspicion that Richard [L.] may have relinquished his parental rights under duress and fraud[.]

precedent for such a motion in West Virginia" and "[t]here are substantial equitable principles involved." It is this hearing that the guardian seeks to prohibit.

II.
Standard of Review

Traditionally, we have held that a writ of prohibition is an extraordinary remedy and should be granted in only the most extraordinary cases. See, e.g., State ex rel. West Virginia Div. Of Natural Resources v. Cline, 200 W.Va. 101, 105, 488 S.E.2d 376, 380 (1997). We have stated that "'[p]rohibition lies only to restrain inferior courts from proceeding in causes over which they have no jurisdiction, or, in which, having jurisdiction, they are exceeding their legitimate powers and may not be used as a substitute for writ of error, appeal or certiorari.' Syl. Pt. 1, Crawford v. Taylor, 138 W.Va. 207, 75 S.E.2d 370 (1953)." Syllabus Point 2, Cowie v. Roberts, 173 W.Va. 64, 312 S.E.2d 35 (1984). We have further held that:

> [i]n determining whether to entertain and issue the writ of prohibition for cases not involving an absence of jurisdiction but only where it is claimed that the lower tribunal exceeded its legitimate powers, this Court will examine five factors: (1) whether the party seeking the writ has no other adequate means, such as direct appeal, to obtain the desired relief; (2) whether the petitioner will be damaged or prejudiced in a way that is not correctable on appeal; (3) whether the lower tribunal's order is clearly erroneous as a matter of law; (4) whether the lower tribunal's order is an oft repeated error or manifests persistent disregard for either procedural or substantive law; and (5) whether the lower tribunal's order raises new and important problems or issues of law of first impression. These factors are general guidelines that serve as a useful starting point for determining whether a discretionary writ of prohibition should issue. Although all five factors need not be satisfied, it is clear that the third factor, the existence of clear error as a matter of law, should be given substantial weight.

Syllabus Point 4, State ex rel. Hoover v. Berger, 199 W.Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996).

To justify the execution of a writ of prohibition, a petitioner "has the burden of showing that the lower court's jurisdictional usurpation was clear and indisputable and, because there is no adequate relief at law, the extraordinary writ provides the only available and adequate remedy." State ex rel. Allen v. Bedell, 193 W.Va. 32, 37, 454 S.E.2d 77, 82 (1994).

III.
Discussion

The guardian contends that the circuit court is without jurisdiction to conduct a hearing on Richard L.'s motion arguing that, after the relinquishment of parental rights was signed by Richard L., the circuit court retained only the authority to conduct disposition reviews.

We note initially that "[a] circuit court has jurisdiction to entertain an abuse and neglect petition and to conduct proceedings in accordance therewith as provided by W.Va. Code § 49-6-1, et seq." Syllabus Point 3, State ex rel. Paul B. v. Hill, 201 W.Va. 248, 496 S.E.2d 198 (1997). We have also stated that circuit courts have "original jurisdiction of all cases coming within the terms of the [child welfare] act[.]" Locke v. County Court of Raleigh County, 111 W.Va. 156, 158, 160, 161 S.E. 6, 7 (1931). Consequently, we find that the circuit court in this case has jurisdiction to conduct proceedings that are in accordance with W.Va. Code, 49-6-1, et seq. [1998].

The guardian has requested that this Court prohibit the circuit court from examining the evidence of the events leading up to Richard L. signing the relinquishment of his parental rights. The issue, therefore, is whether the circuit court has the authority to conduct a hearing to determine whether or not to set aside a relinquishment of parental rights that was signed by the petitioner. The statutes that govern abuse and neglect proceedings provide that "[a]n agreement of a natural parent in termination of parental rights shall be valid if made by a duly acknowledged writing, and entered into under circumstances free from duress and fraud." W.Va. Code, 49-6-7 [1977] (emphasis added). This provision would be meaningless if a circuit court could not conduct a hearing to look behind the face of the document to determine whether or not a parent signed the agreement to relinquish their parental rights under circumstances free from duress and fraud.

While W.Va. Code, 49-6-7 specifically permits a relinquishment of parental rights, it clearly suggests that such an agreement may be invalid if it is not entered into under circumstances that are free of duress and fraud. Whether there has been fraud or duress is a question of fact that must be determined by the circuit court judge. Accordingly, we hold that under the provisions of W.Va. Code, 49-6-7, a circuit court may conduct a hearing to determine whether the signing by a parent of an agreement relinquishing parental rights was free from duress and fraud.

IV.
Conclusion

Based on the forgoing, we deny the writ of prohibition.

Writ Denied.

Davis, J. concurring:

The majority opinion addressed a straightforward issue. The Court was asked to determine whether trial courts have jurisdiction to hold a hearing where a parent has relinquished parental rights resulting from an abuse and neglect case and is claiming that the relinquishment was procured as a result of fraud and duress. The majority has correctly held in Syllabus point 3 of the opinion that "[u]nder the provisions of W. Va. Code, 49-6-7, a circuit court may conduct a hearing to determine whether the signing by a parent of an agreement relinquishing parental rights was free from duress and fraud." I concur in this holding. However, I am compelled to write separately to stress the point that in any proceeding relating to the relinquishment of parental rights the prevailing principle of law is the best interests of the child.

The Best Interests of the Child

There can be little argument that no parent should part with his or her child when the consent to the relinquishment of parental rights is induced by fraud or duress perpetrated by another. The life-long bond between a parent and his or her child is an emotional attachment that stands as a cornerstone of civilization. The realization and existence of this fact, however, is tempered by a longstanding principle of law that in "custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child." Syl. pt 5, in part, Carter v. Carter, 196 W. Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

Because I am committed to making certain that the "best interests of the child" remains the polar star for child custody decisions in West Virginia, I write separately to caution the lower courts that when conducting a hearing subsequent to any relinquishment proceeding, they must give high regard to the interests of the child(ren) involved. See William D.A., Sr. v. Shawna Renee A., 206 W. Va. 679, 683, 527 S.E.2d 790, 794 (1999) (Davis, J. concurring) ("When addressing issues involving children, especially custody issues, consideration of the best interests of the child must be paramount."); Kessel v. Leavitt, 204 W. Va. 95, 174, 511 S.E.2d 720, 799 (1998) ("Superior to any rights of parents to the custody of their own children, however, is the overriding consideration of the child's best interests. Thus, the natural right of parents to the custody of their children is always tempered with the courts' overriding concern for the well-being of the children involved."); Syl. pt. 7, In re Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995) ("Cases involving children must be decided not just in the context of competing sets of adults' rights, but also with a regard for the rights of the child(ren)."); In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 32, 435 S.E.2d 162, 170 (1993) ("Although the rights of the natural parents to the custody of their child and the interests of the State as parens patriae merit significant consideration by this Court, the best interests of the child are paramount."); Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W. Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) ("[T]he best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children.").[1]

Consistent with this consideration for the best interests of the child and the importance of timely and finally resolving custody issues so that a child may attain the stability and security that is so crucial to a young life, it should be pointed out that, obviously, a relinquishment agreement that is made in writing and entered into under circumstances free from duress and fraud is valid. A parent attempting to show otherwise is faced with a challenging task. Indeed, the threshold for establishing duress and fraud in the context of the relinquishment of parental rights is extremely high. As to duress, this Court has held that, in the context of an adoption, duress "means a condition that exists when a natural parent is induced by the unlawful or unconscionable act of another to consent to the adoption of his or her child. Mere 'duress of circumstance' does not constitute duress[.]" Syl. pt 2, in part, Wooten v. Wallace, 177 W. Va. 159, 351 S.E.2d 72 (1986). See also Baby Boy R. v. Velas, 182 W. Va. 182, 185, 386 S.E.2d 839, 842 (1989) ("[Duress] means a condition that exists when a natural parent is induced by the unlawful or unconscionable act of another to consent to the adoption of his or her child."). With respect to fraud, we have held:

[1]See also W. Va. Code § 48-4-9(a)(4) (1999)("[T]he court shall decree the adoption if . . . it is in the best interests of the child to order such adoption.").

> The essential elements in an action for fraud are: (1) that the act claimed to be fraudulent was the act of the defendant or induced by him; (2) that it was material and false; that plaintiff relied on it and was justified under the circumstances in relying upon it; and (3) that he was damaged because he relied on it.

Syl. pt. 1, Lengyel v. Lint, 167 W. Va. 272, 280 S.E.2d 66 (1981). Accord Syl. pt. 3, Cordial v. Ernst & Young, 199 W. Va. 119, 483 S.E.2d 248 (1996); Syl. pt. 2, Bowling v. Ansted Chrysler-Plymouth-Dodge, 188 W. Va. 468, 425 S.E.2d 144 (1992); Syl. pt. 2, Muzelak v. King Chevrolet, Inc., 179 W. Va. 340, 368 S.E.2d 710 (1988).

Finally, I wish to emphasize that a parent challenging a relinquishment of his or her parental rights on the grounds of duress and fraud has the difficult responsibility of establishing the elements outlined above by clear and convincing evidence. See, e.g., 48-4-5(a)(2) (1997) (Repl. Vol. 1999) (allowing revocation of adoption due to fraud or duress only where "[t]he person who executed the consent or relinquishment proves by clear and convincing evidence . . . that the consent or relinquishment was obtained by fraud or duress" (emphasis added)); Bowling v. Ansted Chrysler-Plymouth-Dodge, Inc., 188 W. Va. 468, 472, 425 S.E.2d 144, 148 (1992) ("[The] elements [of fraud] must be proved by clear and convincing evidence." (emphasis added)); Syl. pt. 2, Cardinal State Bank, Nat'l Ass'n v. Crook, 184 W. Va. 152, 399 S.E.2d 863 (1990) (per curiam) ("'Allegations of fraud, when denied by proper pleading, must be established by clear and convincing proof.' Syllabus Point 5, Calhoun County Bank v. Ellison, 133 W. Va. 9, 54 S.E.2d 182 (1949)." (emphasis added)); Syl. pt. 2, Warner v. Warner, 183 W. Va. 90, 394 S.E.2d 74 (1990) ("Since property settlement agreements, when properly executed, are legal and binding, this Court will not set aside such agreements on allegations of duress and undue influence absent clear and convincing proof of such claims." (emphasis added)); Syl. pt. 3, Allegheny Dev. Corp., Inc. v. Barati, 166 W. Va. 218, 273 S.E.2d 384 (1980) (per curiam) ("'The onus probandi is on him who alleges fraud, and, if the fraud is not strictly and clearly proved as it is alleged, relief cannot be granted.' Pt. 1, Syl., Board of Trustees v. Blair, 45 W. Va. 812, 32 S.E. 203 (1899)." (second and third emphases added)); Syl. pt. 3, Carroll v. Fetty, 121 W. Va. 215, 2 S.E.2d 521 (1939) ("In an action for wrongful death, a written release, signed by the beneficiaries entitled to recovery, may be set aside where it was obtained by duress exercised by a third party with the participation or knowledge of the releasee. However, such duress must be proved by clear and convincing evidence and generally presents a question of fact for the jury." (emphasis added)).

Based upon the foregoing authority, it is clear that a parent has a heavy burden to establish duress or fraud once he or she has relinquished parental rights. Importantly, the inquiry does not end even if a parent satisfies that burden. Ultimately, lower courts must always return to the polar star principle: the best interests of the child. Consequently, even when a parent has successfully proven that fraud or duress played a role in the relinquishment of parental rights, trial courts must still consider the best interests of the child before finally resolving custody issues. This critical point must be clearly understood. As we have consistently stated: "the natural right of parents to the custody of their children is always tempered with the courts' overriding concern for the well-being of the children involved." Kessel, 204 W. Va. 95, 174, 511 S.E.2d 720, 799.

For the reasons so stated, I concur in the majority opinion.

No. 16644

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "A parent has the natural right to the custody of his or her infant child and, unless the parent is an unfit person because of misconduct, neglect, immorality abandonment, or other dereliction of duty, or has waived such right, or by agreement or otherwise has permanently transferred, relinquished or surrendered such custody, the right of the parent to the custody of his or her infant child will be recognized and enforced by the courts." Syl., State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W.Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d 798 (1969).

2. "While courts always look to the best interests of the child in controversies concerning his or her custody, such custody should not be denied to a parent merely because some other person might possibly furnish the child a better home or better care." Syl. Pt. 3, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W.Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975).

3. If an expert's report is not introduced into evidence, there is no right to cross-examine the report's preparer in open court.

4. Under W.Va.R.Evid. 702, a trial judge has broad discretion to decide whether expert testimony should be admitted, and where the evidence is unnecessary, cumulative, confusing or misleading the trial judge may properly refuse to admit it.

5. Even though a trial judge may exclude a court-appointed expert's testimony or opinion from the record, he may not abrogate each party's right to inspect the expert's findings. The parties to an action where the court has appointed an expert retain all their discovery rights in the expert's report.

William C. Garrett, Garrett, Garrett & Nostrand, Webster Springs, for appellant.

William W. Talbott, Talbott & Alsop, Webster Springs, for appellee.

NEELY, Justice:
This is an appeal from the Circuit Court of Webster County's 5 August 1983 order returning Elizabeth May Rozas to the custody of her mother Cheryl Rozas. Today, we address two issues: (1) whether the circuit court's custody order is supported by the weight of the evidence; and, (2) whether the circuit court erred by refusing to make the report of a 7 July 1983 psychological examination of Cheryl Rozas available for the litigants' inspection. Because the trial court erred in both of these respects, we reverse.

I

On 16 November 1982 twelve-month-old Elizabeth May Rozas underwent a mastoidectomy at the West Virginia University Hospital. Following the operation, Elizabeth had a one-inch incision behind her left ear to allow for proper drainage. To protect her ears from infection, they were dressed and bandaged. During the days following the surgery, the dressing around Elizabeth's ears repeatedly fell off and the incision bled recurrently. Furthermore, the incision widened from one to two inches and "[t]wo vertical scratches, one in front and one behind" her left ear appeared on 2 December 1982. These events had no explanation, but a review of the hospital's nursing notes and staff progress notes revealed that at each bleeding incident Mrs. Rozas was alone with, or in the vicinity of, the child.

Concerned for his child's safety, on 9 December 1982 George Stephen Rozas, Cheryl L. Rozas' ex-husband, petitioned the circuit court to remove custody of the child from Cheryl Rozas. On 10 December 1982, Mr. Rozas obtained a temporary custody order that barred Cheryl Rozas from visiting Elizabeth. Subsequently, the wound healed quickly and there were no more bleeding episodes.

Pending the hearing on Mr. Rozas' petition, the circuit court transferred temporary custody of the child to the Department of Welfare. After an evidentiary hearing, on 5 August 1983 the circuit court held that George Rozas had, by a preponderance of the evidence, established that Cheryl Rozas physically abused Elizabeth while the child was a patient in the West Virginia University Hospital from 15 November 1982 through 12 December 1982. However, the court made no finding as to Cheryl Rozas' fitness as a mother. Furthermore, the circuit court concluded that it would be in the best interests of Elizabeth May Rozas for the court to return her to the custody of Cheryl Rozas provided that they both lived in the home of Cheryl Rozas' parents, Jessie and Fannie Woods.

From the events that took place at the hospital, the trial court concluded that Mrs. Rozas physically abused her child in a manner that posed a significant risk to the child's health and welfare. Our reversal of this case is required because we find it difficult not to conclude that the court was in error when it failed to find Mrs. Rozas an unfit parent. The physical abuse that Mrs. Rozas visited upon her child is a prima facie, although not conclusive, case of parental misconduct. Such misconduct would serve as grounds for a transfer of custody. Syl., State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W.Va. 404, 168 S.E.2d 798 (1969). Accordingly, the first question that the trial court must answer on remand is whether Cheryl Rozas is a fit parent. The circuit court may have believed that although there were isolated instances of child abuse arising from the stressful circumstances under which Mrs. Rozas was living as a result of the deterioration of her marriage, she is now a fit parent because her abusive behavior is unlikely to recur. Our problem in this case, however, is that the circuit court's findings of fact and conclusions of law come to us as final pronouncements rather than as explanations. And the circuit court has not forwarded a transcript of the proceedings below. On the basis of the record we have received, we cannot make a determination of Mrs. Rozas' fitness.

The trial court held that there was no evidence that Mr. Rozas is an unfit parent. Absent a showing that a natural parent is unfit, a natural parent's right to custody outstrips that of a grandparent. Hatfield v. Hatfield, 171 W.Va. 463, 300 S.E.2d 104 (1983); Leach v. Bright, 165 W.Va. 636, 270 S.E.2d 793 (1980). If Mrs. Rozas is unfit, the hybrid arrangement the trial court devised where Mrs. Rozas has custody so long as both she and the child reside with Mrs. Rozas' parents cannot stand. The courts cannot use the best interest of the child doctrine to strip a fit natural parent of his child. Syl. Pt. 3, Hammack v. Wise, 158 W.Va. 343, 211 S.E.2d 118 (1975); Leach v. Bright, 165 W.Va. 636, 270 S.E.2d 793 (1980) (award of nominal custody to fit parent improper if it has the practical effect of placing care and control in the grandparents while denying it to the other fit parent).

Because there is nothing in the record to suggest that Mr. Rozas' fitness as a parent was extensively examined below, on remand the trial court must make an evaluation of his fitness. If at the end of the proceedings, the evidence shows that one parent is fit, and the other parent unfit, the trial court must award the child to the fit parent. However, if the trial court finds that both parents are fit, the trial court may apply the "primary caretaker parent" rule, Garska v. McCoy, 167 W.Va. 59, 278 S.E.2d 357 (1981), or if there is no primary caretaker, examine the best interests of the child. In such an examination, the trial court may consider the affect that the child's respective sets of grandparents will have on the child's welfare should custody be awarded to one parent or the other.

II

The trial court made an additional finding of fact that Webster County Mental Health's 7 July 1983 examination of Cheryl Rozas should not be made part of the record. George Rozas contends that the trial court erred by refusing to admit the report into evidence, by refusing to allow him to cross-examine the report's preparer, and by refusing to make the report available for his inspection.

A

The court ordered the examination of Mrs. Rozas pursuant to W.Va. Code, 49-6-4(a) [1984], which states in pertinent part:

> At any tim e during proceedings under this article the court m ay, upon its own m otion or upon motion of the child or other parties, order the child or other parties to be examined by a physician, psychologist or > psychiatrist, and may require testimony from such expert, subject to cross-examination and the rules of evidence: ...

W.Va. Code, 49-6-4(a) [1984] leaves no doubt that despite the less formal evidentiary rules and practices in child custody cases, all psychiatric or psychological evidence shall be heard in open court and comport with all the requirements of due process.

It has long been established that if the trial court wishes to use the report of an independent investigator in making a decision in a child custody case, all parties to the proceeding will be afforded the opportunity to cross-examine of the report's preparer. Rohrbaugh v. Rohrbaugh, 136 W.Va. 708, 715, 68 S.E.2d 361, 366 (1951), overruled on other grounds, J.B. v. A.B., 161 W.Va. 332, 242 S.E.2d 248 (1978). See footnote 1 The present case differs, however, because the trial court ruled that the report not be made part of the record.

If an expert's report is not introduced into evidence, there is no right to cross-examine the report's preparer in open court. In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867, 870 (1981) (State Department of Welfare's decision not to call social workers to testify at hearing on neglect petition, or to offer their reports into evidence, did not violate mother's statutory right to cross-examine witnesses where mother was afforded, and exercised her opportunity to cross-examine each witness presented by the State). This rule does not change when the party who proffers the report is a court appointed, independent agency rather than a litigant.

A trial court may exclude a report prepared pursuant to W.Va. Code 49-6-4(a) [1984] from the record because the court believes that the report is not competent, relevant, or probative. Even though a court appointed independent agency proffers the report, the report must meet the standards of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence. See footnote 2 In the present case, it was within the trial court's discretion to exclude the report. After administering a battery of psychological tests to Mrs. Rozas, Phyllis M. Maher of Webster County Mental Health, the report's preparer, concluded that: "... the psychological tests indicate results of questionable validity." She added: "... I do not feel I can make an accurate assessment of her capabilities as a mother." Phyllis Maher had great doubts about the usefulness of the report.

W.Va.R.Evid. 702 provides for the admission of expert testimony, such as Ms. Maher's, when the expert's "knowledge will assist the trier of fact ... to determine a fact in issue." It does not require the admission of all proffered expert testimony. Under Fed.R.Evid. 702, (which is identical to W.Va.R.Evid. 702), a the trial judge has broad discretion to decide whether expert testimony should be admitted, and where the evidence is unnecessary, cumulative, confusing or misleading the trial judge may properly refuse to admit it. U.S. v. Portsmouth Paving Corp., 694 F.2d 312 (4th Cir.1982) (in a Sherman Act prosecution of a paving company, expert testimony that did little more than correlate higher contracting costs with longer hauling distances was excludable at the trial judge's discretion), citing, Salem v. United States Lines Co., 370 U.S. 31, 35, 82 S.Ct. 1119, 1122, 8 L.Ed.2d 313 (1962). Furthermore, the U.S. Supreme Court has recognized that "the trial judge has broad discretion in the matter of the admission or exclusion of expert evidence, and his action is to be sustained unless manifestly erroneous", Salem v. United States Lines Co., 370 U.S. at 35, 82 S.Ct. at 1122, cited in, 3 Weinstein's Evidence ¶ 702[02] (1985). We follow our federal brethren and conclude that the circuit court judge did not abuse his discretion.

By its own admission, the report on Mrs. Rozas was of questionable validity. It was well within the trial court's discretion to decide that an extended cross examination of the report in open court would be unnecessary. Given the report's low probative value, and the substantial danger that it would serve only to confuse the issues, the report was properly excluded. W.Va.R.Evid. 403; See footnote 3 United States v. Wright, 489 F.2d 1181, 1186 (D.C.Cir.1973). In the present case, the probative value of the report is so low, we can find no reason to disturb the trial court's ruling.

But even though a trial judge may exclude a court appointed expert's testimony or opinion from the record, he may not abrogate each party's right to inspect the court appointed expert's findings. West Va.R. of Evid. 706 states:

> (a) Appointment--The court may on its own m otion or on the m otion of any party enter an order to show cause why expert witnesses should not be appointed and may request the parties to submit nominations. The court m ay appoint any expert witnesses agreed upon by the parties and may appoint expert witnesses of its own selection. An expert witness shall not be appointed by the court unless he consents to act. A witness so appointed shall be informed of his duties by the court in writing, a copy of which shall be filed with the clerk, or at a conference in which the parties shall have opportunity to participate. A witness so appointed shall advise the parties of his findings, if any; his deposition may be taken by any party; and he may be called to testify by the court or any party. He shall be subject to cross-examination by each party, including a party calling him as a witness.

[Emphasis supplied by the Court].

The parties to an action where the court has appointed an expert retain all their discovery rights in the expert's report. See footnote 4 Mr. Rozas had a right to inspect Ms. Maher's findings. Although Mr. Rozas may not be able to introduce Ms. Maher's findings into the record, he retains this limited right of review.

Accordingly, the judgment of the circuit court is reversed and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. On remand the trial court will make Ms. Maher's report available to both parties.

Reversed and remanded.

Footnote: 2 This Court adopted the West Virginia Rules of Evidence on 1 February 1985. Accordingly, the rules were not in effect at the time of the proceedings below. But because the rules will govern this case on remand, we have stated our holding in this case in the phraseology of the rules rather than the common law. We note, however, that the rules we interpret in this opinion are generally consistent with the common law, and to the extent that the common law differs, it is so modified.

Footnote: 3 Fed.R.Evid. 403 advisory committee note which states:
The case law recognizes that certain circumstances call for the exclusion of evidence which is of unquestioned relevance. These circumstances entail risks which range all the way from inducing decision on a purely emotional basis, at one extreme, to nothing more harmful than merely wasting time, at the other extreme. Situations in this area call for balancing the probative value of the need for the evidence against the harm likely to result from its admission. [Emphasis supplied by the Court].

SENIOR STATUS JUSTICE McHUGH sitting by temporary assignment.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "The primary object in construing a statute is to ascertain and give effect to the intent of the Legislature." Syl. Pt. 1, Smith v. State Workmen's Compensation Commissioner, 159 W.Va. 108, 219 S.E.2d 361 (1975).

2. "Statutes in pari materia must be construed together and the legislative intention, as gathered from the whole of the enactments, must be given effect." Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. Graney v. Sims, 144 W.Va. 72, 105 S.E.2d 886 (1958).

3. In a circumstance where mandatory reporting of abuse or neglect pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6A-2 (2006) (2008 Supp.) and Rule 48 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court is not implicated, a family court judge has discretion pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-9-301 (a) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004) to order an investigation to assess the potential of exposing a child to harm should a custodial decision such as ordering unsupervised visitation be made.

4. The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources falls within the classification in West Virginia Code § 48-9-301 (a) (2001) (2004 Repl. Vol.) of "professional social service organization experienced in counseling children and families" which in the course of a child custody proceeding a family or circuit court may order to conduct an investigation and report to the court.

5. Family court judges ordering an investigation pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-9-301(a) (2001) (2004 Repl. Vol.) should make every effort to determine the best available options for obtaining the information needed in a timely manner in each case and should only resort to ordering DHHR to perform an investigation and report to the family court when extraordinary circumstances exist.

6. "In visitation as well as custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child." Syl. Pt. 5, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

7. "Because of the extraordinary nature of supervised visitation, such visitation should be ordered when necessary to protect the best interests of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, in part, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

8. "Where supervised visitation is ordered pursuant to . . . [statutory law], the best interest of a child include determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience. The person(s) appointed to supervise the visitation should have had some prior contact with the child so that the child is sufficiently familiar with and trusting of that person in order for the child to have secure feelings and so that the visitation is not harmful to his or her emotional well being. Such a determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family [court judge] . . . or circuit court." Syl. Pt. 3, in part, Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W.Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992).

9. A family court finding potential safety risks to minor children that warrant a court-ordered investigation pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-9-301 (2001) (2004 Repl. Vol.) may not order visitation between a child and the party posing the potential risks while the investigation proceeds. Supervised visitation may be ordered following the investigation if the court finds the investigation or other information supplies the requisite credible evidentiary basis to believe a child's safety will be jeopardized if visitation is not supervised. Where supervised visitation is contemplated, the family court should schedule a hearing, with notice to all parties and any proposed supervisors, regarding the most suitable source for supervision under the circumstances. The purpose of the hearing is to determine the most appropriate source for supervision by considering (1) whether the child is comfortable and familiar with a potential supervisor through prior contact or otherwise, and (2) whether the potential supervisor is willing and has ability to fulfill the obligation. In order to provide an adequate basis for review, this determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family court judge in the order granting supervised visitation.

McHugh, Senior Status Justice:[1]

This is an appeal by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") of the October 25, 2007, order of the Circuit Court of Clay County in which DHHR was granted a portion of the relief it sought in prohibition. In its petition to the circuit court for issuance of a writ of prohibition, DHHR maintained that a family court judge exceeded his authority by ordering DHHR to perform two particular tasks. First, DHHR claimed that the family court judge exceeded his authority by ordering DHHR to have a child protective services (hereinafter "CPS") worker conduct an investigation in a case where no current allegations of abuse and neglect were made. The purpose of the ordered investigation was to assess the risk of potential harm removal of the condition of supervision of visitation would pose to two minor children. Second, DHHR asserted the family court had no authority to order DHHR to provide supervised visitation services during the course of the investigation. The lower court upheld the family court judge's authority to order the investigation, but found that it was improper for supervised visitation to be ordered during the pendency of the investigation. After careful study of the points asserted and the relevant law governing the circumstances, we affirm the circuit court's decision.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

The issues raised in this appeal stem from a child custody case in the Family Court of Clay County in which the father filed a contempt petition against the mother for failing to comply with court-ordered visitation. Following a hearing, the family court judge issued an order on August 17, 2007, which bears the heading of "Second Temporary Order."

The order reflects that the family court judge found no current allegations of abuse or neglect in the case which would justify reporting the matter to the circuit court and CPS pursuant to Rule 48 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court (hereinafter "Family Court Rules") as a case of suspected abuse or neglect. Instead, the order of the family court provided:

> The court specifically finds . . . that the history of this case demonstrates the potential for a risk of harm to the children in the event the court were to lift the requirement of supervised visitation without first considering whether such an action would be appropriate. The potential effects of the court lifting that requirement are grave enough that the court is not prepared to gamble with the safety of these children. The court, therefore, ORDERS this matter be referred to CPS in much the same way an overlap referral to circuit court would operate for purposes of investigating the potential for harm to the children that may be present in the event the court were to remove the supervision condition on Petitioner's visitation.

Thereafter the order directed CPS to investigate the family to determine if the father's visitation should continue to be supervised, with a report of findings of the investigation to be supplied to the family court and the parties. The order also stated that the worker completing the investigation appear at the next hearing in the case. Furthermore, the Second Temporary Order contained the requirement that supervised visitation services be furnished by CPS pending the report to the family court on whether it would be appropriate to remove the condition of supervision from further visitation orders.

On September 6, 2007, both an emergency motion to stay the order of the family court and a writ of prohibition were filed in the circuit court by DHHR. DHHR maintained that a writ of prohibition was warranted in this case because the family court lacked authority to order CPS to conduct investigations and supervise visitation in situations where abuse or neglect is not present. A rule to show cause and a stay were issued by the circuit court on September 10, 2007, and a hearing was held in the circuit court on October 1, 2007. In an order dated October 25, 2007,[2] the circuit court denied DHHR's petition for writ of prohibition and lifted the stay with regards to the investigation, but granted relief to [2]The circuit court first found in its order that it was appropriate for DHHR to seek a writ of prohibition even though it was not a party in the underlying case. The circuit court expressly found an extraordinary writ was DHHR's sole recourse under the circumstances because even if the temporary family court order were appealable, DHHR as a non-party would have no standing to pursue an appeal. See W.Va. Code § 53-1-1(1923) (2008 Repl. Vol.) and State ex rel Hoover v. Berger, 199 W.Va. 12, 483 S.E.2d 12 (1996).

DHHR from the requirement that CPS workers supervise the visitation in the domestic suit.[3]

DHHR thereafter petitioned this Court for appeal of the October 25, 2007, circuit court order, for which review was granted by order dated April 3, 2008.

II. Standard of Review

This appeal involves a challenge to both the relief denied and the relief granted by the circuit court through a writ of prohibition. In either instance, our established standard of review is de novo. Syl. Pt. 1, Martin v. West Virginia Div. of Labor Contractor Licensing Bd., 199 W.Va. 613, 486 S.E.2d 782 (1997) ("The standard of appellate review of a circuit court's order granting relief through the extraordinary writ of prohibition is de novo."); Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Callahan v. Santucci, 210 W.Va. 483, 557 S.E.2d 890 (2001) ("The standard of appellate review of a circuit court's refusal to grant relief through an extraordinary writ of prohibition is de novo.").

This appeal also involves matters of statutory construction. Our review of a circuit court's interpretation of a statute is also plenary. Syl. Pt. 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W.Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995) ("Where the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review.").

[3]To avoid redundancy, the reasoning underlying the circuit court's decision on both counts is set forth in Section III, infra, as part of our discussion of the issues raised in this appeal.

III. Discussion

DHHR maintains that the circuit court committed error in two distinct ways: (1) by finding that the family court has authority to order DHHR to investigate situations in which abuse and neglect of minor children is not currently alleged; and (2) in finding that the family court has authority to order DHHR to supervise visitation outside of abuse and neglect cases. We will examine each issue in turn.

A. Investigation

The circuit court found that the Legislature afforded family courts discretion under West Virginia Code § 48-9-301 (a) (2001) (2004 Repl. Vol.) to order investigations regarding custodial issues. This statutory provision reads as follows:

> In its discretion, the court[4] may order a written investigation and report to assist it in determining any issue relevant to proceedings under this article [governing custody of children]. The investigation and report may be made by the guardian ad litem, the staff of the court or other professional social service organization experienced in counseling children and families. The court shall specify the scope of the investigation or evaluation and the authority of the investigator.

[4]As later explained, the Legislature expressly conferred jurisdiction of custodial matters generally to family courts, so the reference to "court" in West Virginia Code § 48-9-301 (a) includes family courts. See W.Va. Code § 51-2A-2(a)(6).

(Emphasis added.) The circuit court also found that DHHR was the type of organization which may be ordered to perform such an investigation under the terms of the statute. The provision in the circuit court order addressing this latter finding states:

> 16. CPS can certainly be characterized as a professional social service organization with experience in counseling children and families, that could be ordered under the statute to investigate a family. Although CPS is not currently involved with the family, CPS has some prior experience with this particular family . . . making it a logical choice to investigate the family. . . .

(Emphasis added.)

DHHR does not dispute that family courts have authority to order investigations regarding custodial matters, but the agency does refute the circuit court's conclusion that DHHR may be ordered by a family court to complete them. DHHR suggests that the Legislature only intended the agency to be involved in investigations in cases where abuse and neglect are suspected, leaving the reporting procedure set forth in Family Court Rule 48, referred to in the briefs as the "Overlap Process," as the sole avenue available to family court judges to cause an investigation by DHHR to occur in cases where a "threat of harm"[5] to children is a concern.[6]

---

[5]DHHR's argument incorrectly suggests that any threat of harm would constitute suspected abuse and neglect which would invoke use of the procedure established in Family Court Rule 48. See W.Va. Code § 49-1-3 (2007) (2008 Supp.) (statutory definitions of abuse and neglect).

[6]Family Court Rule 48 reads in relevant part as follows:

> RULE 48. CHILD ABUSE AND NEGLECT.
>
> (a) Reports by family court. — If a family court has reasonable cause to suspect any minor child involved in family court proceedings has been abused or neglected, that family court shall immediately report the suspected abuse or neglect to the state child protective services agency, pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-6A-2, and the circuit court.
>
> (b) Written Referrals. — In addition to any oral communication made by the family court to the state child protective services agency pursuant to subdivision (a), the family court shall forthwith prepare and submit a written referral to the agency office in the county where the family court proceeding is pending and, at the same time, transmit copies of the referral to the appropriate circuit court in that county, as determined by the chief judge, and to the prosecuting attorney. Such written referral shall set forth the specific allegations or information that led to the family court's determination of reasonable cause to suspect that a child or children involved in family court proceedings has been abused or neglected.
>
> (c) Reports of investigations of child abuse and neglect. — The state child protective services agency shall promptly provide the family court, and the circuit court, and the prosecuting attorney copies of any report of any investigation regarding the abuse and neglect of any minor child involved in

Our analysis of whether family courts have authority to order DHHR to perform investigations related to custodial determinations necessarily involves statutory interpretation and relevant rules of statutory construction. We undertake this task mindful that our "primary object[ive] in construing a statute is to ascertain and give effect to the intent of the Legislature." Syl. Pt. 1, Smith v. State Workmen's Comp. Comm'r, 159 W.Va. 108, 219 S.E.2d 361 (1975). Determination of legislative intent may involve in pari materia consideration of statutes that "relate to the same persons or things, or to the same class of persons or things, or . . . have a common purpose." Syl. Pt. 5, in part, Fruehauf Corp. v. Huntington Moving & Storage Co., 159 W.Va. 14, 217 S.E.2d 907 (1975). We have long held, "[s]tatutes in pari materia must be construed together and the legislative intention, as family court proceedings, including those investigations conducted pursuant to subsection (b) above and Rule 3a of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings.

(d) Jurisdiction of proceedings. — The family court shall retain full jurisdiction of proceedings until an abuse or neglect petition is filed. If an abuse or neglect petition is filed and the family court has entered an order regarding the allocation of custodial and decision-making responsibility between the parents, orders of the circuit court shall supercede and take precedence over any order of the family court regarding the allocation of custodial and decision-making responsibility between the parents. If the family court has not entered an order for the allocation of custodial and decision-making responsibility between the parents, the family court shall stay any further proceedings concerning the allocation of custodial and decision-making responsibility between the parents and defer to the orders of the circuit court. . . .

gathered from the whole of the enactments, must be given effect." Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. Graney v. Sims, 144 W.Va. 72, 105 S.E.2d 886 (1958). In the matter now before us, the intent of the Legislature in enacting the provisions of West Virginia Code § 48-9-301 (a) cannot be determined without resort to relevant constitutional and statutory provisions regarding the authority of the family court in custodial matters and the duties of DHHR with regard to child welfare.

According to Article VIII, Section 16 of the West Virginia Constitution, "[f]amily courts shall have original jurisdiction in areas of family law and related matters as may hereafter be established by law." The Legislature defined the jurisdiction of family courts through the enactment of West Virginia Code § 51-2A-2 in 2001. A provision of this jurisdictional statute expressly extends authority of family courts to "[a]ll actions for the establishment of a parenting plan or other allocation of custodial responsibility or decision-making responsibility for a child." W.Va. Code § 51-2A-2(a)(6). The only express exception the Legislature placed on this grant of jurisdiction is when an abuse and neglect petition is filed in the circuit court. Family courts lose jurisdiction of custodial matters once an abuse and neglect petition is filed. W.Va. Code § 51-2A-2(c); see also Fam. Ct. R. 48 (d).

Custodial issues in cases where the parents do not live together are addressed by the Legislature in Chapter 48, Article 9 of the West Virginia Code. W.Va. Code § 48-9-

101(a) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004). In this Article, the Legislature declares that the public policy underlying custodial issues is that "a child's best interest will be served by assuring that minor children have frequent and continuing contact with parents who have shown the ability to act in the best interest of their children." W.Va. Code § 48-9-101(b) (emphasis added). In furthering this public policy, the Legislature identifies specific legislative concerns in West Virginia Code § 48-9-102 (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2004) that courts deciding custodial issues should examine, including a child's "[s]ecurity from exposure to physical or emotional harm." W.Va. Code § 48-9-102(1)(6). Family courts are granted the authority and discretion under West Virginia Code § 48-9-301(a) to "order a written investigation and report to assist. . . in determining any issue relevant to proceedings" involving custody matters. Reading these statutory provisions in pari materia, it is clear that the safety of a child during visitation is a relevant custody issue. Thus we hold, in a circumstance where mandatory reporting of abuse or neglect pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6A-2 (2006) (2008 Supp.) and Rule 48 of the Rules of Practice and Procedure for Family Court is not implicated, a family court judge has discretion pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-9-301(a) to order an investigation to assess the potential of exposing a child to harm should a custodial decision such as ordering unsupervised visitation be made. This naturally leads us to the next question of who may be ordered to conduct these investigations.

West Virginia Code § 48-9-301(a) provides that a court may order that an investigation pursuant to the statute be made by a guardian ad litem, staff of the court or "other professional social service organization experienced in counseling children and families." DHHR asserts two reasons why it believes the agency is not subject to orders of the family court under this statute. First, DHHR claims that if the Legislature intended DHHR to be included within the ambit of the statute it would have specifically named the agency in the listing of potential investigative entities. Second, DHHR maintains that it does not qualify as a social service agency that directly counsels children and families, but rather contracts for delivery of these services. We find neither argument persuasive as we find no authority to substantiate DHHR's bald assertions.

The unqualified reference in West Virginia Code § 48-9-301(a) to "professional social service organization experienced in counseling children and families" does not include or exclude any entity, nor does the language give any indication that only agencies actually providing counseling services may be utilized to conduct the investigation. Such lack of specificity standing alone does not create ambiguity necessitating court interpretation. See Sizemore v. State Farm Gen. Ins. Co., 202 W.Va. 591, 596, 505 S.E.2d 654, 659 (1998) ("A statute is open to construction only where the language used requires interpretation because of ambiguity which renders it susceptible of two or more constructions or of such doubtful or obscure meaning that reasonable minds might be uncertain or disagree as to its meaning." (internal quotations and citation omitted)); Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Elder, 152 W.Va. 571, 165 S.E.2d 108 (1968) ("Where the language of a statute is clear and without ambiguity the plain meaning is to be accepted without resorting to the rules of interpretation.").

We simply find no reason to believe that the Legislature intended to exclude DHHR from the provisions of this statute, especially considering that one of the prescribed legislative goals established for DHHR under the child welfare laws is to "[p]rovide for early identification of the problems of children and their families, and respond appropriately with measures and services to prevent abuse and neglect or delinquency." W.Va. Code § 49-1-1(a)(8) (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2004) (emphasis added). Accordingly, we hold that the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources falls within the classification in West Virginia Code § 48-9-301(a) (2001) (2004 Repl. Vol.) of "professional social service organization experienced in counseling children and families" which in the course of a child custody proceeding a family or circuit court may order to conduct an investigation and report to the court. However, family court judges ordering an investigation pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-9-301(a) (2001) (2004 Repl. Vol.) should make every effort to determine the best available options for obtaining the information needed in a timely manner in each case and should only resort to ordering DHHR to perform an investigation and report to the family court when extraordinary circumstances exist.

A family court judge's discretion to order an investigation should be tempered with reason which reflects consideration of the surrounding circumstances. Not every case warrants an investigation, and ordering DHHR to conduct the investigation should hardly be a routine matter. The circuit court's order in the present case relates an example of an extraordinary circumstance that supports the family court's selection of DHHR to conduct the investigation into the family circumstances. The order indicates that DHHR had completed an earlier investigation and was familiar with the family as well as the safety issues in question. Ordering another person or entity to perform an investigation on this same matter would have only protracted the investigatory period since another investigator would have needed additional time to become familiar with the situation and the parties. Other factors which would support an order for DHHR to perform an investigation in like circumstances include the lack of other resources available in the geographic area to conduct the risk assessment and the financial resources of the family.

B. Supervision of Visitation

The circuit court granted DHHR relief in prohibition from the family court's order directing the agency to supervise visitation while the investigation regarding the safety of the children was being completed. Relying on the provisions of syllabus point three of Mary D. v. Watt, 190 W.Va. 341, 438 S.E.2d 521 (1992), the circuit court arrived at the following conclusion regarding supervised visitation in its October 25, 2007, order:

> 19. The Court does not believe that the Family Court can order supervised visitation without making a finding regarding the necessity for supervised visits, and without giving the parties an opportunity to be heard on proposed supervisors. Furthermore, when ordering supervised visits, and choosing a supervisor, the Family Court must consider and attempt to select a supervisor that is already familiar with the child, so as to minimize any stress to the child. By failing to give the parties an opportunity to be heard on this issue, and not making a finding as to why supervised visits are required, the Court believes the Family Court's order is erroneous as a matter of law. . . .

DHHR does not contest this particular portion of the circuit court's decision. Instead, DHHR claims that the circuit court erred by not specifically finding that the family court lacked any authority under the facts of this case to order supervised visitation solely because the family court did not make the requisite finding that abuse and neglect were present. Relying on this Court's per curiam decision in In re: Jason S. and Jasmine B., 219 W.Va. 485, 637 S.E.2d 583 (2006), DHHR maintains that the family court must first make a finding based on credible evidence regarding the presence of neglect or abuse before it may order supervised visitation. We find DHHR's emphasis on findings of abuse and neglect in this regard misplaced.

Our case law recognizes that "[i]n visitation as well as custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child." Syl. Pt. 5, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996). We have further held that "[b]ecause of the extraordinary nature of supervised visitation, such visitation should be ordered when necessary to protect the best interests of the children." Id., Syl. Pt. 3, in part. Moreover, we have said that in determining the propriety of supervised visitation, "the best interest of a child includes determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience" during the course of visitation. Mary D., Syl. Pt. 3, in part. Although a family court is required to determine that claims of a child's safety being jeopardized are supported by credible or trustworthy evidence before supervised visitation may be ordered, threats to safety are not limited to acts of abuse and neglect. See e.g., Alireza D. v. Kim Elaine W., 198 W.Va. 178, 479 S.E.2d 688 (1996); Mary Ann P. v. William R. P., Jr., 197 W.Va. 1, 475 S.E.2d 1 (1996); Belinda Kay C. v. John David C., 193 W.Va. 196, 455 S.E.2d 565 (1995). Supervision and/or further restrictions to visitation are required to be ordered under the provisions of West Virginia Code § 48-9-209 (2008) (2008 Supp.) when credible information establishes that abuse and neglect as well as other enumerated conditions exist. However, the court is not absolved of its responsibility to examine factors beyond those listed in the statute mandating limitations on visitation when the court has facts before it which raise concerns about exposure of a child to harm during visitation. The best interests of the child remains the overarching consideration of courts in making custody decisions, including visitation matters.

This Court has not had occasion to address the precise issue of whether supervised visitation may be ordered during the pendency of a court-ordered investigation into the risk of harm posed to children should a request for unsupervised visitation be granted. As the circuit court recognized, we addressed the general procedure that courts should follow prior to ordering supervised visitation in syllabus point three of Mary D., in which we stated:

> Where supervised visitation is ordered pursuant to . . . [statutory law],[7] the best interests of a child include determining that the child is safe from the fear of emotional and psychological trauma which he or she may experience. The person(s) appointed to supervise the visitation should have had some prior contact with the child so that the child is sufficiently familiar with and trusting of that person in order for the child to have secure feelings and so that the visitation is not harmful to his or her emotional well being. Such a determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family [court judge] . . . or circuit court.

The circuit court judge applied the general precepts of this holding from Mary D. to the present case in order to determine that supervised visitation was inappropriate during the investigation period. The October 25, 2007, order reflects the circuit court's reasoning as follows:

[7]Chapter 48 of the West Virginia Code was completely reorganized, in some respects amended and reenacted in 2001. 2001 Acts of the W.Va. Legislature c. 91; see W.Va. Code § 48-1-101(b). The statutory reference was omitted from the quoted material since it no longer has significance under the arrangement of the current domestic relations statutes. Under the recodification, visitation matters are primarily contained within Article 9 which bears the heading of "Allocation of Custodial Responsibility and Decision Making Responsibility of Children."

> 22. In the instant case, the Family Court did not make any specific finding that abuse has occurred that would support the extraordinary step of supervised visits, only that there was potential risk in not supervising visits. Also, the Family Court did not consider the wishes of the parties when choosing a supervisor, and it does not appear from the order that the Family Court made any attempt to select a supervisor that was close with the children, and has a relationship with the children. Furthermore, the Family Court did not consult with proposed supervisor (CPS), before ordering CPS to supervise visitation. The Court believes that before the Family Court requires any third party to supervise visitation, that third party should have an opportunity to be heard as to their willingness to supervise, and their relationship with the children.

Thereafter, the circuit court order suggests the following procedure:

> 23. Before Judge Ruckman can order CPS to supervise visitation, the Family Court must conduct a hearing and give all parties, including CPS, notice and an opportunity to be heard on the issue. The Family Court must make findings of fact and conclusions on the record regarding the need for supervision, and give all parties an opportunity to be heard on proposed supervisors. Recognizing that CPS does have an extensive caseload, the Family Court must exhaust other options for supervisors, for example other family members or organizations that provide for family visits, before ordering CPS to supervise the visits.

We find the circuit court's approach to be a sound extension of existing law. Consequently, we hold a family court finding potential safety risks to minor children that warrant a court-ordered investigation pursuant to West Virginia Code § 48-9-301 may not order visitation between a child and the party posing the potential risks while the investigation proceeds. Supervised visitation may be ordered following the investigation if the court finds the investigation or other information supplies the requisite credible evidentiary basis to believe a child's safety will be jeopardized if visitation is not supervised. Where supervised visitation is contemplated, the family court should schedule a hearing, with notice to all parties and any proposed supervisors, regarding the most suitable source for supervision under the circumstances. The purpose of the hearing is to determine the most appropriate source for supervision by considering (1) whether the child is comfortable and familiar with a potential supervisor through prior contact or otherwise, and (2) whether the potential supervisor is willing and has ability to fulfill the obligation. In order to provide an adequate basis for review, this determination should be incorporated as a finding of the family court judge in the order granting supervised visitation.

The circuit court's order also cautions the family court not to unduly burden DHHR with responsibility for supervising visitation given the caseload of the CPS workers and the gravity of the work they are called upon to perform. We echo this concern and emphasize that family courts should exhaust other available and reasonable options such as family members or community organizations before looking to DHHR to provide supervision of visitation.

IV. Conclusion

Concluding our review de novo, this Court is of the opinion that the circuit court correctly reached the proper result for the reasons stated above. The October 25, 2007, order of the Circuit Court of Clay County, therefore, is affirmed.

Affirmed.

JUSTICE KETCHUM delivered the Opinion of the Court.

CHIEF JUSTICE BENJAMIN concurs and reserves the right to file a separate opinion.

Syllabus By the Court

1. The Legislature's 2006 amendment of W.Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6), changing the statute's "guardianship rights and/or responsibilities" language to "guardianship rights and responsibilities" was not intended to relieve parents who have their parental rights terminated in an abuse and neglect proceeding from providing their child(ren) with child support.

2. A circuit court terminating a parent's parental rights pursuant to W.Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6), must ordinarily require that the terminated parent continue paying child support for the child, pursuant to the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W.Va. Code, § 48-13-101, et. seq. [2001]. If the circuit court finds, in a rare instance, that it is not in the child's best interest to order the parent to pay child support pursuant to the Guidelines in a specific case, it may disregard the Guidelines to accommodate the needs of the child if the court makes that finding on the record and explains its reasons for deviating from the Guidelines pursuant to W.Va. Code, § 48-13-702, [2001].

3. "When a child is the subject of an abuse or neglect or other proceeding in a circuit court pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, the circuit court, and not the family court, has jurisdiction to establish a child support obligation for that child." Syllabus Point 3, West Virginia Dept. of Health and Human Resources, Bureau for Child Support Enforcement v. Smith, 218 W.Va. 480, 624 S.E.2d 917 (2005).

Ketchum, J.:

These two appeals have been consolidated because they present the same question - whether a court in an abuse and neglect proceeding may accept a voluntary relinquishment and terminate a parent's parental rights while continuing his/her obligation to pay child support for the child(ren). The two circuit court rulings below came to different conclusions, one finding that a voluntary relinquishment cuts off all parental rights and responsibilities, including the obligation to pay child support; the other finding that child support is a right unto the child which cannot be voluntarily relinquished by a parent.

After carefully reviewing the briefs, the legal authority cited and the record presented for consideration, we hold the Legislature's 2006 amendment of W.Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6), changing the statute's "guardianship rights and/or responsibilities" language to "guardianship rights and responsibilities" was not intended to relieve parents who have their parental rights terminated in an abuse and neglect proceeding from providing their child(ren) with child support. A circuit court terminating a parent's parental rights pursuant to W.Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6), must ordinarily require that the terminated parent continue paying child support for the child, pursuant to the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W.Va. Code, § 48-13-101, et. seq. [2001]. If the circuit court finds, in a rare instance, that it is not in the child's best interest to order the parent to pay child support pursuant to the Guidelines in a specific case, it may disregard the Guidelines to accommodate the needs of the child if the court makes that finding on the record and explains its reasons for deviating from the Guidelines pursuant to W.Va. Code, § 48-13-702, [2001].

I.
Facts & Background

The instant appeals involve two fathers who voluntarily relinquished their parental rights, which relinquishments were accepted by the circuit courts, after abuse and neglect petitions were filed against them.

A.
In re: Ryan B.[1]

Ryan B. was born to Appellant Joanna F. on June 23, 2007. On the day he was born, a drug screen was performed that showed both mother and child tested positive for cocaine. Joanna F. admitted to using cocaine throughout her pregnancy. On August 13, 2007, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") filed a petition against Joanna F., Appellee William Matthew B., who Joanna F. identified as Ryan's biological father, and an unknown father, as paternity had not yet been conclusively established. This petition alleged that Ryan B. was a neglected and abused child and that the parties named were neglectful and abusing parents.

On September 5, 2007, Joanna F. entered into a stipulated adjudication wherein she admitted to her past drug use. Accordingly, the circuit court found her to be a neglectful parent. She subsequently participated in a treatment program, successfully completed the terms and conditions of her family case plan and the petition against her was dismissed.

On September 26, 2007, the court ordered William Matthew B. to undergo DNA testing to determine whether he was Ryan B.'s biological father. On December 14, 2007, the court ruled that the DNA test results proved that William Matthew B. was the biological father and granted him a three month pre-adjudicatory improvement period.

On January 11, 2008, William Matthew B. entered a voluntary relinquishment of his parental rights with the circuit court. Joanna F. objected to the relinquishment and requested that the court order William Matthew B. to pay child support until Ryan B. reaches the age of majority. On January 22, 2008, the circuit court granted William Matthew B.'s request and ordered that his parental rights be severed and terminated. On June 16, 2008, following a hearing and the submission of briefs by each of the parties and the guardian ad litem, the court denied Joanna F.'s motion requesting that William Matthew B. pay child support. Joanna F. now appeals the circuit court's June 16, 2008, order.

B.

In re: Caitlyn M., Carson M., and Steven M.

An abuse and neglect petition was filed against Stanley Ray M. on March 3, 2008, alleging that he sexually abused his daughter, Caitlyn M. Based on these allegations, the petition also included Stanley Ray M.'s other children, Carson M. and Steven M. The mother of these three children, Donna M., was named in the petition but no allegations of abuse were made against her.[2]

On April 2, 2008, Stanley Ray M. executed a "Voluntary Relinquishment of Parental Rights" form with regard to all three children. The circuit court below accepted Stanley Ray M.'s voluntary relinquishment and entered an order on August 5, 2008, terminating his parental rights to Caitlyn M., Carson M., and Steven M. The court also ordered that the child support obligation, previously established by the Family Court of Harrison County, continue to be in effect. It is from this order that Stanley Ray M. now appeals.

II.
Standard of Review

This Court explained in In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000), that: "For appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." We also held in Syllabus Point 1 of In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996):

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set > aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

With this standard in mind, we proceed to consider the parties' arguments.

III.
Analysis

This issue, whether a court in an abuse and neglect proceeding may accept a voluntary relinquishment and terminate a parent's parental rights while continuing his/her obligation to pay child support for the child(ren), was addressed by this Court in In re Stephen Tyler R., 213 W.Va. 725, 584 S.E.2d 581 (2003).[3] In that case, the Court concluded that a circuit court in an abuse and neglect proceeding had the authority to continue a father's obligation to pay child support, even though his parental rights had been terminated. The Court's conclusion was guided mainly by W.Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6) [1998], which read, in relevant part:

> (6) Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child,

[3] In re Stephen Tyler R. dealt with an involuntary termination of a father's parental rights, whereas the two cases presently before us involve two fathers who voluntarily relinquished their parental rights. The issue presently before us is applicable to both voluntary and involuntary relinquishments.

> terminate the parental, custodial or guardianship rights and/or responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed child welfare agency.

The Court focused on the phrase "and/or responsibilities" and found that the "plain language of this statute affords the circuit court the options of either terminating the abusing parent's parental rights, terminating his/her responsibilities, or terminating both the parent's parental rights and responsibilities." In re Stephen Tyler R., 213 W.Va. at 740, 584 S.E.2d at 596. The Court found that paying child support was a parental responsibility, and therefore concluded that a circuit court could simultaneously terminate parental rights and continue to impose child support obligations on parents whose parental rights were terminated. Three years after this case was decided, the Legislature amended W.Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6), and changed the statute's "guardianship rights and/or responsibilities" language to "guardianship rights and responsibilities." W.Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6) [2006], currently reads, in relevant part:

> (6) Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future and, when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental, custodial and guardianship rights and responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed child welfare agency.

Both of the fathers who voluntarily relinquished their parental rights in the present appeals argue that this statutory change overrules this Court's holding in In Re

Stephen Tyler R., and mandates that when a circuit court terminates a parent's parental rights it must also terminate his/her parental responsibilities, including the responsibility to pay child support. Joanna F. (Ryan B.'s mother), the DHHR and the guardian ad litem for Caitlyn M., Carson M., and Steven M., contend that the overall goal of the child welfare statutory scheme is to do what is in the best interest of the child(ren). They also argue that allowing these fathers to avoid their child support obligations would clearly be detrimental to the child(ren) and that the Legislature could not have intended this result. In order to resolve this issue, we must examine W.Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6) [2006], specifically, our child welfare statute generally, and our extensive case law on this issue.

When interpreting statutes promulgated by the Legislature, we first discern the objective of the enactment. "'The primary object in construing a statute is to ascertain and give effect to the intent of the Legislature.' Syllabus Point 1, Smith v. Workmen's Compensation Commissioner, 159 W.Va. 108, 219 S.E.2d 361 (1975)." Syllabus Point 6 State ex rel. ACF Indus., Inc. v. Vieweg, 204 W.Va. 525, 514 S.E.2d 176 (1999). In gleaning legislative intent, we endeavor to construe the scrutinized provision consistently with the purpose of the general body of law of which it forms a part.

> "'Statutes which relate to the same subject matter should be read and applied together so that the Legislature's intention can be gathered from the whole of the enactments.' Syllabus Point 3, Smith v. State Workman's Compensation Comm'r, 159 W.Va. 108, 219 S.E.2d 361 (1975)." Syllabus Point 3, Boley v. Miller, 187 W.Va. 242, 418 S.E.2d 352 (1992).

Syllabus Point 3, Rollyson v. Jordan, 205 W.Va. 368, 518 S.E.2d 372 (1999). See also Syllabus Point 4, in part, State ex rel. Hechler v. Christian Action Network, 201 W.Va. 71, 491 S.E.2d 618 (1997) ("In ascertaining legislative intent, effect must be given to each part of the statute and to the statute as a whole so as to accomplish the general purpose of the legislation." (Internal quotations and citations omitted)); Syllabus Point 2, in part, Mills v. Van Kirk, 192 W.Va. 695, 453 S.E.2d 678 (1994) ("To determine the true intent of the legislature, courts are to examine the statute in its entirety and not select 'any single part, provision, section, sentence, phrase or word.' Syllabus Point 3, in part, Pristavec v. Westfield Ins. Co., 184 W.Va. 331, 400 S.E.2d 575 (1990).").

This effort to maintain consistency among related statutes is particularly important as legislators normally are charged with knowledge of the law in effect at the time of a statute's enactment or amendment. In this regard, "we assume that elected representatives know the law at the time of any amendment to a statute . . ." State v. Hosea, 199 W.Va. 62, 68 n. 15, 483 S.E.2d 62, 68 n. 15 (1996).

Applying these rules of statutory construction to the statute at issue herein, we observe that the express purpose of the child welfare statute, W.Va. Code § 49-1-1, et. seq., is to "[a]ssure each child care, safety and guidance . . .[s]erve the mental and physical welfare of the child . . .(and) [r]ecognize the fundamental rights of children and parents." W.Va. Code § 49-1-1(a)(1)-(4). The plain language of the child welfare statute makes it clear that the Legislature's main goal is to assure the best interest of the child and recognize the child's fundamental rights. The statute at issue herein, W.Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6) [2006], states that a court may terminate parental rights and responsibilities "when necessary for the welfare of the child." This phrase makes it clear that this statute is intended to serve the overall goal of the child welfare statute. Reading W.Va. Code § 49-1-1, et. seq., in para materia with W.Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6), we hold that the Legislature's 2006 amendment of W.Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6), changing the statute's "guardianship rights and/or responsibilities" language to "guardianship rights and responsibilities" was not intended to relieve parents who have their parental rights terminated in an abuse and neglect proceeding from providing their child(ren) with child support.[4]

Had the Legislature intended to eliminate the long standing requirement that a parent, even one who voluntarily relinquishes his/her parental rights, provide financial support to his/her child, we believe it would have done so explicitly and clearly, rather than simply removing the word "or" from W.Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6). See Com. Dept. of Public Welfare ex. rel Hager v. Woolf, 276 Pa.Super. 433, 437, 419 A.2d 535, 537 (1980) ("It is apparent that if the Legislature wished to eliminate the legal obligation of a parent to support a child, in the event of termination . . . it would have done so clearly and explicitly, in view of the long standing recognition in our Commonwealth of a parent's liability for the support of his or her child.").

Further, case law from this Court as well as courts around the country[5] have

[4] This holding is applicable to both voluntary and involuntary terminations. See footnote 3, supra.

[5] See Evink v. Evink, 542 N.W.2d 328, 333 (Mich. Ct. App. 1196) (stating that "[t]his Court has held that, absent adoption, the obligation to support a child remains with the natural parents").

held that an obligation of support is owed to a child by both of his parents until such time as the child is placed in the permanent legal custody of another guardian/parent/obligor, such as in adoption. As this Court has frequently emphasized, the best interest of the child is the polar star by which all matters affecting children must be guided. See Syllabus Point 7, In re Brian D., 194 W.Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995) ("Cases involving children must be decided not just in the context of competing sets of adults' rights, but also with a regard for the rights of the child(ren)."). This Court has previously stated that child support obligations are not only responsibilities parents owe to their children, they are also rights which belong to children. "Child support is a right which belongs to the child." Kimble v. Kimble, 176 W.Va. 45, 49, 341 S.E.2d 420, 424 (1986), quoting Armour v. Allen, 377 So.2d 798, 799-800 (Fla.Dist.Ct.App.1979).[6] Allowing a parent who voluntarily relinquishes his/her parental rights to avoid this right that belongs to the child goes against the overall goal of the child welfare statutory scheme and is in opposition to our well established case law.

One final issue that needs to be addressed, in light of our ruling herein, is whether a circuit court that terminates a parent's parental rights under W.Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6), must impose a child support obligation on a parent whose parental rights have been terminated. A circuit court's duty to impose a child support obligation upon hearing an abuse or neglect petition is found in W.Va. Code, § 49-7-5 [1936]. That statute states, in part:

Shearer*, 204 W.Va. 326, 330, 512 S.E.2d 583, 587 (1998) (per curiam) ("The obligation of child support is grounded in the moral and legal duty of support of one's children from the time of birth.").

> If it appears upon the hearing of a petition under this chapter that a person legally liable for the support of the child is able to contribute to the support of such child, the court or judge shall order the person to pay the state department, institution, organization, or private person to whom the child was committed, a reasonable sum from time to time for the support maintenance, and education of the child.

This statute indicates that a circuit court "shall" require a parent to pay support for a child if the parent "is able to contribute to the support of such child." The determination of whether and how much a parent can contribute[7] to the support of the child is a determination the circuit court must make, using the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W.Va. Code, § 48-13-101, et. seq. [2001]. Specifically, W.Va. Code, § 48-13-701, states that "[t]he guidelines in child support awards apply as a rebuttable presumption to all child support orders established or modified in West Virginia."[8] The Guidelines may,

[8] W.Va. Code, § 48-13-701 [2001] states:

> The guidelines in child support awards apply as a rebuttable presumption to all child support orders established or modified in West Virginia. The guidelines must be applied to all actions in which child support is being determined including temporary orders, interstate (URESA and UIFSA), domestic violence, foster care, divorce, nondissolution, public assistance, nonpublic assistance and support decrees arising despite nonmarriage of the parties. The guidelines must be used by the court as the basis for reviewing adequacy of child support levels in uncontested as well as contested hearings.

however, be disregarded or adjusted to "accommodate the needs of the child or children or the circumstances of the parent or parents" if the court makes specific findings that the use of the Guidelines is inappropriate. W.Va. Code, § 48-13-702, [2001].[9] It is possible that in a rare instance an award of child support in the face of relinquishment, voluntary or involuntary, may be found by the circuit court to stand as an immediate obstacle to the imminent permanent placement[10] of a child. In such a case, the court, upon specific findings thereof, may conclude that an award of child support is not in the child's best interests.

In light of our strong precedent that the best interest of the child is the polar star that guides all matters affecting children, we hold that a circuit court terminating a parent's parental rights pursuant to W.Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6), must ordinarily require that the [9] W.Va. Code, § 48-13-702(a) [2001] states:

> If the court finds that the guidelines are inappropriate in a specific case, the court may either disregard the guidelines or adjust the guidelines-based award to accommodate the needs of the child or children or the circumstances of the parent or parents. In either case, the reason for the deviation and the amount of the calculated guidelines award must be stated on the record (preferably in writing on the worksheet or in the order). Such findings clarify the basis of the order if appealed or modified in the future.

[10] This Court has repeatedly held that children deserve permanency in their lives. State v. Michael M., 202 W.Va. 350, 358, 504 S.E.2d 177, 185 (1998). We observed in State ex. Rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W.Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996), that a child deserves "resolution and permanency" in his or her life and deserves the right to rely on his or her caretakers "to be there to provide the basic nurturance of life." 196 W.Va. at 260, 470 S.E.2d at 214. We have consistently held that abuse and neglect cases must be given the utmost attention to ensure their prompt resolution in order to provide permanency for the children involved therein. See Syllabus Point 1, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

terminated parent continue paying child support for the child, pursuant to the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W.Va. Code, § 48-13-101, et. seq. [2001]. If the circuit court finds, in a rare instance, that it is not in the child's best interest to order the parent to pay child support pursuant to the Guidelines in a specific case, it may disregard the Guidelines to accommodate the needs of the child if the court makes that finding on the record and explains its reasons for deviating from the Guidelines pursuant to W.Va. Code, § 48-13-702, [2001].

Applying this holding to the two appeals presently before us, we turn first to In re Ryan B. The circuit court in Ryan B. refused to impose a child support obligation on William Matthew B. after he voluntarily relinquished his parental rights, finding that the amendment to W.Va. Code, § 49-6-5(a)(6), compelled such a result. We hereby reverse this ruling and remand the case back to the circuit court below for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

With regard to In re: Caitlyn M., Carson M., and Steven M., we affirm the circuit court's August 5, 2008, order in part and reverse and remand in part. We affirm the portion of the order in which the court accepted Stanley Ray M.'s voluntary relinquishment and required him to continue paying child support after relinquishing his parental rights. We reverse the circuit court's rulings in paragraphs 32 and 33 of its order, which state:

> 32. The obligation to pay child support as ordered by the Family County of Harrison County shall not be altered by this Court, and shall continue as ordered.

> 33. Any modifications of the amount of child support to be paid lies in the jurisdiction of the Family Court of Harrison County.

As this Court previously stated in Syllabus Point 3 of West Virginia Dept. of Health and Human Resources, Bureau for Child Support Enforcement v. Smith, 218 W.Va. 480, 624 S.E.2d 917 (2005), "When a child is the subject of an abuse or neglect or other proceeding in a circuit court pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, the circuit court, and not the family court, has jurisdiction to establish a child support obligation for that child." As discussed above, in establishing a child support obligation, the circuit court must use the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W.Va. Code, 48-13-101, et seq. See Syllabus Point 5, WVDHHR v. Smith, supra[11]. On remand, the circuit court is directed to use the Guidelines for Child Support Awards to establish Stanley Ray M.'s child support obligation or make a detailed finding on the record why it is not in the children's best interest to use the Guidelines in this case. Furthermore, any modification of the amount of child support to be paid shall be heard by the circuit court, not the family court.

Benjamin, Chief Justice, concurring:

I write separately to underscore the procedure set forth in Syllabus Point 2 herein, by which a circuit court retains the discretion in specific cases not to order a terminated parent to pay child support if that is what is in the child's best interests (based on factors such as permanency, etc.). Quite obviously, the overriding principle is to act in the child's best interests. While the majority opinion establishes a presumption that a terminated parent continue to pay child support pursuant to the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W.Va. Code § 48-13-101, et seq. (2001), that presumption is subject to the best interests of the child. Should the court determine that the presumption should not be followed in a specific case, the court should make such a finding on the record with its reasons clearly set forth in its order.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA, EX REL. S.C., Petitioner

v.

GRETCHEN LEWIS CHAFIN, SECRETARY, DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN RESOURCES; AND JAMES KIRBY, DIRECTOR, LAUREL PARK PRESSLEY RIDGE SCHOOL, Respondents

No. 22090

Submitted: March 1, 1994

Filed: April 22, 1994

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. W. Va. Code, 49-6-3(b) [1992] provides that, whether or not the court orders immediate transfer of custody as provided in W. Va. Code, 49-6-3(a) [1992], if the court finds that there exists imminent danger to the child, the court may schedule a preliminary hearing. If at the preliminary hearing the court finds there to be no alternative less drastic than removal of the child from his or her home, the court may order that the child be delivered into the temporary custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources or some other designated person for a period not exceeding sixty days. Furthermore, if, pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1992], the court finds the child to be abused or neglected, then both the Department of Health and Human Resources and the court, no later than sixty days after the child is placed in the temporary custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources, are to proceed with the disposition of the child, in compliance with W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1992]. W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992] requires the Department of Health and Human Resources to file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child. W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992] defines a case plan as a written document which includes, where applicable, the requirements of a family case plan, as set forth in W. Va. Code, 49-6D-3 [1984], as well as the additional requirements set forth in W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992]. Furthermore, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992] requires the court to proceed to disposition, one of those being, if the court finds the abusing parent(s) unwilling or unable to provide adequately for the child's needs, the court may commit the child temporarily to the custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources.

2. W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(a) [1992] provides that if, twelve months after receiving physical custody of a child, the Department of Health and Human Resources has not placed the child in permanent foster care, in an adoptive home or with a natural parent, the Department of Health and Human Resources shall file with the circuit court a petition for review of the case as well as a report detailing the efforts which have been made to place the child in a permanent home and copies of the child's case plan including the permanency plan. W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(a) [1992] further requires the circuit court to schedule a hearing to review the child's case, to determine whether and under what conditions the child's commitment to the Department of Health and Human Resources shall continue, and to determine what efforts are necessary to provide the child with a permanent home. At the conclusion of the hearing the circuit court shall enter an appropriate order of disposition, in accordance with the best interests of the child. Under W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(a) [1992], the court shall retain continuing jurisdiction over cases reviewed under this section for so long as a child remains in temporary foster care.

3. "The purpose of the family case plan as set out in W. Va. Code, 49-6D-3(a) (1984), is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening these problems." Syl. pt. 5, State ex rel. Dept. of H.S. v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987).

4. The purpose of the child's case plan is the same as the family case plan, except that the focus of the child's case plan is on the child rather than the family unit. The child's case plan is to include, where applicable, the requirements of a family case plan, as set forth in W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992] and 49-6D- 3(a) [1984], as well as the additional requirements articulated in W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a).

5. W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(d) [1992] requires the Department of Health and Human Resources to file a report with the circuit court in any case where any child in the temporary or permanent custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources receives more than three placements in one year no later than thirty days after the third placement.

6. "'A statutory provision which is clear and unambiguous and plainly expresses the legislative intent will not be interpreted by the courts but will be given full force and effect.' Syl. pt. 2, State v. Epperly, 135 W. Va. 877, 65 S.E.2d 488 (1951)." Syl. pt. 3, Echard v. Holland, 177 W. Va. 138, 351 S.E.2d 51 (1986).

McHugh, Justice:
In the case before this Court, the petitioner, S.C., See footnote 1 a juvenile, seeks a writ of habeas corpus and a writ of mandamus against the respondents, Gretchen Lewis Chafin, Secretary, Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") and James Kirby, Director, Laurel Park Pressley Ridge School, See footnote 2 to compel her release from Pressley Ridge and to require the DHHR to comply with W. Va. Code, 49-6-3(b) [1992], which allows the DHHR to maintain temporary custody of a child for no more than sixty days; W. Va. Code, 49-6- 5(a) [1992], which requires the DHHR to file with the court the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child; W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(a) [1992], which requires the DHHR to file with the court a petition for review of the case if it has not permanently placed a child after twelve months; and, W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(d) [1992], which requires the DHHR to file a report with the court when a child in its custody receives more than three placements in one year. Upon consideration of the petition, all matters of record and the briefs and arguments of counsel, See footnote 3 we conclude that the writ of habeas corpus should be denied and the writ of mandamus should be granted.

I.

S.C., now sixteen years old, has been in the temporary custody of the DHHR since August 27, 1991,See footnote 4 when it was determined that she was being sexually abused by her mother's boyfriend and by the boyfriend's son, as well as being physically and emotionally abused by her mother. See footnote 5 Subsequent medical and psychological evaluations of S.C. revealed that she had been "raped" and frequently abused drugs and alcohol. See footnote 6 Though the DHHR's mission is to serve the emotional and physical welfare of children such as S.C., it has not adequately done so in this case. See W. Va. Code, 49-1-1 [1981]. As this case demonstrates, the DHHR has not fulfilled its responsibility to secure for S.C. "custody, care and discipline" consistent with her best interests. Id.; see also W. Va. Code, 49-2-1 [1941].

On August 28, 1991, S.C. was moved from the Upshur County Emergency Shelter, where she was initially placed, to the Lewis County Emergency Shelter. See footnote 7 On November 8, 1991, S.C. was placed with her grandmother on a trial basis. This arrangement was terminated, however, when it was learned that S.C. was not attending school. See footnote 8 S.C. was then placed at the Genesis

Youth Crisis Shelter, on December 10, 1991. On December 13, 1991, S.C. was returned to the Lewis County Emergency Shelter. See footnote 9
On January 2, 1992, S.C. was admitted to Stonewall Memorial Hospital in Weston, West Virginia, following a suicide attempt by drug overdose. She was then transferred to St. Joseph's Hospital in Parkersburg, West Virginia, for follow-up evaluation and treatment. Upon being released from St. Joseph's Hospital, S.C. was placed at Monongalia County Youth Services in Morgantown, West Virginia on January 31, 1992.See footnote 10
Following completion of treatment at Olympic Center, S.C. was returned to Monongalia County Youth Services, on March 18, 1992, and then moved again to the Wesley Youth Center in Beckley, West Virginia on May 5, 1992. When the Wesley facility was closed on March 18, 1993, S.C. was moved to a private foster home in Weston, West Virginia. On March 30, 1993, at S.C.'s request, she was placed at the Odyssey Group Home for Girls in Morgantown. On May 6, 1993, an Unusual Incident Report was filed by Sophia Bienek, Site Supervisor of the Odyssey Group Home, stating that, during S.C.'s meeting with staff, child protective services ("C.P.S.") worker Michal Harris argued with S.C. regarding her behavior. Ms. Bienek, who was present during the meeting, wrote in the report that Ms. Harris told S.C. that she dressed, "like a whore," that her actions were going to result in pregnancy and that she was going to end up like her mother.

On July 29, 1993, the Circuit Court of Upshur County entered an agreed order adjudging S.C. to be a "status offender," as that term is defined in W. Va. Code, 49-1-4 [1978].See footnote 11 The agreed order indicates that "the parties hereto are in agreement" as to this determination, that no hearing was held on the matter and that S.C. was not represented by counsel. See footnote 12 The agreed order further directs S.C. to remain in the temporary care, custody and control of the DHHR and to be moved to Pressley Ridge, where she was eventually placed, on July 30, 1993.

In a letter to guardian ad litem Roger Thompson, dated August 16, 1993, the executive director of Odyssey, Lisa Shepherd, questioned the agreed order of July 29, 1993 and the fact that S.C. received neither a delinquency hearing nor representation by an attorney. Ms. Shepherd further indicated that a treatment plan had been developed for S.C. by the staff at Odyssey, that S.C.'s behavior had improved significantly and that her behavior was indicative of sexual abuse survivors. It was Ms. Shepherd's belief that Mr. Thompson was given incorrect and fictitious information concerning S.C. and that S.C.'s case "should be reviewed for accuracy and due process."

Though the Juvenile Justice Committee subsequently telephoned Mr. Thompson regarding S.C.'s situation, Mr. Thompson did not respond to that phone call.

After the filing of the petition with this Court, S.C. was released from Pressley Ridge and, at her request, was returned to the Odyssey Group Home in Morgantown, where she presently resides.

II.

Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code provides the "legislative declaration of the State's interest, responsibilities and rights as respects any minor child under the age of eighteen years, who for some reason specified by the statute is in need of services, protection or care." In re Willis, 157 W. Va. 225, 238, 207 S.E.2d 129, 137 (1973); see also In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993); In re Betty J.W., 179 W. Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988). Indeed, the State, in its role of parens patriae, "[s]tand[s] at the side of the natural parents with benign, but continuing, interest" in the care and custody of children. Id. Therefore, when it is determined that a child must be removed from his or her family, the State is required, by statute, to "secure for the child custody, care and discipline consistent with the child's best interests[.]" W. Va. Code, 49-1-1 [1981].

Chapter 49, article 6 of the West Virginia Code specifically sets forth the affirmative duties of both the DHHR and the circuit courts concerning children who have been abused or neglected. However, in S.C.'s case, neither the DHHR nor the Circuit Court of Upshur County fulfilled its statutory responsibilities.

A.

W. Va. Code, 49-6-3(a) [1992] allows the circuit court to order a child into the custody of the DHHR if the court finds there to be imminent danger to the child's physical well-being and there are no reasonable available alternatives to removal of the child. W. Va. Code, 49-6-3(b) [1992]See footnote 13 provides that, whether or not the court orders immediate transfer of custody as provided in W. Va. Code, 49-6-3(a) [1992], if the court finds that there exists imminent danger to the child, the court may schedule a preliminary hearing. If at the preliminary hearing the court finds there to be no alternative less drastic than removal of the child from his or her home, the court may order that the child be delivered into the temporary custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources or some other designated person for a period not exceeding sixty days.

Furthermore, if, pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1992], the court finds the child to be abused or neglected, then both the Department of Health and Human Resources and the court, no later than sixty days after the child is placed in the temporary custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources, are to proceed with the disposition of the child, in compliance with W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1992]. W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992] See footnote 14 requires the Department of Health and Human Resources to file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child. W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992] defines a case plan as a written document which includes, where applicable, the requirements of a family case plan, as set forth in W. Va. Code, 49-6D-3 [1984], as well as the additional requirements set forth in W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992]. Furthermore, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992] requires the court to proceed to disposition, one of the dispositions being, if the court finds the abusing parent(s) unwilling to provide adequately for the child's needs, the court may commit the child temporarily to the custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources.

A preliminary hearing was held in the Circuit Court of Upshur County, on September 5, 1991, pursuant to a petition dated August 27, 1991, which asked that the care, custody and control of S.C. be awarded to the DHHR, based on the allegations of sexual, emotional and physical abuse. At the preliminary hearing, it was determined that there existed imminent danger to the physical well- being of S.C. and the other four children in the household. There was further found to be no reasonable, available alternatives to removal of the children, on a temporary basis, pending a full hearing on the matter.

A final hearing was originally scheduled for October 31, 1991. However, the case was continued until January 14, 1992, at the request of counsel for S.C.'s mother and the mother's boyfriend, because the boyfriend was awaiting extradition from Illinois to West Virginia. On January 14, 1992, the DHHR requested a continuance until February 13, 1992, so that psychiatric and psychological evaluations could be completed. See footnote 15 On February 13, 1992, the Circuit Court of Upshur County, sua sponte, continued further proceedings until June 26, 1992, and entered an additional order granting the DHHR continued custody of S.C. until appropriate foster care could be found. The circuit court further found that a reasonable effort had been made to prevent placement of S.C. and the other children out of the home, but that it was in their best interests to place them out of their home.

The proceedings were again continued, at the request of guardian ad litem Roger Thompson, until July 17, 1992, and by order entered August 6, 1992, the parental rights of S.C.'s mother were terminated. However, to date, there has been no hearing concerning permanent custody of S.C.

Though the DHHR concedes that it has had temporary custody of S.C. for a period exceeding sixty days, it argues that it has, nevertheless, complied with W. Va. Code, 49-6-3(b) [1992]. The DHHR asserts that, though this case has been continued numerous times, only one of those continuances was granted at its request. Citing overly burdened courts and prosecutors and a focus on the criminal aspects of this case, the DHHR defends the excessive delay as being caused by factors beyond its control. The DHHR further contends that it has attempted to act in the best interest of S.C., tendering, as proof, the order of February 13, 1992, in which it was found that the DHHR had made reasonable efforts to prevent the removal of S.C. from her home and in which the DHHR was given continued custody of S.C.

As we noted in In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 622, 408 S.E.2d 365, 374 (1991), lengthy procedural histories are a common occurrence in abuse and neglect cases. This Court recognized this problem when we stated: "Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security." Id. at syl. pt. 1. We recognize that minor procedural delays are, at times, inevitable. However, S.C. has lingered in the temporary custody of the DHHR for over two years. In cases such as S.C.'s, where months turn into years, "[r]egardless of who is responsible for the delay . . . the child is the unfortunate victim." W. Va. Dept. of Human Serv. v. La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W. Va. 330, 337 n. 8, 332 S.E.2d 632, 638 n. 8 (1985). Such lengthy delays will not be tolerated by this Court, if for no other reason, but to ensure the well-being of the child. As we stated in Carlita B.:

> [S]ome means of systematic review of child neglect and abuse cases must be established. Otherwise, the statutory time frames that govern their processing and the mandatory, periodic status reports that must be filed with the court are too easily overlooked. If such safeguards are rendered meaningless by a failure or inability to monitor cases, neglected and abused children may become lost in the very system designed to rescue them.

185 W. Va. at 624, 408 S.E.2d at 376.

The DHHR also contends that the mandatory duties delineated in W. Va. Code, 49-6-3(b) [1992] are duties required of the circuit court, and not of the DHHR and that, consequently, if a writ of mandamus is to be granted, it should be directed to the Circuit Court of Upshur County and not the DHHR.

If the circuit court finds a child to be abused or neglected pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1992], then both the DHHR and the circuit court, no later than sixty days after the child is placed in the temporary custody of the DHHR, are to proceed with the disposition of the child, in compliance with W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1992]. Specifically, the DHHR shall file with the circuit court a copy of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child. See W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992]. W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992] further provides that the circuit court "shall forthwith proceed to disposition giving both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard."

In this case, neither the DHHR nor the circuit court fulfilled its statutory responsibility to S.C. Though the DHHR has presented to this Court numerous documents concerning problem- solving and goal-setting for S.C., this Court has learned, upon further examination of this case, that those documents were never filed with the circuit court. Requiring the DHHR to file case plans with the circuit court was designed to check the often chaotic administration of the foster care system and to ensure that the system does not lose track of children in care. This procedural requirement further assures that the DHHR has properly prepared a case plan in individual cases. Clearly, it was the DHHR's statutory duty to file with the circuit court a case plan for S.C. Furthermore, the circuit court had the statutory duty of ensuring that a case plan had, in fact, been filed.

Though the documents to which the DHHR refers in its brief were not filed with the circuit court as required by W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992], we recognize there was some attempt by the DHHR to, at least, formulate a case plan for S.C. During S.C.'s stay at Wesley Youth Center, the Wesley staff and S.C.'s C.P.S. worker, Michal Harris, prepared a Plan of Care, three Plan of Care Reviews and a Discharge Summary. These documents identify problems and define goals in the areas of physical and mental health, socialization, self-help, work and education, leisure skills, family, adult and peer relationships, faith development, discharge needs and case management. For the problems and goals stated, there is also a stated method and frequency of treatment, a desired outcome and target date, a responsible person and a summary of progress. Although the DHHR failed to file the Plan of Care Reviews with the circuit court, the documents do contain some of the statutory requirements of a case plan, which are enumerated in W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992].

Furthermore, the other documents to which the DHHR refers in its brief and which were presented to this Court as exhibits do not comport with W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992] and, therefore, do not constitute a case plan. For instance, the DHHR refers specifically to a Service Plan, dated September 3, 1991.See footnote 16 The DHHR asserts that, although this document is entitled a "Service Plan," it is, in reality, a case plan, the difference being the terminology and not content. See footnote 17 We disagree. The Service Plan, prepared only days after S.C. was removed from her mother's home, describes S.C.'s situation in the most general and superficial terms. According to the briefs of both parties, S.C. was not even evaluated by a physician until September 4, 1991, thus explaining the cursory report on S.C.'s case. See footnote 18 We must conclude, therefore, that the September 3, 1991 Service Plan is not a case plan, pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992].

The DHHR further claims that the weekly progress reports, prepared at Olympic Center, during S.C.'s forty-five-day stay for drug and alcohol treatment, also meet the statutory requirements of a case plan. Again, we disagree. S.C.'s history of substance abuse certainly necessitated an intensive treatment program. Accordingly, the progress reports prepared at Olympic tracked S.C.'s participation in individual and group therapy and Alcoholic's Anonymous Twelve-Step Program for Young Adults. However, S.C.'s chemical dependency accounts for only one of the many issues which should have been addressed in her case plan.

In syllabus point 5 of State ex rel. Dept. of H.S. v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987), we stated that, "[t]he purpose of the family case plan as set out in W.Va. Code, 49-6D-3(a) (1984), is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening these problems." The purpose of the child's case plan is the same as the family case plan, except that the focus of the child's case plan is on the child rather than the family unit. See footnote 19 The child's case plan is to include, where applicable, the requirements of a family case plan, as set forth in W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992] and 49-6D-3(a) [1984], as well as the additional requirements articulated in W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992].

The DHHR has gathered an assortment of documents and has labelled them a "case plan." While the Plan of Care Reviews from Wesley Youth Center contain some of the requirements of a case plan, the initial Service Plan of September 3, 1991 and the weekly progress reports from Olympic Center do not.

B.

W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(a) [1992]See footnote 20 provides that if, twelve months after receipt by the Department of Health and Human Resources of physical custody of a child, the Department of Health and Human Resources has not placed the child in permanent foster care, in an adoptive home or with a natural parent, the Department of Health and Human Resources shall file with the court a petition for review of the case as well as a report detailing the efforts which have been made to place the child in a permanent home and copies of the child's case plan including the permanency plan. W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(a) [1992] further requires the circuit court to schedule a hearing See footnote 21 to review the child's case, to determine whether and under what conditions the child's commitment to the Department of Health and Human Resources shall continue, and to determine what efforts are necessary to provide the child with a permanent home. At the conclusion of the hearing the circuit court shall enter an appropriate order of disposition, in accordance with the best interests of the child. Under W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(a) [1992], the court shall retain continuing jurisdiction over cases reviewed under this section for so long as a child remains in temporary foster care.

The DHHR was given custody of S.C. on August 27, 1991. A Petition for Review of Custody of S.C., pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-8 [1992], was not entered until July 29, 1993, approximately twenty-four months later. The DHHR has consistently maintained that the permanency plan for S.C. was placement with a relative, if possible, her maternal grandmother. However, the DHHR also argues that S.C.'s placement at Wesley Youth Center, in May of 1992, was an attempt at permanent placement and that, therefore, the DHHR did not fail to comply with W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(a) [1992] because it had permanently placed S.C. within twelve months of obtaining custody of her. We find this explanation to be without merit. During the course of S.C.'s stay at Wesley, the various reports referred to above indicate that its goal was to permanently place S.C. with a relative. Furthermore, the Plan of Care Reviews prepared by Wesley staff estimate S.C.'s length of stay to be "over twelve months," and not "permanent." See footnote 22 It is, thus, reasonable to conclude that S.C.'s placement at Wesley was intended to be temporary. Therefore, both the DHHR and the circuit court failed to comply with W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(a) [1992].

C.

W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(d) [1992] requires the DHHR to file a report with the circuit court in any case where any child in the temporary or permanent custody of the DHHR receives more than three placements in one year no later than thirty days after the third placement. See footnote 23 As the record indicates, S.C. has been shuffled through numerous facilities while in the DHHR's custody. Though the DHHR admits that it has failed to comply with the strict interpretation of W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(d) [1992], it asserts that its violation of the statute is not as egregious as S.C. would have this Court to believe.

According to the DHHR, it interpreted the language in that code section to require that a report be filed within thirty days after the third permanent placement. In its Petition for Review of Custody, the DHHR indicates that it attempted to permanently place S.C. three times during the twenty-four months it has had custody of S.C. See footnote 24 The DHHR describes the other placements as temporary and necessary to retain S.C. only until suitable long- term placements could be found. The DHHR argues that to include all of S.C.'s placements as being within the meaning of W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(d) [1992] would be detrimental to the efficient administration of the child welfare system.

We find the language of W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(d) [1992] to be clear and unambiguous. That code section requires the DHHR to file with the circuit court a report regarding any child in its temporary or permanent custody who "receives more than three placements in one year no later than thirty days after the third placement." Id. Had the legislature intended the report to be filed only after three permanent placements, we believe it would have included that language in the statute. Unfortunately, in these types of cases, the word "permanent" has lost its significance. As we have previously held, "'[a] statutory provision which is clear and unambiguous and plainly expresses the legislative intent will not be interpreted by the courts but will be given full force and effect.' Syl. pt. 2, State v. Epperly, 135 W. Va. 877, 65 S.E.2d 488 (1951)." Syl. pt. 3, Echard v. Holland, 177 W. Va. 138, 351 S.E.2d 51 (1986). According to the record in this case, S.C. was moved approximately ten times in one year. By failing to file a report with the circuit court within thirty days after the third placement, the DHHR violated W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(d) [1992].

D.

On July 29, 1993, S.C. was adjudicated a "status offender" in the Circuit Court of Upshur County, based upon an agreed order between S.C.'s C.P.S. worker, Michal Harris, and the Prosecuting Attorney for Upshur County, William Thurman. However, W. Va. Code, 49-5-1(c) [1982] states, in relevant part, that a "child shall have the right to be effectively represented by counsel at all stages of proceedings under the provisions of this article[,]" and W. Va. Code, 49-5-1(d) [1982] states, in relevant part, that "the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses." W. Va. Code, 49-5-1(c) and (d) [1982] are written in very clear terms. S.C. was not afforded an opportunity to be heard at the July 29, 1993 proceeding nor was she represented by counsel. See footnote 25 The case should not have proceeded in the absence of S.C. and her counsel. The agreed order should never have been entered. See footnote 26

In that S.C. has been removed from Pressley Ridge, her petition for a writ of habeas corpus is moot and is, therefore, denied. S.C. is to remain at the Odyssey Group Home, in the temporary custody of the DHHR, pending the DHHR's proper disposition of her case.

We believe the case presently before this Court to be indicative of the many problems currently plaguing the foster care system. Previously, this Court, in the case of Jennifer A., individually and o[n] behalf of B.A. and S.A., her infant children, v. Harry A. Burgess, Director of Social Services, West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources, et al., No. 21009 (orders filed May 15, 1992 and July 16, 1993) addressed the need for comprehensive and workable child sexual abuse guidelines. To that end, we appointed a statewide advisory committee to develop such guidelines for the State of West Virginia. The stated mission of the committee is, in addition to developing comprehensive and workable child sexual abuse guidelines discussed in Jennifer A., to investigate the possibility of creating regional teams from within the individual counties, to develop and recommend rules of procedure for handling investigation, treatment and resolution of child abuse and neglect cases and to develop and recommend workable and comprehensive guidelines for handling investigation, treatment and resolution of child sexual abuse cases.

Among the committee's goals and objectives is to minimize case-processing time and maximize effective delivery of services and to facilitate permanency planning. The committee further established its methods as identifying problems in the field; evaluating what other states and counties are doing; reviewing West Virginia law and limitations under federal rules and regulations (especially as perceived by the DHHR); identifying what other agencies and committees are doing; drafting rules, outlines and guidelines and submitting them to this Court; and recommending statutory changes.

As a result of the circumstances of S.C.'s case, we shall expand the role of the committee to include the following: to conduct a statewide inventory of all children who have been in the foster care system of this state for more than one year so as to identify barriers to obtaining permanent homes for these children and to make recommendations to this Court for eliminating or reducing those barriers. The committee is to further develop a uniform reporting format to be used by C.P.S. workers in preparing family case plans as well as children's case plans, so as to promote uniformity and clarity and to make the plans amenable to outside review; to develop procedures for both the DHHR and the circuit courts which ensure that a case plan has been properly prepared by the DHHR and filed with the circuit court in individual cases; to insure that time frames for all aspects of the case plan are complied with; and to require the case plan to be a discrete part of the record in each case.

In addition, the committee is to develop procedures by which the progress and timetables of case plans are to be monitored by both the DHHR and the circuit courts, so as to ensure the case plans are adhered to and remain appropriate in individual cases. Finally, we ask the committee to develop any additional plans and procedures which will ensure more effective and efficient permanency planning for children in the DHHR's care.

The order in Jennifer A., filed on July 16, 1993, is to be returned within one year for a progress report. That date should be met. We recognize that the additional tasks required as a result of the S.C. case may necessitate more time. When this case was argued, Secretary Chafin commendably agreed to work with the Juvenile Justice Committee to correct the deficiencies which obviously existed in S.C.'s case. The involvement of the DHHR and the Juvenile Justice Committee alone may not accomplish the desired results in the absence of other necessary participants, including representatives of the judiciary. We believe that the utilization of the committee which is already in place and which includes representatives from the various entities involved in the process of handling of abuse and neglect cases, would be the most expeditious way to achieve the desired results. Insofar as these additional duties will require more time, we request a progress report by October 1, 1994.

As stated above, S.C. sought to compel her release from Laurel Park Pressley Ridge School. Because S.C. was released from Pressley Ridge to the Odyssey Group Home after this proceeding began, the writ of habeas corpus is denied. However, the relief relating to a writ of mandamus requiring compliance with W. Va. Code, 49-6-3(b) [1992] (allowing the DHHR to maintain temporary custody for a period not exceeding sixty days), W. Va. Code, 49-6- 5(a) [1992] (requiring the DHHR to file with the circuit court a case plan including a permanency plan), W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(a) [1992] (requiring the DHHR to file with the circuit court a petition for review if it has not permanently placed the child after twelve months), and W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(d) [1992] (requiring the DHHR to file a report with the circuit court when a child receives more than three placements in one year) will be granted.

Writ of Habeas Corpus denied;
Writ of Mandamus granted.

Footnote: 1 As is our practice in cases involving sensitive matters, we use initials to identify the parties rather than full names. See In re Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991).

Footnote: 2 Pressley Ridge is a staff secure residential facility for status offenders located in Harrison County, West Virginia.

Footnote: 3 In addition to the briefs and argument of counsel, this Court considered an amicus curiae brief filed by attorney Jane Moran, who has diligently represented children on prior occasions before this Court.

Footnote: 4 Four other children, then aged 16, 10, 5 and 2, were also removed from the household by the DHHR.

Footnote: 5 Attorney Roger Thompson was appointed guardian ad litem to represent the interests of the infant children.

Footnote: 6 Various psychiatric and psychological evaluations of S.C. revealed that S.C. came from a family environment which was conducive to sexual molestation. S.C. reportedly suffers from frequent crying spells and feelings of being unloved, unwanted and hopeless. S.C.'s sexually promiscuous behavior and school failure indicates an environment of abuse and neglect. Examinations of S.C. also determined that she was at high risk for sexually transmitted diseases, pregnancy, alcohol and drug abuse, running away and delinquency.

Footnote: 7 While S.C. asserts that there was no reason for her removal from the Upshur County Shelter, the DHHR explains that S.C. was removed out of fear that she was going to engage in sexual relations with another juvenile at the facility.

Footnote: 8 It should be noted that S.C. has continued to maintain a close relationship with her grandmother. All parties agree that permanent placement with the grandmother would not be possible at this time, as the grandmother has been unable to control S.C.'s behavior.

Footnote: 9 Again, S.C. alleges that no reason was given for her removal from Genesis. Conversely, the DHHR asserts that S.C. was removed due to her disruptive behavior and frequent attempts to run away. The DHHR further states that placement in the Lewis County facility was to be temporary, until a suitable long-term placement could be found.

Footnote: 10 The DHHR explains that it temporarily placed S.C. at the Monongalia County facility until a bed became available at Olympic Center, where S.C. was to be admitted for a 45-day treatment program for drug and alcohol addiction.

Footnote: 11 Actually, W. Va. Code, 49-1-4 [1978] defines "delinquent child" and not "status offender." A "delinquent child" is defined, in relevant part, as a child:

(1) Who commits an act which would be a crime . . . if committed by an adult, punishable by confinement in a jail or imprisonment;

. . . .

(3) Who, without just cause, habitually and continually refuses to respond to the lawful supervision by such child's parents, guardian or custodian;

(4) Who is habitually absent from school without good cause[.]

W. Va. Code, 49-5B-3(3) [1979] defines "status offender" as "a juvenile who has been charged with delinquency or adjudicated a delinquent for conduct which would not be a crime if committed by an adult."

Footnote: 12 The record reflects that S.C.'s C.P.S. worker, Michal Harris, approached the Upshur County Prosecuting Attorney's office concerning the order to have S.C. placed at Pressley Ridge. According to the DHHR's Service Documentation Log, dated August 6, 1993, the DHHR contacted guardian ad litem Roger Thompson concerning the agreed order. The log indicates that Mr. Thompson said that he usually likes to see what he is agreeing to and that he had not received a copy of the order. He was assured that his name only appeared at the end of the order, as a party to whom a copy should be mailed.

Footnote: 13 W. Va. Code, 49-6-3(b) [1992] states, in relevant part:

(b) Whether or not the court orders immediate transfer of custody as provided in subsection (a) of this section, if the facts alleged in the petition demonstrate to the court that there exists imminent danger to the child, the court may schedule a preliminary hearing giving the respondents at least five days' actual notice. If the court finds at the preliminary hearing that there are no alternatives less drastic than removal of the child and that a hearing on the petition cannot be scheduled in the interim period, the court may order that the child be delivered into the temporary custody of the state department or a responsible relative, which may include any parent, guardian, or other custodian, or another appropriate person or agency for a period not exceeding sixty days: Provided, That the court order shall state (1) that continuation in the home is contrary to the best interests of the child and state the reasons therefor; (2) whether or not the department made reasonable efforts to prevent the child's removal from his or her home; (3) whether or not the state department made a reasonable effort to prevent the placement or that the emergency situation made such efforts unreasonable or impossible; and (4) what efforts should be made by the department to facilitate the child's return home[.]

Footnote: 14 W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1992] states, in part:

Following a determination pursuant to section two [§ 49-6-2] of this article wherein the court finds a child to be abused or neglected, the department shall file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child. The term case plan means a written document that includes, where applicable, the requirements of the family case plan as provided for in . . . [§ 49-6D-3] . . . and that also includes at least the following: A description of the type of home or institution in which the child is to be placed, including a discussion of the appropriateness of the placement and how the agency which is responsible for the child plans to assure that the child receives proper care and that services are provided to the parents, child and foster parents in order to improve the conditions in the parent(s) home, facilitate return of the child to his or her own home or the permanent placement of the child, and address the needs of the child while in foster care, including a discussion of the appropriateness of the services that have been provided to the child. The term permanency plan refers to that part of the case plan which is designed to achieve a permanent home for the child in the least restrictive setting available . . . . If reunification is not the permanency plan for the child, the plan must state why reunification is not appropriate and detail the alternative placement for the child to include approximate time lines for when such placement is expected to become a permanent placement. This case plan shall serve as the family case plan for parents of abused or neglected children.

W. Va. Code, 49-6D-3(a) [1984] provides, in relevant part:

Within the limits of funds available, the department of human services shall develop a family case plan for . . . each family referred to the department for supervision and treatment following a determination by a court that a parent, guardian or custodian in such family has abused or neglected a child . . . . The family case plan is to clearly set forth an organized, realistic method of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening those problems. Every family case plan prepared by the department shall contain the following:

(1) A listing of specific, measurable, realistic goals to be achieved;

(2) An arrangement of goals into an order of priority;

(3) A listing of the problems that will be addressed by each goal;

(4) A specific description of how the assigned caseworker or caseworkers and the abusing parent, guardian or custodian will achieve each goal;

(5) A description of the departmental and community resources to be used in implementing the proposed actions and services;

(6) A list of the services which will be provided;

(7) Time targets for the achievement of goals or portions of goals;

(8) An assignment of tasks to the abusing or neglecting parent, guardian or custodian, to the caseworker or caseworkers, and to other participants in the planning process; and

(9) A designation of when and how often tasks will be performed.

Footnote: 15 This was the only continuance requested by the DHHR.

Footnote: 16 The substance of the one-page Service Plan consisted of identifying the problems of S.C. and the other children removed from the home in the following manner: " That [the children] are neglected and abuse d infant children and that they have not been and do not have proper parental care, control and guardianship" and "[l]a ck of parental care cause d educational and medic al problems and severe emotional problems." The goals included: "To find appropriate placement for the infant children" and "[t]o asses s each child 's needs re: Health and Educa tion. " Final ly, the tasks were deter mined to be: "Temporary Foster Care Placement until appropriate placement can be found ," "[t]o make inquiries into [several relatives'] background [s] to see if they are fit and proper perso ns to care for the above children," "[m]edical check-ups for [the children], " "[e]arly child hood Inter venti on Screening for [two of the children], " "investigative counseling for [S.C. and one of the other children], " and "[s]c hool registration and attendance ."

Footnote: 17 In its brief, the DHHR states that S.C.'s C.P.S worker, Michal Harris, filed this Service Plan with the Circuit Court of Upshur County. However, the circuit clerk's office has no record of this document ever being filed there.

Footnote: 18 According to the briefs of both parties, S.C. was first examined for possible sexual abuse by Christopher A. Borchert, M.D., on September 4, 1991.

Footnote: 19 In this case, the DHHR was to prepare and file with the court a child's case plan in that the maternal rights of S.C.'s mother have been terminated and S.C. has no contact with her biological father.

Footnote: 20 The text of W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(a) [1992] states, in relevant part:

If, twelve months after receipt (by the state department or its authorized agent) of physical custody of a child . . . the state department has not placed a child in permanent foster care or an adoptive home or placed the child with a natural parent, the state department shall file with the court a petition for review of the case. The department shall also file with the court a report detailing the efforts that have been made to place the child in a permanent home and copies of the child's case plan including the permanency plan as defined in . . . [§ 49- 6-5][.]

Footnote: 21 The word hearing envisions the presence of all parties and their counsel in court and the actual opportunity to be heard on the issues before the court. The statutory requirement is not fulfilled by the entry of an order without such a hearing.

Footnote: 22 The DHHR further contradicts the documentation at Wesley when it states in its brief that, had Wesley not shut down altogether, it would be reasonable to believe that S.C. would be there today.

Footnote: 23 W. Va. Code, 49-6-8(d) [1992] provides:

The state department shall file a report with the court in any case where any child in the temporary or permanent custody of the state receives more than three placements in one year no later than thirty days after the third placement. This report shall be provided to all parties and their counsel. Upon motion by any party, the court shall review these placements and determine what efforts are necessary to provide the child with a stable foster or temporary home: Provided, That no report shall be provided to any parent or parent's attorney whose parental rights have been terminated pursuant to this article.

Footnote: 24 In its brief to this Court, the DHHR indicates that it attempted to place S.C. in a permanent home four times. However, the Petition for Review of Custody, the document to which the DHHR refers, recounts only three attempts at permanent placement. The DHHR also states in its brief that S.C.'s placement in a private foster home in Weston, West Virginia, in March of 1993, was temporary. However, in the Petition for Review of Custody, the DHHR described that same foster home as an attempt at permanent placement.

Footnote: 25 Though the circuit court had previously appointed a guardian ad litem to represent S.C.'s interests in the abuse and neglect proceedings, there is no evidence that S.C. had counsel to represent her interests in this juvenile matter.

Footnote: 26 As we noted earlier, Ms. Harris did not even contact S.C.'s guardian ad litem about the agreed order until August 6, 1993, days after the proceeding.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia

In the Interest of S. C., M. C., D. C., B. C., B. C., R. C., G. C., J. A. C., A. R. C., D. E. C.

No. 15200.

Dec. 3, 1981.

Syllabus by the Court

1. W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare, in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove "conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition ... by clear and convincing proof." The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden.

2. Even when an improvement period is granted, the burden of proof in a child neglect or abuse case does not shift from the State Department of Welfare to the parent, guardian or custodian of the child. It remains upon the State Department of Welfare throughout the proceedings.

3. "An order to which no objection was made and which was actually approved by counsel, will not be reviewed on appeal." Syl. pt. 1, Loar v. Massey, W.Va., 261 S.E.2d 83 (1979).

Smith & Rumora and Robert D. Calfee, Williamson, for appellant.

Jane Moran, Williamson, for father.

Paul E. Pinson, Williamson, for children.

Chauncey H. Browning, Atty. Gen. and Billie Gray, Asst. Atty. Gen., for State.

McHUGH, Justice:

This is an appeal by Rebecca C. from an order of the Circuit Court of Mingo County, entered on July 11, 1980, which granted permanent custody and guardianship of eight of the appellant's ten children to the West Virginia State Department of Welfare and terminated the appellant's parental rights. See footnote 1 On this appeal Rebecca C. assigns three errors: (1) that she was denied her right under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2 [1980], to cross-examination of the witnesses who appeared in opposition to her; (2) that the trial judge improperly shifted the burden of proof from the State Department of Welfare to the appellant, and that the State failed to meet its burden; and (3) that the trial judge erred by failing to make findings of fact and conclusions of law in his final order as required by W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980]. The assignments of error will be considered in order.

I

On September 5, 1979, the West Virginia State Department of Welfare filed a petition with the Circuit Court of Mingo County alleging that the children of the appellant were neglected children within the meaning of W.Va.Code, 49-1-3 [1978]. See footnote 2 Included as part of the petition were reports made by social workers Lewis Childers and Marcia Corbett. At a hearing on July 2, 1980, the State Department of Welfare did not call either Lewis Childers or Marcia Corbett to testify, nor did the State Department of Welfare offer their reports as evidence. The appellant assigns this as error.

The appellant's argument is based on W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], which provides:

> In any proceeding under this article, th e party or parties having custody of the child shall be afforded a m eaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to presen t and cross-examine witnesses. The petition shall not be taken as confessed. A transcript or recording shall be made of all proceedings unless waived by all parties to the proceeding. The rules of evidence shall apply. Where relevant, the court shall consider the efforts of the state departm ent to remedy the alleged circumstances. At the conclusion of the hearing the cour t shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or ne glected, which shall be incorporated into the order of the court. Th e findings must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and pr oven by clear and convincing proof.

The appellant argues that the language of this section requires the State Department of Welfare to call the social workers who prepared the reports which were incorporated into the petition and to offer those reports into evidence. She further argues that the State's failure to call the social workers and to offer their reports into evidence denied her the right to cross- examination provided for in the statute. We find no merit in this argument.

W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare, in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove "conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition ... by clear and convincing proof." The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden. Specifically, there is no statutory requirement that the State Department of Welfare call any or all of the social workers who may have been involved in the case or to offer their reports into evidence. In this case the State Department of Welfare elected to attempt to meet its burden without relying on social workers Childers and Corbett or their reports. The State Department of Welfare, instead, chose to rely on the testimony of three of the children and social worker Kerry Burmeister.

Similarly, the State Department of Welfare's decision not to call social workers Childers and Corbett, or to offer their reports into evidence, did not violate the appellant's statutory right to cross-examine witnesses. The statute merely provides that there be an "opportunity ... to cross-examine witnesses." In this case the appellant was afforded, and exercised, her opportunity to cross-examine each witness presented by the State.

II

An adjudicatory hearing was held on the neglect petition in this case on July 2, 1980. At that hearing the State Department of Welfare offered testimony by social worker Kerry Burmeister, and three of the appellant's children. At the close of the State's case, counsel for Rebecca C., relying principally on the fact that social workers Childers and Corbett had not been called to testify, moved to dismiss the petition. In overruling the motion, the trial judge said:

> The gist of this action is neglect, a nd I think there is su fficient evidence as to what the living conditions were and it has been established by the evidence that the living conditions were such that it could be concluded that the children or that the parents had neglected to give the children proper surroundings, proper environm ent, in whic h to grow up. I think the State has sustain [sic] the burden of proof in that connection, and that when the stipulation was entered into on a form er occasion that Mrs. C. be given an improvement period, I construe that to be an adm ission by all--not an admission--a concurrence by all partie s that the living conditions of the children were not satisfactory and th at stipulation am ounted to a tacit agreement that conditions were not what they should have been, but that the parties would permit an improvement period. There has been no evidence that the conditions have improved, and for that reason, I think the State has sustained its case.

The appellant argues that the trial judge's comment, "that the stipulation amounted to a tacit agreement that conditions were not what they should have been," indicates that the trial judge had improperly shifted the burden of proof to the appellant.

The appellant, citing Pierce v. Pierce, W.Va., 274 S.E.2d 514 (1981), correctly points out that this Court will reverse a lower court judgment if it appears that such judgment was based on an incorrect conclusion of law. In a child abuse or neglect case the burden of proof under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2 [1980], is upon the State Department of Welfare to show by clear and convincing proof that conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition constituted neglect or abuse. That burden does not shift.

The question here, however, is whether the trial judge did misinterpret the law and improperly shift the burden of proof on the issue of neglect to the appellant. The statement of the trial judge cited by the appellant must be taken in context. Prior to the taking of the children's testimony at the July 2, 1980, hearing, for example, the following exchange occurred:

> Mr. Calfee [Counsel for Rebecca C.] : I don' t have any objection to the testimony that pertains to the cond itions prior to the removal of the children, because our concern here is what has happened in the improvement period more than what happened prior to the removal. If the State wants to take a life history of these children in their home, that is fine, but I don't see what real purpose that is going to serve.
> Mr. Pinson [Counsel for the children] : Our purpose is to check into what the conditions were at the time of th e filing of the petition and what the situation is now at the date of the hearing.
> The Court: I think the Court at the tim e it put this parent upon an improvement period decided, in effe ct, that the living conditions were unsatisfactory in the past and the que stion now is whether there has been any improvement, and I have not m ade a final disposition of the custody and I don' t really believe this court needs testimony in detail about living conditions, other than the m anner in which it m ight pertain to any improvement, since the parents were put on an improvement period.... Is it stipulated that the living conditions were unsatisfactory?
> Miss Moran [Counsel for James C.]: No, Your Honor.
> Mr. Calfee: No, Your Honor....
> The Court: Alright. We will have to go into this matter in abonitio [sic].... We will go into it thoroughly from the beginning and let there be testimony as to the unsatisfactory conditions in the home prior to any order as to an improvement period or custody in the hands of the welfare departm ent. So, we will proceed.

The trial judge, upon learning that the parties did not stipulate to the conditions existing at the time of filing of the petition, ordered that the State Department of Welfare go forward with its evidence of neglect existing at the time of the filing of the petition.

The trial judge's statement regarding the "tacit agreement" must also be viewed in the context of the whole statement in which it appears. Specifically, the trial judge said: "I think there is sufficient evidence.... I think the State has sustain [sic] the burden of proof in that connection...." The stipulation statement seems, when viewed in context, to be an afterthought--a statement of further supportive evidence--not an indication that the trial judge placed the burden of proof upon the appellant.

In the context of the entire record here, including the trial judge's specific finding that the State had presented sufficient evidence to sustain its burden, we do not think that it can be said that the trial judge misconstrued or misapplied the law. The trial judge, in this case did not give undue weight to the evidence concerning the improvement period, nor did he improperly shift the burden of proof. We do, however, take this opportunity to emphasize that, even when an improvement period is granted, the burden of proof in a child neglect or abuse case does not shift from the State Department of Welfare to the parent, guardian or custodian of the child. It remains upon the State Department of Welfare throughout the proceedings.

The appellant next argues that, even if the burden of proof was not improperly shifted, there was not sufficient evidence to show neglect and the State Department of Welfare, therefore, failed to carry its burden. In making this assertion the appellant mainly argues that the State Department of Welfare's proof was insufficient because social workers Childers and Corbett were not called to testify and their reports were not introduced into evidence. As we discussed in Section I above, the State Department of Welfare was not under an obligation to present such evidence or testimony, and the failure to do so is not, standing alone, a basis for finding that the evidence was insufficient. The proper question is whether the evidence which the State Department of Welfare did present was clear and convincing proof of neglect existing at the time the petition was filed. We have reviewed the record in this case and we think that the evidence was sufficient to support such a finding.

III

W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], specifically provides that the court shall "make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected, which shall be incorporated into the order of the court." The disposition order in this case merely states: "Following a full hearing, and after mature consideration of said evidence and argument of counsel, the Court found that each of said children were neglected children as defined by West Virginia Code, 49-1-3, as amended...." The trial judge, at the close of the July 2, 1980, hearing, did state:

> The court ... makes the following findi ngs: that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of negl ect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near fu ture, and it is necessary for the welfare of the children to terminate the parental or custodial rights and responsibilities, and the Court commits the children to the perm anent guardianship of the West Virginia Department of Welfare....

We agree with the appellant that this bare statement couched in the language of W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [1977], is not sufficient to comply with the requirement of W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], even though the evidence did support a finding of neglect. The State, however, argues that the error was waived and we find merit in that argument.

In Loar v. Massey, W.Va., 261 S.E.2d 83 (1979), we held, at Syl. pt. 1: "An order to which no objection was made and which was actually approved by counsel, will not be reviewed on appeal." The record in this case shows that no objection was ever made to the trial judge's failure to make specific findings of fact and conclusions of law. This issue is raised for the first time in the appellant's petition for appeal. In addition, the order which should have contained such findings of fact and conclusions of law was acquiesced in and signed by the appellant's counsel. In this case no objection was made to the order and it was approved for entry by counsel. In this situation we will consider the error to be waived. A litigant may not silently acquiesce to error, or actively contribute to such error, and then raise that error as a reason for reversal on appeal.

For the above stated reasons, the judgment of the Circuit Court of Mingo County is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Footnote: 1 James C., the father of the children, did not appeal from the judgment of the circuit court. Two of the children were not included in the order granting permanent custody and guardianship to the State Department of Welfare. D. E. C. and J. A. C. remain in the custody of their father. The appellant and James C. are now divorced.

Footnote: 2 W.Va.Code, 49-1-3 [1978], provides, in part:
"Neglected child" means a child:
(1) Whose physical or mental condition is impaired or endangered as a result of the present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education and the condition is not due primarily to the lack of financial means of the parent, guardian or custodian; or (2) Who is presently without necessary food, clothing, shelter, medical care, education or supervision because of the disappearance or absence of the child's parent or custodian.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Per Curiam:

This case is before the Court upon the appeal of the final order of the Circuit Court of Berkeley County, West Virginia, entered on March 12, 2013. This is a child abuse and neglect matter brought against Respondent Father John W.[1] concerning his infant daughter, S.W. In this appeal, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") and the guardian ad litem on behalf of S.W. contend that the circuit court erred by directing the DHHR to develop a plan for reunification between the child and father. The non-offending Respondent Mother Jamie W. filed a brief in support of the circuit court's ruling.

Upon careful review of the briefs, the appendix record, the arguments of the parties, and the applicable legal authority, we find that the circuit court erred in ordering reunification. We reach this conclusion in view of the fact that John W. and Jamie W.'s first child, L.W., died due to abusive head trauma in 2009. John W. confessed to causing L.W.'s death and pleaded guilty to felony manslaughter. In spite of the medical evidence to the contrary and his guilty plea, John W. now denies that any abuse or neglect of L.W. occurred. We find that his failure to acknowledge responsibility for the death of L.W. renders the conditions and circumstances in the home untreatable. Therefore, we reverse and remand this case to the circuit court for the entry of an order terminating the parental rights of John W.

I. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

A. Birth and Death of L.W.

John W. and Jamie W.'s first child, L.W., was born in December of 2008, at Harbor Hospital in Baltimore City, Maryland. The baby was premature and weighed three pounds eleven ounces at birth. L.W. was in the hospital several days after her birth. She was readmitted for low body temperature, and released six days later.

On the evening of January 9, 2009, John W. and Jamie W. transported L.W. to the Baltimore Washington Medical Center emergency room because her body temperature dropped. The parents reported to hospital personnel that they heard the baby make a "weird cry," and when they went into her room they found her cold and unresponsive. Upon examination, the baby "looked pale and droopy" and the medical providers initially thought that she was possibly suffering from an infection or meningitis. A spinal tap revealed blood which was a sign of a possible brain bleed. A physician then took both parents into a consultation room to tell them of her concerns and asked if the baby had any falls or if she had been thrown in the air or shaken. John W. admitted that he had thrown the baby in the air "playfully." When John W. stated that he had thrown the baby in the air, Jamie W. said, "I told you that you shouldn't do that."

John W. replied, "but she likes that." The physician noticed that after John W. conceded that he had thrown the baby in the air, he looked as if he was going to cry.

A CT scan confirmed that L.W. had internal bleeding and swelling of her brain. She also had bilateral retinal hemorrhaging. These injuries were consistent with the baby being shaken severely.[2] The medical center intubated L.W. to assist with her breathing and then transferred her to Johns Hopkins Hospital due to the severity of her injuries. L.W.'s condition deteriorated rapidly. The physicians at the pediatric intensive care unit at Johns Hopkins Hospital pronounced L.W. brain dead on January 13, 2009. She was kept alive until the evening of January 14, 2009, for organ donation purposes. The death certificate listed the cause of L.W.'s death as abusive head trauma.

Zabiullah Ali, M.D., Assistant Medical Examiner for the State of Maryland, performed an autopsy on the body of L.W. and concluded that

> [t]his 1 month, 7 day old, African American female, [L.W.], died of HEAD INJURIES. Investigation indicates that L[.] was brought to the hospital with decreased mental status and

[2] The neurological damage caused by shaking is commonly referred to as shaken baby syndrome. The diagnostic triad of symptoms includes retinal bleeding, bleeding in the protective layer of the brain, and brain swelling. See generally Comm. on Child Abuse and Neglect, Am. > a change in her cry. Autopsy examination revealed subdural hemorrhages (bleeding around the brain) with microscopic evidence of early stages of organization, diffuse subarachnoid hemorrhage, widespread hemorrhagic infarcts of the brain and upper spinal cord, global hypoxic-ischemic changes, and left retinal hemorrhages with bilateral optic nerve sheath hemorrhage. Review of the medical record indicates L[.] had extensive subarachnoid and subdural hemorrhage, left retinal hemorrhages, and cerebral edema with midline shift. Thrombosis of the superior sagittal sinus seen at autopsy is a complication of global ischemic/hypoxic brain damage. The manner of death is HOMICIDE. (emphasis in original).

B. John W.'s Confession, Guilty Plea and Manslaughter Conviction

On January 11, 2009, Detective J.S. Gajda with the Anne Arundel County Maryland's Criminal Investigation Division, Homicide Unit, questioned John W. about the circumstances surrounding L.W.'s injuries. John W. stated that the baby starting "fussing" and she would not stop, so he "bounced her." When the baby would not stop crying, he "bounced her a little more." John W. then said that he "probably" bounced L.W. "too hard." He told the detective that he regretted his actions and explained that he was having "a bad day."

The detective asked John W. if he wanted to write a letter of apology to L.W., and John W. prepared the following handwritten note:

> [L.], I am so sorry for what I did to [you] when [you] were still a[n] infant[.] I had a bad day and I guess I don't know my own strength and I guess I shook [you] a little to[o] hard and [you] ended up in the hospital with brain injuries[.] I'm so sorry.

Thereafter, John W. was arrested and indicted by a grand jury, sitting for the State of Maryland in Anne Arundel County, on charges of: (1) second degree murder; (2) child abuse in the first degree causing death; (3) manslaughter;[3] (4) child abuse in the first degree causing physical injury; (5) child abuse in the second degree; and (6) reckless endangerment. On August 24, 2009, John W. pleaded guilty to manslaughter.[4]

We note that Maryland does not differentiate between voluntary and involuntary manslaughter in its statute. Maryland Criminal Law § 2-207 (2002) states, in part: "(a) A person who commits manslaughter is guilty of a felony and on conviction is subject to: (1) imprisonment not exceeding 10 years; or (2) imprisonment in a local correctional facility not exceeding 2 years or a fine not exceeding $500 or both." In Cox v. State, 518 A.2d 132 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 1986), the Maryland Court of Appeals provided the following definitions of manslaughter: "Voluntary manslaughter has been defined as 'an intentional homicide done in sudden passion or heat of blood caused by reasonable provocation, and not with malice aforethought. . . .' Involuntary manslaughter, on the other hand, has been defined as 'the killing of another unintentionally and without malice[.]'" Id. at 135 (citations omitted).

[3] In Count Three of the Indictment, the grand jury charged that John W. "feloniously, without malice aforethought, kill[ed] and slay[ed] [L.W.]."

[4] John W. did not go through a colloquy with the court when he made this plea.

Following the manslaughter conviction, the Maryland court sentenced John W. to serve six years in the penitentiary, and suspended all but eighteen months. John W. served nine months in the penitentiary following his guilty plea.[5]

C. Abuse and Neglect Proceedings Following the Birth of S.W.

The instant case involves the abuse and neglect proceedings for John W. and Jamie W.'s daughter, S.W., who was born in February of 2012, at Winchester Medical Center in Winchester, Virginia. The DHHR received a referral from the hospital following S.W.'s birth after Jamie W. told the hospital staff that the couple had another child in 2008 that died. Jamie W. reported to hospital staff that her husband, John W., served a jail sentence for the death of the child but that she did not believe he hurt their child.

The DHHR filed an abuse and neglect petition against John W. and Jamie W. on February 10, 2012, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a)(3) (2009), alleging that John W. was subject to an aggravated circumstances filing based upon his conviction of manslaughter following the death of S.W.'s sibling.[6] On that same day, the circuit court granted emergency custody of S.W. to the DHHR. The DHHR completed a family functioning assessment, applicable to both parents. The case worker noted that John W.

The case worker made the following observations about Jamie W.:

In the case records from MD it was reported that on one occasion Jamie visited for five minutes[.] [T]hey reported she was going to lunch and running errands and that she would return, which she did not until the next evening. The second visit she told the hospital staff she would not be returning to see her daughter at all. The worker from Maryland was the > Jamie chose to be with her husband instead of in the hospital with their daughter after she was admitted and was in a coma. Her inability to put her child before her own needs is a great concern for a vulnerable infant's safety as well as her refusal in believing her husband's role in her child's death is a major concern for any infant in their care.

The circuit court held a preliminary hearing on March 12, 2012, and an evidentiary hearing on March 26, 2012. The circuit court denied John W.'s motion for visitation and found that visitation would not be consistent with the child's well-being and best interests. The circuit court adopted an agreement between the parties that allowed Jamie W. to have a minimum of two supervised one-hour visitation sessions with S.W. per week, with the DHHR having the discretion to increase the frequency of those visits.

The circuit court conducted an adjudicatory hearing on July 11, 2012. The circuit court found that John W.'s guilty plea and manslaughter conviction for the death of L.W. constituted aggravated circumstances under West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(7)(B) (2009). The circuit court ruled that based upon the conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition that S.W. was "abused and neglected as defined by West Virginia Code § 49-1-3 [(2009)]." The circuit court ordered that John W. have no contact with S.W., and found that the DHHR was not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family with regard to John W.

At the adjudicatory hearing, the DHHR and the guardian ad litem for S.W. informed the circuit court that S.W. had been returned to the physical custody of Jamie W. in June of 2012, subject to the terms of a safety plan.[7] Counsel for the DHHR and Jamie W.'s counsel moved that the petition either be dismissed with respect to Jamie W. or that she be considered a non-offending respondent. The guardian ad litem had no objection. Thereafter, the circuit court ruled that Jamie W. was a non-offending respondent.[8] The matter was scheduled for disposition.

The circuit court conducted additional evidentiary hearings in October of 2012, on John W.'s motions for visitation, reunification, or in the alternative, an improvement period. The circuit court heard testimony from John W.'s expert witness, Bernard Lewis, Ph.D., a licensed psychologist. Dr. Lewis conducted a parental capacity evaluation of John W. and opined that John W. was a "very low or absolutely minimal level of risk for harming this child." Dr. Lewis recommended that John W. be reunified into the home with S.W., with supervised visitation at first.

[7] During oral argument in this matter, this Court expressed its concerns about the decision to place S.W. with Jamie W. in light of the fact that Jamie W. continued to deny that John W. caused L.W.'s death. The DHHR and the guardian ad litem represented that the child was placed with her mother because Jamie W. showed improvement following her receipt of social services. All parties agree Jamie W. has a strong family support system and that S.W. is doing well in her care.

[8] After careful review of the appendix record submitted to this Court, it does not appear that the circuit court entered an order dismissing the petition against Jamie W.

In his report dated September 17, 2012, Dr. Lewis stated that he relied upon John W.'s history of the death of his first daughter. John W. reported to Dr. Lewis that after L.W. was taken to the emergency room, she was given a spinal tap which he believed caused her to go into a coma and subsequently led to her death. John W. acknowledged to Dr. Lewis that he gave a confession to law enforcement authorities but he adamantly stated he did nothing to harm or cause the death of his first child. John W. stated that his confession occurred after hours of questioning "and being worn down to the point where he was willing to do almost anything to get out of the police station[.]"[9]

In his testimony, Dr. Lewis stated that John W. was "the textbook example of individuals who make false confessions." On cross-examination, Dr. Lewis admitted that he relied upon the DHHR's summaries provided by John W.'s counsel and did not review L.W.'s medical records showing how she died to assess whether John W. was being truthful. Counsel for the DHHR questioned Dr. Lewis as follows:

> Q. [Mr. Rossi] I guess one of the problems I'm having is trying to understand – and maybe you just – maybe your opinion doesn't go there. Trying to understand how, if [John W.] doesn't admit that he did anything wrong with respect to the death of his first child, then how he can remedy himself. How he can prove himself from that time period.
>
> A. [Dr. Lewis] First of all, I'm willing to entertain the possibility that he's right. I understand legally he's not right.

[9] The record reflects that, during police questioning, Detective Gajda told John W. that he could leave at any time.

> Legally he bears responsibility for that child. I understand that. I accept that. But I also think, given my understanding of the big picture of the circumstances, I think it's possible that he was right. That he did not bear responsibility for the death of that child. So let's start with that.
>
> But moving beyond that and minimizing that, throwing that out, we're four years down the road. This man has changed in that four years, he has served his time in incarceration for that, he has paid his debt to society for that, he remains on now unsupervised probation for that. So in that sense, you know, he has done what the law required of him. There have been no problems with incarceration. No problems with probation. He's not violated anything. He has not shown himself to in any way be a violent, aggressive, angry, temperamental, substance abusing kind of person who would be at risk.
> So if we go back and say, okay, he's not being honest about that, there was something that he did, and there was never any clear evidence of what it was specifically that he did. But if we go back and say he did something, then I think we need to look at the four years since then and what he is like psychologically now. And that to me is the most important factor. (emphasis supplied).

The circuit court also heard testimony from Catherine Smith-Heine, who was qualified as an expert in counseling with an expertise in parenting. She testified that John W. successfully completed eight sessions of parenting class. She also stated that John W. denied harming L.W.

Jamie W. testified in support of John W.'s motion for visitation with L.W. She blamed L.W.'s death on medical professionals. Jamie W. stated that she had "papers" from another doctor indicating that L.W. suffered from a minor contusion "made worse by a spinal tap." When asked to provide that document, Jamie W. stated that she had it "at home."

Several family members testified in support of John W.'s motion for visitation. Angela Agostini, Jamie W.'s mother and S.W.'s grandmother, testified that she believes it is important for S.W. to have contact with her father. Ms. Agostini stated that she has never known John W. to be a violent or aggressive person. On cross-examination, Ms. Agostini was asked if John W. ever admitted to killing L.W. She answered in the negative, indicating "It's not something we discussed."

John W. testified and requested that the circuit court grant him visitation with S.W. John W. stated that he would be willing to engage in parenting classes and work with the DHHR if he were granted an improvement period. He denied doing anything to intentionally harm L.W. On cross-examination, John W. was shown a copy of the apology letter he wrote to L.W., and he stated, "I really didn't remember writing that." He admitted that he pleaded guilty to manslaughter following the death of L.W. When asked if he was telling the truth, that he committed manslaughter, John W. replied, "Yes." He also agreed that during the police interrogation, the detective told him he was free to go at any time.

Following this testimony, the circuit court found that it was in S.W.'s best interest to deny John W.'s motions for visitation, reunification or an improvement period.

The circuit court set the case for disposition again.[10] At the disposition hearing held on February 27, 2013, Jamie W. and other family members testified in support of John W.'s previous motions for visitation, reunification or for an improvement period.

The circuit court entered a disposition order on March 13, 2013, and found that "because there has been no showing of present unfitness . . . less drastic alternative[s] may be available in this matter, and failure to implement such in a safe manner, will cause further harm to this child[.]" The circuit court directed the DHHR to "prepare a plan of reunification which contemplates supervised visitation with a plan to move toward unsupervised visitation and ultimately re-unification without government involvement."[11] This appeal followed. [12]

II. STANDARD OF REVIEW

This Court has explained that "[f]or appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of

---

[10] On December 21, 2012, the circuit court held a status conference and noted that the case was going to be transferred to another judge. The parties agreed that transcripts of prior hearings would be provided to the judge to review before the final dispositional hearing was conducted.

[11] The circuit court did not dismiss the petition against John W., order a dispositional improvement period, or articulate its disposition of this case in accordance with the provisions of West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (2009) and Rule 36 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings.

[12] The circuit court entered a stay of execution of this order pending the outcome of this appeal.

review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000). In addition, we have held:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). With these principles in mind, we turn to the parties' arguments.

III. DISCUSSION

As a preliminary matter, this Court notes that the legal framework for deciding parental termination petitions is well established. The proceedings consist of two phases: the adjudicatory phase and the dispositional phase. During the adjudicatory phase, the circuit court must determine whether one or more of the statutory grounds for termination of parental rights exists by clear and convincing evidence. If the circuit court determines that a statutory ground for termination exists, then it proceeds to the dispositional phase. During the dispositional phase, the circuit court must determine the appropriate outcome of the case considering the best interests of the child.[13]

In this case, the circuit court conducted an adjudicatory hearing on July 11, 2012. At this hearing, the circuit court ruled that John W.'s prior guilty plea and conviction for the death of his child, L.W., constituted aggravated circumstances, under West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(7)(B). Therefore, the DHHR was not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family with regard to John W. The circuit court found that S.W. was an abused and neglected child as those terms are defined under West Virginia Code § 49-1-3.[14] John W.'s counsel objected to this finding. The circuit court overruled the objection and scheduled the matter for a disposition hearing. The circuit court stated that "the only remaining issue for the court's determination will be whether [John W.] can show a change of circumstances sufficient to be granted an improvement period."

[13] See Syl. Pt. 2, W.Va. Dept. of Health & Human Res. ex rel. Wright v. Brenda C., 197 W.Va. 468, 475 S.E.2d 560 (1996) ("'In a child abuse and neglect hearing, before a court can begin to make any of the dispositional alternatives under W. Va. Code, 49–6–5, it must hold a hearing under W. Va. Code, 49–6–2, and determine "whether such child is abused or neglected." Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case.' Syl. Pt. 1, State v. T.C., 172 W.Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983).").

[14] The circuit court did not enter its order following the adjudicatory hearing until October 20, 2012, well outside the time frame set forth in the rules. Rule 27 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides that at the conclusion of the adjudicatory hearing, "[t]he court shall enter an order of adjudication . . . within ten (10) days of the conclusion of the hearing[.]" Id. (emphasis supplied).

On appeal to this Court, the DHHR and the guardian ad litem do not dispute the circuit court's adjudicatory findings.[15] Therefore, the fundamental issue before this Court is whether the circuit court erred in the disposition of this case. The DHHR and the guardian ad litem contend that the circuit court abused its discretion following the disposition hearings when it overturned previous rulings denying an improvement period, denying reunification and denying visitation. The DHHR and the guardian ad litem argue that the only clear option under the law was termination of parental rights. Although John W. confessed to causing the death of L.W. and pleaded guilty to manslaughter, he now denies that any abuse or neglect of L.W. occurred. Therefore, the DHHR and the guardian ad litem maintain there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because John W. fails to acknowledge that abuse of L.W. occurred, in spite of the clear medical evidence to the contrary. In response, John W. argues that the circuit court did not err in ordering reunification with S.W. because there has been no present showing of unfitness. He contends that his previous manslaughter conviction in another state cannot shift the burden to him to prove present fitness.

[15] In his brief, John W. criticized the circuit court's finding following the adjudicatory phase of this case. He argued that the Maryland manslaughter conviction should not be equated to a voluntary manslaughter conviction under the West Virginia Code to reach the aggravated circumstances finding. However, John W. did not cross-assign as error the circuit court's adjudication of this case and that issue is not before this Court. We further note that the circuit court did not reverse its adjudication.

In determining the appropriate disposition of an abuse and neglect proceeding, we acknowledge that "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children.' Syllabus Point 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996)." Syl. Pt. 1, In re: Tonjia M., 212 W.Va. 443, 573 S.E.2d 354 (2002). In other words, "'[i]n a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W.Va. 801, 187 S.E.2d 601 (1972)." Syl. Pt. 4, State ex rel. David Allen B. v. Sommerville, 194 W.Va. 86, 459 S.E.2d 363 (1995).

As noted above, the DHHR was required to file a petition seeking termination of parental rights in this case pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b. Pursuant to our statutes, the DHHR was not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family considering the fact that John W. pleaded guilty to manslaughter of a previous child. W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(7)(B)(ii) .

"Although the requirement that such a petition be filed does not mandate termination in all circumstances, the legislature has reduced the minimum threshold of evidence necessary for termination where one of the factors outlined in West Virginia Code § 49-6-5b(a) (1998) is present." Syl. Pt. 2, in part, In re George Glen B. Jr., 205 W.Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863 (1999). Moreover, termination is proper when "there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future and, when necessary for the welfare of the child . . . .” W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6). In such cases, the lower court must allow the development of evidence surrounding the prior abuse and determine “what actions, if any, the parent(s) have taken to remedy [those] circumstances[.]” Syl. Pt. 4, in part, In re George Glen B. Jr., 205 W.Va. 435, 518 S.E.2d 863.

Having carefully examined the extensive record and testimony in this case, this Court is of the opinion that the circuit court committed reversible error in ordering that S.W. be reunited with John W. when the overwhelming evidence supported the termination of his parental rights. We reach this conclusion in view of clear and convincing proof that the injuries to L.W. were, in fact, consistent with abusive head trauma. Her death was ruled a homicide by medical examiners. John W. admitted to throwing this infant in the air and bouncing her when she would not stop crying. John W.’s explanations to the contrary throughout these proceedings were completely contradictory to the medical evidence. This Court has consistently articulated and adhered to the statutorily-mandated standard for the termination of parental rights. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) authorizes the termination of parental rights “[u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future and, when necessary for the welfare of the child.”

We emphasize that this case involves the death of a child. Contrary to Dr. Lewis' suggestion, this Court cannot minimize or disregard the death of L.W. The risk in this kind of case is evident and, consequently, any chance of subjecting the current living child to circumstances that could result in a similar fate is unacceptable. The evidence in this case unequivocally shows that John W. inflicted the fatal neurological injuries suffered by L.W. Despite his confession and guilty plea to manslaughter, he failed to take responsibility for his actions during these proceedings. He maintained that her injuries were caused by mistakes made by hospital personnel. This explanation wholly lacked support from the record evidence and is inconsistent with the medical records and autopsy of the child.[16] As this Court has noted, a parent's denial of abuse or neglect in the face of unrefuted medical evidence reflects an underlying resistance to the treatment needed to effect the behavior changes that will ensure a child's safety. See In re Kaitlyn P., 225 W.Va. 123, 127, 690 S.E.2d 131, 135 (2010) (finding that where child was clearly abused and his siblings were certainly at risk of being abused, parents were not entitled to post-adjudicatory improvement period when they failed to even acknowledge that abuse occurred, despite uncontroverted medical evidence to the contrary).

[16] This Court is cognizant of the fact that there is controversy in the legal and medical communities regarding criminal convictions of murder based solely on the presence of the diagnostic triad associated with shaken baby syndrome: retinal bleeding, bleeding in the protective layer of the brain, and brain swelling. See Deborah Tuerkheimer, Science-Dependent Prosecution and the Problem of Epistemic Contingency: A Study of Shaken Baby Syndrome, 62 Ala. L. Rev. 513, 515 (2011) (discussing lack of consensus that the diagnostic triad is necessarily and exclusively induced by shaking and recognizing that other medical disorders and accidental trauma can cause symptoms previously associated with shaken baby syndrome). This controversy does not affect the outcome of the case sub judice. The diagnosis in this case was abusive head trauma, not shaken baby syndrome. By definition, abusive head trauma is head trauma that is inflicted. The record also demonstrates that John W. gave a police confession and pleaded guilty to felony manslaughter. He did not challenge this plea in an appeal or file a post-conviction habeas corpus petition.

Accordingly, we find that termination of John W.'s parental rights in the present proceeding is warranted. We believe that the DHHR proved that S.W. remains at substantial risk of significant harm from John W. There was no showing of a reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because John W. has failed to acknowledge that abuse caused the death of L.W. As we have previously explained:

> "'"Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).' Syllabus point 4, In re Jonathan P., 1982 W.Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989)." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

Syl. Pt. 6, In re Isaiah A., 228 W.Va. 176, 718 S.E.2d 775 (2010).

Without question, the precedent of this Court supports our holding. In West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ex rel. v. Doris S., 197 W.Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996), we affirmed termination of parental rights after a child in the home suffered fatal injuries and the autopsy results showed a severe injury to the spinal column consistent with violent shaking. This Court stated that > in order to remedy the abuse and/or neglect problem, the problem must first be acknowledged. Failure to acknowledge the existence of the problem, i.e., the truth of the basic allegation pertaining to the alleged abuse and neglect or the perpetrator of said abuse and neglect, results in making the problem untreatable and in making an improvement period an exercise in futility at the child's expense.

197 W.Va. at 498, 475 S.E.2d at 874 (footnote omitted); see also Matter of Taylor B., 201 W.Va. 60, 69, 491 S.E.2d 607, 616 (1997) (finding termination of parental rights appropriate disposition when neither parent ever acknowledged that any abuse or neglect occurred despite medical evidence that child's injuries were consistent with shaken baby syndrome, a life-threatening circumstance).

The facts surrounding the death of L.W. are very disturbing. This Court declines to rule in any way that might risk the life of another child whose parent has engaged in such horrific conduct. We again acknowledge that parental rights are fundamental in nature, but we conclude that the DHHR not only established a statutory basis for termination of John W.'s parental rights, but also proved that termination was the least restrictive means of protecting S.W. under the facts of this case.

Finally, this Court remains deeply concerned that the disposition in this case raises a critical issue not resolved below: Whether Jamie W. is committed to ensuring that John W. will have no contact with S.W. Simply stated, will Jamie W. place the safety of her daughter above the desires of her husband? As noted by the initial case worker, Jamie W. refused to believe her husband had any role in L.W.'s death. In our review of the record, we find that Jamie W.'s opinion has not changed and she continues to support John W. This Court cannot abandon the question of this child's well-being without further inquiry into this situation. We therefore find that the DHHR must continue to monitor the status of this case to reasonably assure the safety of S.W.[17] See In re Brianna Elizabeth M., 192 W.Va. 363, 367, 452 S.E.2d 454, 4589 (1994)("Although sound public policy and the whole tenor of law seek generally to perpetuate the marital bond, the rights of children to be free from abuse require that a parent's first loyalty be to the protection of his or her children."). This matter will be remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings with the assistance of the DHHR to determine whether such protection is being accorded. As part of these reviews, the circuit court should also examine whether any additional services are required.

IV. CONCLUSION

Based upon the foregoing, the final order of the Circuit Court of Berkeley County entered March 12, 2013, is reversed, and this case is remanded for the entry of an order (1) terminating the parental rights of John W. to S.W., and (2) directing the DHHR to develop a plan to monitor S.W.'s safety.

Workman, Chief Justice:

This is a joint appeal by the paternal grandparents[1] and guardian ad litem of a child (hereinafter jointly referenced as "the petitioners" or separately referenced as "the grandparents" or "the GAL"). The petitioners appeal a circuit court order terminating the grandparents' legal guardianship of their grandchild, S.W. (hereinafter "the child"), and returning the child to his mother.[2] The Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "the DHHR") also supports the petitioners' contentions in this appeal. Subsequent to thorough review of the pleadings and record designated for review, the briefs and oral arguments of the parties, and for the reasons stated herein, we reverse the order of the Circuit Court of Brooke County, West Virginia, terminating the grandparents' guardianship of S.W. and remand this matter for entry of an order consistent with this opinion.

I. Factual and Procedural History

S.W. was born in 2009. An abuse and neglect petition was filed on June 30, 2010, alleging that the child's mother, K.M., was under the influence of drugs while caring for him. The DHHR placed the child in the care of his paternal grandparents, and a pre-adjudicatory improvement period was granted to the mother on September 29, 2010. The mother and the maternal grandparents were also granted visitation with the child.

[2]Based upon this Court's stay of the circuit court's order returning the child to his mother, the child currently resides with his paternal grandparents.

On March 16, 2011, the GAL filed a motion to terminate the mother's pre-adjudicatory improvement period because she had tested positive for oxycodone and morphine on two separate occasions. The improvement period was terminated on March 24, 2011, and the mother admitted that she was abusing drugs.[3]

On May 12, 2011, the mother admitted that she had been under the influence of drugs in the presence of the child and had neglected to take reasonable care of the child due to her drug addiction. The circuit court adjudicated her as a neglectful parent. During a June 23, 2011, status hearing, the circuit court was advised that the mother had completed a rehabilitation program and was participating in an outpatient program.

On September 8, 2011, the circuit court granted the mother a post-adjudicatory improvement period, requiring her to discontinue her abuse of controlled substances and refrain from contact with felons. On November 10, 2011, the child was returned to the mother's care, but legal custody remained with the DHHR. Approximately four months later, on March 9, 2012, the GAL filed a motion to return physical custody of the child to the DHHR because the mother had violated the terms of the post-adjudicatory improvement period by refusing to answer the door to her home and submit to a drug test. The child was thereafter removed from the mother's care and placed back in the custody of the paternal grandparents.

On July 12, 2012, the circuit court granted supervised visitation to the mother, contingent upon her cooperation with drug testing. The mother was unable to appear for a September 2012 hearing due to her incarceration on a charge of possession of drugs with intent to deliver. Subsequent to a June 21, 2013, dispositional hearing, the circuit court entered an order on August 5, 2013, stating that the mother had been arrested in September 2012 for possession with intent to deliver, had refused to be drug tested, and had exhibited erratic behavior. The court held that under West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(5) (2012),[4] the child would remain in the physical custody of the paternal grandparents, with visitation permitted with the mother and maternal grandparents.[5] [4]That section, now recodified as West Virginia Code § 49-4-604(b)(5) (2015), provided that the circuit court may commit the child temporarily to the State Department or a person who may be appointed guardian.

[5]The circuit court also stated that an abuse and neglect action was pending against the child's father, J.W. The father's parental rights to S.W. were ultimately terminated, and that aspect of this matter is not before this Court.

On September 3, 2013, the mother was released from incarceration and placed on probation for five years as a result of her guilty pleas to felony and misdemeanor drug charges. On December 12, 2013, the circuit court held a permanency hearing and granted legal guardianship to the paternal grandparents. The mother graduated from Drug Court on September 11, 2014,[6] and filed a "Petition to Overturn Legal Guardianship" on November 19, 2014. In that petition, she asserted that she had been in recovery for over one year, and she argued that her recovery and continued sobriety constituted a material change in circumstances justifying a modification of the custody of her son.

A hearing on the mother's petition was held on January 15, 2015. The mother testified concerning her strong bond with the child and her maintenance of sobriety. She indicated that the child calls her "Mommy," comes to her for safety and comfort, and sometimes throws tantrums in an effort to be permitted to stay with her. Ms. Gina Hicks, the mother's supervising officer and Mental Health Court Coordinator, testified that the mother had completed the rehabilitation program successfully and noted distinct improvements in the mother's performance during her participation in the program the second time. The mother's probation officer, Terry Stuck, testified that the mother was compliant with all terms of her probation.

[6]The mother also married on June 6, 2014, and she now has another child, who is a half-sibling to S.W.

The paternal grandmother also testified concerning her bond with the child, and she explained that she has encouraged the mother's role in the child's life and had not tried to assume the role of mother. The GAL testified that the child wished to remain living at his grandparents' home, with visits to his mother's home.

On April 1, 2015, the circuit court terminated the grandparents' legal guardianship and ordered the transfer of the child to the mother within ten days. The grandparents and the GAL appeal that ruling, contending the lower court ruled in favor of the mother based upon her right to parent her child, rather than in accordance with the statutorily-required analysis of the child's best interests. Specifically, the petitioners contend that the circuit court (1) ignored the best interests of the child by modifying the dispositional order and removing the child from the grandparents and (2) erred in modifying the dispositional order two years after it was entered, depriving the child of permanency. The petitioners further contend that if a transfer of custody to the mother is mandated, the circuit court should provide a period of gradual transition, as well as continued association with the grandparents.

On April 16, 2015, this Court granted a stay of the transfer of custody. In updates to this Court, the mother reports that she, her husband, and her newborn child are residing in the basement of her parents' home and are in the process of renovating separate living quarters for their own family at that location. Although the mother has been married since June 6, 2014, she and her current husband were briefly separated prior to the most recent October 2015 update on the status of the child. S.W., currently in the first grade, has remained in the custody of the paternal grandparents since 2010, with the exception of the four-month period in which custody was transferred back to the mother in 2012.

II. Standard of Review

This Court's standard of review in a child abuse and neglect case was addressed in In re Beth Ann B., 204 W.Va. 424, 513 S.E.2d 472 (1998). This Court explained that we employ the two-pronged standard of review enunciated in the syllabus of McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Company, 197 W.Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996):

> When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard.

We have also held that the following standard of review is applicable in custody decisions:

> "'The exercise of discretion by a trial court in awarding custody of a minor child will not be disturbed on appeal unless that discretion has been abused; however, where the trial court's ruling does not reflect a discretionary decision but is based upon an erroneous application of the law and is clearly wrong, the > ruling will be reversed on appeal.' Syllabus point 2, Funkhouser v. Funkhouser, 158 W.Va. 964, 216 S.E.2d 570 (1975), superseded by statute on other grounds as stated in David M. v. Margaret M., 182 W.Va. 57, 385 S.E.2d 912 (1989)." Syl. Pt. 1, In re Abbigail Faye B., 222 W.Va. 466, 665 S.E.2d 300 (2008).

Syl. Pt. 2, In re Antonio R.A., 228 W.Va. 380, 719 S.E.2d 850 (2011). With these standards as guidance, we address the issues raised in this case.

III. Discussion

The petitioners contend that the circuit court erred in ignoring the best interests of the child in modifying the dispositional order and terminating the legal guardianship of the grandparents. The mother's petition requesting modification of the guardianship order was premised upon West Virginia Code § 49-6-6 (2014). That statute clearly provides two prerequisites to modification of disposition. First, there must be a showing of material change in circumstances, and second, the alteration must serve the best interests of the child. As applicable to these proceedings,[7] West Virginia Code § 49-6-6(a) provides, in pertinent part:
